RETAIL CLERKS DEDICATED a new 11-story headquarters in Washington with more than 1,000 persons on hand. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the Suffridge Building stands as a testimonial to RCIA's former president, the union's growth and its achievements on behalf of store employes. The building is located at the corner of K and 18th Streets, N.W.

Cambodia Decision Backed by Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has voiced support for Pres. Nixon's decision to move U.S. forces against North Vietnamese concentrations in Cambodia.

"The President has clearly outlined the problem to the American people," Meany said following Nixon's television broadcast. "It is unmistakably clear that he made his decision on the basis of his clear obligation as commander-in-chief to protect American servicemen.

"As other presidents before him have done, he acted with courage and conviction. In this crucial hour, he should have the full support of the American people. He certainly has ours."

Labor Mourns Jean Moeri, ILO Leader

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed American labor's deep sorrow at the death of Jean Moeri, head of the worker delegates to the International Labor Organization.

Moeri, a Swiss trade union leader, died on Apr. 30 after a brief illness at Chaux-de-Fonds, his native city in the watchmaking region of northwestern Switzerland. He was 67.

The Swiss worker delegate to the ILO since 1947, Moeri was chairman from 1960 until his death of the worker delegates at all ILO annual conferences, as well as in the governing body of the United Nation's agency.

A printer by trade, Moeri became head of the Chaux-de-Fonds local of the Swiss Typographers Union when he was only 26. He became secretary of his union in 1939 and was elected secretary of the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions in 1945. He held that post when he died.

In a telegram extending sympathy of the AFL-CIO to Mrs. Moeri on the loss of her husband, Meany said: "His friendship and leadership to free trade unionists everywhere and the honest statesmanship he brought to his tasks within the ILO and the labor movement of Switzerland will be deeply missed."

In a second message to Pres. Hermann Leuenberger of the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions, Meany said Moeri's "courage and brilliant" efforts on behalf of workers around the globe "are matters of record and inspiration for us all."

Retail Clerks Dedicate New Suffridge Building

The Retail Clerks have dedicated a glistening new headquarters in Washington to improving the lives of more than 600,000 members and adding to the union's rapidly-growing rolls.

RCIA Pres. James T. Housewright told an audience of 1,000 persons attending dedication ceremonies that the new Suffridge Building "symbolizes our strength and reflects our confidence in the future."

Describing the structure as a "functional tool" of the union, Housewright said "Our pride derives not from the fact we had enough money to build it but from the fact that we need it."

The union's 1967 convention, which authorized construction of the 11-story, white marble building, also designated its name to honor "unparalleled leadership."

James A. Suffridge, now RCIA president-emeritus, headed the union for 24 years before stepping down in 1968. He is an AFL-CIO vice president and a member of a number of federation committees.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who laid the cornerstone for the new building, said that the true test of a union, or any organization, is how well it serves its members.

By that measurement, he said, the RCIA "stands high." Through a steady growth of membership and the achievement of better wages and working conditions, "you have made a strong contribution to your communities and the nation," Meany declared.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz described the building and other unions' headquarters in Washington as proof that labor has "come of age" and is making achievements for society.

But new labor buildings, he added, also stand as a challenge. "Labor cannot rest on its oars," he said. "There's a lot more to do and it must continue to be an important part of society."

Mayor Walter E. Washington stressed that the building, located in one of Washington's main commercial areas, refutes those who do nothing but moan that cities are dying.

The RCIA, he noted, "has said to this city we believe in you" just as it participates in helping to resolve the many crucial problems that confront U.S. cities.

Suffridge thanked the union for honoring him but emphasized that the building is first and foremost a tribute to RCIA's members.

Musicians Help Sponsor National Jazz Festival

The American Federation of Musicians has agreed to help sponsor a two-day festival of collegiate jazz musicians, the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts announced.

The union will contribute the services of four nationally known jazz stars at the first National College Jazz Festival, scheduled for May 16-17 on the Champaign-Urbana campus of the University of Illinois.

The four are Cannonball Adderley, Benny Carter, Gerry Mulligan and Clark Terry. They will perform with student ensembles and join daytime workshops and seminars. The AFM will pick up the $2,000 tab for their services.

George London, artistic administrator of the center, whose new building is under construction on the Potomac River shore, made the announcement. He said the AFM's participation represents the first example of "official support and financial backing" by a union for an enterprise "involving university and professional musicians."

AFM Vice Pres. J. Martin Emerson, who helped negotiate the agreement, termed the project the union's "contribution to bringing star soloists into direct musical activity with young musicians in American universities."

Emerson added: "The National College Jazz Festival has all the ingredients that qualify it as an adjunct to the programs involving youth which AFM Pres. Herman Kenin has inaugurated." The union is "delighted," Emerson said, to be "associated in this way with the Kennedy Center."

The jazz festival will bring to the Illinois campus student performers, both individual players and groups, who were selected at regional tryouts.

Willis Conover, jazz authority who broadcasts Voice of America programs on an international network, will be master of ceremonies.

The Kennedy Center, due to open in September 1971, plans to invite the jazz festival to use its facilities annually.

Wallace, Brewer in Runoff:

Yarborough Loses in Fight For Renomination to Senate

Senate Labor Committee Chairman Ralph W. Yarborough lost out to a free-spending, conservative opponent in the Texas Democratic primary.

In other major primary battles, Republican Robert Taft, Jr. and Democrat Howard Metzenbaum won close victories in Ohio's senate race and George Wallace was forced into a runoff for governor in Alabama.

Yarborough, 61, was defeated by 88,000 votes in the Texas Democratic primary by Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr., a former congressman. Bentsen will oppose Republican Rep. George M. Bush, an easy victory in the GOP primary, for the senate seat in November.

A staunch, fighting liberal, Yarborough had the strong support of labor and minority-group members throughout his 13 years in the Senate. Bentsen, 49, represents the more conservative wing of the Democratic Party headed by former Gov. John Connally, with whom Yarborough has warred for years.

In Ohio, Taft was a narrow victor over Gov. James A. Rhodes in a senatorial primary which matched two of the state's biggest Republican vote-getters. In final but unofficial returns, Taft had 50.2 percent of the vote to 49.8 percent for Rhodes on a margin of only 3,195 votes out of 932,000.

Metzenbaum, 52, a liberal Cleveland businessman, upset former astronaut John Glenn by 12,446 votes for the Democratic nomination for the senate. Metzenbaum had a total of 427,294 votes to 414,848 for Glenn, or 50.7 percent of the vote to Glenn's 49.3 percent. Metzenbaum will oppose Taft in the general election for the seat being vacated by the retirement of 81-year-old Democratic Sen. Stephen M. Young, for whom Metzenbaum has served as campaign manager.

In the Ohio gubernatorial race, John Gilligan won handily in the Democratic primary, as did state auditor Roger Cloud in the GOP contest. Gilligan, a former congressman who lost his seat to Taft, was the 1968 Democratic nominee for the senate with strong labor backing. He defeated former congressman John J. Sweeney and former state Atty. Gen. Mark McElroy.

Cloud, 59, won over three candidates, including Rep. Donald E. Lukens, one of the present House's most conservative Republicans.

In Alabama, incumbent Gov. Albert Brewer held a slight lead over Wallace in the first primary to force a June 2 runoff between the two for the Democratic nomination for governor. Each had just over 40 percent of the vote while five other candidates split 18 percent of the vote.

Brewer, 41, had the endorsement of the Alabama AFL-CIO and the support of most of the state's 300,000 Negro voters in his race against Wallace, the 1968 third-party candidate for president who had counted on a return to the governor's seat to keep his "movement" alive for 1972. In his post-election comments, Wallace repeatedly mentioned the "bloc" vote, his code word for the Negro vote, as instrumental in Brewer's lead, indicating Wallace will attempt to identify Brewer with Alabama's blacks in the runoff—a strategy Wallace has used successfully before.

In other state primaries, all 11 of Indiana's incumbent congressmen won renomination. Rep. Ray Madden, a 78-year-old Democrat, had six opponents, including two Negroes, but won handily with about one-third of the total vote. Eleven incumbents were also renominated in North Carolina, only two with opposition.

In Ohio, Democratic Rep. Michael A. Feighan, a 28-year veteran of the House, was upset by James V. Stanton, the 38-year-old president of the Cleveland city council. State senator Charles J. Carney defeated 13 other Democrats for the nomination for the seat held by 83-year-old Michael J. Kirwan, who is retiring.

The defeat of Yarborough marked the second time in two years that the Senate has lost its Labor Committee chairman. Yarborough assumed the seat when Wayne Morse of Oregon was beaten in 1968.

The next Democrat behind Yarborough in seniority on the committee is Jennings Randolph of West Virgina, but he is also chairman of the Public Works Committee and might choose to retain that post when the 92nd Congress is formed. Next is Harrison A. Williams, Jr., of New Jersey, who has strong labor support in what is expected to be a tough re-election fight this year.

Should the Republicans capture the six seats necessary to take control of the Senate, the ranking GOP member of the Labor Committee is Jacob Javits of New York, who does not face re-election this year.

Yarborough, who was first elected to the Senate in 1958 and beat Bush handily in 1964, blamed his defeat on Bentsen's use of television in the closing days of the campaign. "They did a smart job," Yarborough was quoted as saying after the election. "They'd dredge up one thing and drum on it for three or four days, and by the time we'd swing into position to answer it, they'd immediately jump to something else."

In a flood of television ads which press estimates say may have cost over $1 million, Bentsen's strategy was to identify Yarborough with the rioting at the 1968 Democratic convention, and with disorder at last fall's Viet Nam Moratorium. The campaign also bore down on Yarborough's votes to reject both Clement F. Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court and his vote against a resolution to permit prayers in the public schools.

A heavy voter registration campaign had been completed in Texas by labor and other groups this year, especially among workers, Negro and Mexican-American groups. It resulted in registration of almost 4.2 million, a record for Texas.

But early reports indicate that the turnout didn't come up to expectations. The total vote was barely over 1.5 million and areas where Yarborough had been expected to run strongest proved disappointing.

Selden Urges Drive to Curb Injunctions

Teachers Pres. David Selden, just released from a New Jersey jail, announced the start of a national campaign by his union for state Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction laws barring court orders forbidding strikes by public employes.

"I went to jail to dramatize the injustice of making teachers and other public employes the only groups without the right to strike," said Selden at a Washington press conference.

As Selden spoke, the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes issued a protest against the manner in which teachers are "intimidated by many state and local governments."

It said public employes, many of them among the lowest-paid, are treated as second-class citizens when they try to bargain collectively. The council includes members of 19 unions.

The AFT president was arrested for picketing Newark, N.J., schools in spite of a court injunction. Released early for "good behavior," Selden received a citation of merit from the League for Industrial Democracy the next day, took part in a farm workers' march and began a series of "bread and water" receptions to raise money for his union's Militancy Fund and its anti-injunction campaign.

Selden reported bills to repeal anti-strike laws have been introduced in a number of state legislatures. Unions, he said, want the right to strike against public employers unless a strike would "adversely affect the health and safety" of the community involved.

Full Funding Pressed For Sewage Plants

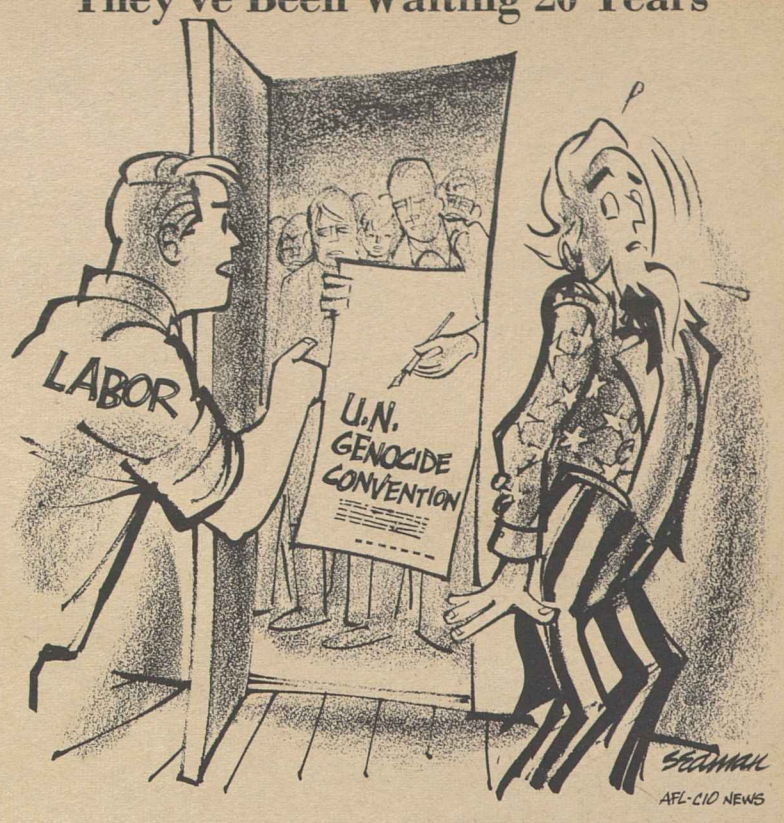
The AFL-CIO has called on Congress to back up America's determination to overcome pollution by fully funding a program to cleanse the nation's water through the construction of waste treatment plants.

In a letter to Chairman Allen J. Ellender (D-La.) of a House Appropriations subcommittee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller urged appropriation of the entire $1.2 billion authorized in fiscal 1971 for construction of such plants.

The money, called for by the Clean Water Restoration Act passed in 1966, "represents our major weapon in the national effort to clean up our water," Biemiller said.

He noted that last year, Congress appropriated $800 million for the program for fiscal 1970 when the law authorized $1 billion for the construction grants program.



The Administration sought only $214 million for the program.

"Clean water is an objective which all Americans can support," Biemiller declared. "It will not be able to attain that objective unless and until we resolve to make available the substantial sums of money needed to do the job."

He noted that the AFL-CIO supported the act when it was before Congress, and municipalities—partners in building the plants—also strongly support the program.

"The AFL-CIO hopes that this year—a year in which we have heard a great deal about pressing environmental issues—there will be no gap between the authorization figure and the appropriation," Biemiller concluded.

'They've Been Waiting 20 Years'

Negative Factors Cited In Women's 'Rights' Bid

The so-called Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution would destroy more rights for women than it would ever create, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller reiterated labor's long-standing opposition to the "essentially negative" amendment which has been debated and rejected by Congress over a period of 47 years.

In 1963, a Commission on the Status of Women created by Pres. Kennedy found that the Constitution "now embodies equality of rights for men and women" and that the amendment was not needed "to establish this principle."

In that same year, Congress passed the Equal Pay Act to prohibit the practice of paying women less than men for equal work, and in 1964 enacted the Civil Rights Act which forbids discrimination in employment on account of sex. Both measures were backed by labor.

It was thought that these developments put to rest any need for the amendment. However, the amendment now has been given a new push by Pres. Nixon's Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

In his testimony, Biemiller pointed out that the 1969 AFL-CIO convention continued labor's opposition to the amendment "because of its potentially destructive impact on women's labor legislation."

At the same time, the resolution re-emphasized the federation's support of women's employment rights. It called for full enforcement of the 1963 law and protection for women under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

"The labor movement," the resolution noted, "has historically promoted the interests of women through trade union objectives of raising wages, shortening working hours, promoting job security, and improving the conditions of work."

Biemiller reiterated the AFL-CIO's two principal objections to the Equal Rights Amendment:

One, it could destroy more rights than it creates by attempting to create equality through "sameness."

Two, the practical effect of the amendment could be to wipe out state labor standards on wages, hours and other conditions of employment that apply to women rather than to accomplish extension of coverage to men.

The amendment, Biemiller testified, creates no positive law in itself to combat discrimination against women.

On the other hand, he added, it would pave the way for "enemies of labor legislation" to speedily wipe out all forms of protections afforded specifically to women whether restrictive or not—minimum wage laws, rest periods, meal periods, seating requirements, and other provisions."

Nixon's Council on the Status of Women, Biemiller pointed out, was "unrepresentative" of any group "except business and professional women" and that it held no public hearings.

Loopholes In Tariff Blamed For Job Loss

executive branch and the Tariff Commission have been under way since 1967 "the operations of U.S. firms in foreign countries—with the utilization of this provision—have led to the export of about 100,000 or more American jobs in those years. Moreover, these exported jobs—generally lower-skilled assembly jobs—are precisely the kind of jobs that were needed at home for the long-term unemployed."

The statement pointed out the impact of the loopholes on imports from Mexico. Total imports under 807 went from $3.1 million in 1965 and $19.2 million in 1967 to $145.2 million in 1969.

In light of all the circumstances these inducements "to displace U.S. production and employment by expanding foreign assembly and processing operations should be repealed," the statement concluded.

USING A WHITE HOUSE MAP, Pres. Nixon briefs the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the role of U.S. forces in Cambodia. The council later endorsed AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's statement supporting the action as necessary "to protect American servicemen."

Current Policies Branded 'Failure'

By Saul Miller

A four-point program to "take America out of recession and end inflation" has been strongly urged by the AFL-CIO in face of the "complete failure" of the Administration's economic policies.

The federation's Executive Council declared that the Administration must abandon "its bankrupt economic policies before the already grave damage to American living standards snowballs."

The council statement containing this analysis and the recommended four-point program was personally handed to Pres. Nixon by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany when the President visited the council to explain his decision on Cambodia and brief the members on why the action was taken and how it was turning out.

Meany told a press conference that he described the statement to the President and asked him to read it and that the President promised to look it over very carefully. The AFL-CIO leader told reporters the following day that the Administration had called shortly after the President left to set up meetings with fedation economic experts on the issues raised.

The economic situation and developments in Viet Nam and Cambodia were major issues at the two-day spring sessions of the council in Washington.

The council voted overwhelmingly to support Meany's statement on Cambodia issued May 1 after Pres. Nixon's announcement of his decision to use U.S. forces against North Vietnamese sanctuaries in Cambodia. Meany said at the time that the President "made his decision on the basis of his clear obligation as commander-in-chief to protect American servicemen," and that "he should have the full support of the American people. He certainly has ours."

The AFL-CIO president told reporters the motion was adopted with three votes against and one abstention.

The council adopted a statement also calling on the Administration to act favorably and promptly on Israel's request for economic and military aid for its defense and preservation. (Story, Page 3.)

On domestic problems the council, in addition to the economic analysis, called for speedy Senate action on welfare reform legislation with strengthening amendments, and made clear its strong support for peaceful protest and its opposition to violence "either by protesters or against peaceful protest, at any time."

It adopted a resolution mourning the death of Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther and the loss of a "dedicated trade unionist" who made "significant and lasting contributions" to his union, collective bargaining, "the future of the American labor movement and to his country." It voted $5,000 for the memorial fund set up in memory of Reuther and his wife May who died with him in a plane crash, and sent nine of its members and two federation department heads to his funeral as its official representatives. (Story, this page.)

In its recession-fighting statement the council urged the following four-point program:

- Action by Congress directing the Federal Reserve system to establish selective credit controls, maximum interest rates on specific types of loans and "the allocation of available credit to where it will do the most good for America." The council noted the President's failure to use the authority on credit voted him last year by Congress.
- The requirement that a portion of tax-exempt funds such as pension, college endowment and foundation, as well as bank reserves, be invested in government-guaranteed mortgages to meet the 10-year housing goal of 26 million new and rehabilitated units.

Hawaii Allows Public Worker Right to Strike

Honolulu — Hawaii's legislature has passed a labor-backed collective bargaining law for public employes —unique in that it allows state and local government workers to strike if all other efforts to reach an agreement fail.

The only curb is on strikes that would endanger the public health.

The executive secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO, William Abbott, described the bill as "the most progressive public employment legislation ever passed in the United States."

It treats state and municipal workers as "first-class citizens," he said.

The legislation, sent to Gov. John A. Burns (D) for his signature, sets up 13 basic bargaining units, gives

Conference Theme:

Community Action Key to Social Gains

The trade union movement is mobilizing its trained community service experts to see that federal benefit programs labor helped enact are carried out at the local level.

More than 500 participants in the 15th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services committed themselves to this goal. The group included nearly 200 full-time community service staff experts from 132 cities, along with delegates from international and local unions, state and city central bodies, and representatives of social agencies.

Speakers at the four-day conference, which began with 7:30 a.m. breakfast meetings and continued through afternoon workshops and evening sessions until 10 p.m., included experts in social welfare legislation ranging from consumer protection to health, public welfare, food programs and social security.

The conference theme—that labor must help bring about the drastic changes needed in the nation's ideas and programs related to social welfare—was set by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland in a keynote address urging "a trade union answer" to current problems.

Kirkland said that organized labor is in a unique position to dissolve the "lines of hostility" drawn between opposing groups because "we are all the things that are in contention today . . . both black and white, old and young, poor and relatively affluent, producers and consumers." And, he added, "we are united . . . we uphold an ideal of brotherhood and a sense of belonging to a common cause, beyond ourselves."

AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis cited the dramatic growth of labor's community services since the first such committee was established 25 years ago. He called on those involved in community service around the nation to keep the movement growing. Top priority, he stressed, should go to making federal programs effective at the community level.

Perlis listed a five-point program toward this goal:

- Know the local organizational machinery.

Jobless Aid Bill Hit For Farm Exclusion

A last-ditch effort to bring farm workers under the unemployment insurance law was urged by the AFL-CIO as the Senate prepared to vote on a conference committee report expanding coverage, but excluding agricultural workers.

The Senate had amended a House-passed bill by adding some 275,000 farm workers—those on the 2 percent of the nation's farms that employ eight or more workers for at least 26 weeks.

But in a House-Senate conference committee set up to reconcile the two bills, the Senate participants agreed to drop all farm coverage.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all senators, urged that the conference report be rejected and that the Senate make a new effort to get the House to agree to cover farm workers.

The coverage proposed in the Senate version, Biemiller noted, "is indeed a very modest one and should be adopted."

The Administration, as well as the AFL-CIO, had urged unemployment insurance protection for farm workers.

The final version of the bill extends coverage to some 4.75 million non-farm workers and provides a federal-state program of extended benefits during periods of severe unemployment.

In another area, the AFL-CIO asked the Senate to eliminate three

Labor and Nation Join In Mourning Reuther

Walter P. Reuther was a "dedicated trade unionist who well and truly served his fellow man," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a message of sympathy on the death of the Auto Workers' president, his wife May and four other persons in a Michigan plane crash.

The council adopted a memorial resolution at its May meeting in Washington. Earlier AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called word of Reuther's death "tragic news" and praised the auto workers' leader as one who made a "unique and lasting contribution" to labor and the nation.

Meany recalled that he and Reuther "had disagreements, but we worked together as well . . . and it is the latter that stands out in my memory." The two men had headed the joint unity committee that brought the AFL and the CIO together in the 1955 merger.

"All of the labor movement will join in mourning his death and that of Mrs. Reuther," Meany said.

The Executive Council tribute hailed Reuther as "the last president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, a former vice president of the AFL-CIO, and our colleague on this council for more than a decade." It said Reuther "made significant and lasting contributions

MAIN STREET MARCH in Anderson, S.C., brings 400 members of Glass Bottle Blowers Local 15 out in force to protest antiunion attitude of the textile town's leaders, including the Anderson Independent & Daily Mail. For the third time in seven years, town fathers frustrated the union's offer to perform a public service. Its $345 check for the Anderson Senators, new town ball club, was returned with an excuse. The paper regularly misrepresents union attitudes, the local said.

Labor Dept. Approves Grant to 'Chicago Plan'

Chicago—"I think we have a winner here," Assistant Sec. of Labor Arnold R. Weber said after signing a Labor Dept. contract providing $449,112 to recruit Negroes and other minority group members into the construction industry under the "Chicago Plan."

The contract was signed at a meeting of the administrative committee of the Chicago Plan, Inc., a non-profit organization formed to carry out the January agreement between the Chicago Building Trades Council, the Chicago Building Construction Employers Association and the Coalition for United Community Action.

The plan was worked out by the city's construction unions, the coalition and the industry after lengthy negotiations. It was the first locally developed plan designed to expand minority employment in construction jobs and has the strong support of the AFL-CIO.

Robert McGlotten of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights assisted in the formulation of the plan and in negotiations with the Labor Dept. to secure the grant of federal funds.

"We all recognize this is a very auspicious beginning," Weber said. But he emphasized that it is "only a beginning. We now have to deliver on the various pledges that were incorporated in the Chicago Plan."

He said the Labor Dept. expects to continue to support Chicago's "home-grown" solution to the problem of minority employment in the building industry and foresees constructive results from the program.

Mayor Richard J. Daley is chairman of the Chicago Plan administrative committee which includes two representatives each from labor, employers and the coalition.

Money provided by the contract, first of its kind in the nation, will be used to set up administrative headquarters and four neighborhood recruitment centers. City Alderman Fred Hubbard, director of the Chicago Plan, said three of the recruitment centers will be located in black neighborhoods and one in the Spanish-speaking near north side.

Weber said that once the centers are in operation, and training opportunities have been developed among the various crafts, additional Manpower Administration funds can be made available to conduct individual construction trades training projects.

He announced a second contract, for $133,000, between the Labor Dept. and the coalition to provide funds for a staff and technical assistance to the administrative and operating committees.

The Chicago Plan offers 4,000 slots for minority workers as journeymen, apprentices, on-the-job trainees and pre-apprenticeship trainees if business conditions permit. A recruitment center for black journeymen was opened by the Building Trades Council and employers last September.

The four new centers will offer counseling and orientation to those recruited, including information on work opportunities in the 19 trades involved. Each trade will have an operations committee, which will keep staff members informed of new openings and the progress of those in training.

Senate Gives 94-0 Approval To Blackmun

Pres. Nixon succeeded on his third try in filling a Supreme Court seat that has been vacant for a year.

The Senate voted 94-0 to confirm the nomination of Judge Harry A. Blackmun, a 61-year-old Minnesotan whose record and reputation as an appellate court judge were praised by liberals and conservatives.

In endorsing the nomination, Meany said the AFL-CIO was "guided by the same standards and principles which led us to earlier oppose the nominations of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and Judge G. Harrold Carswell."

Unlike the two earlier candidates, Meany said, Blackmun is "a distinguished conservative, who has demonstrated his respect for the law and legal craftsmanship, who has not set himself against any group."

Blackmun will be the second Nixon appointee on the nine-member Supreme Court, joining Chief Justice Warren E. Burger. He will be the fifth sitting justice named by a Republican president. Three of President Eisenhower's appointees are currently on the court.

Union March Scores Hostile City Leaders

Anderson, S.C.—Union members staged a protest parade in this textile town to call public attention to the biased anti-union attitude of town businessmen and politicians.

Glass Bottle Blowers Local 15, which has nearly 2,000 members, marched down Main Street past the plant of the Anderson Independent & Daily Mail to "show the colors" and let the community's leaders know there's a day of reckoning.

The union was asked earlier this year to help give needed support to the new Anderson Senators baseball club, which has a working relationship with the Washington Senators. Local 15 members agreed to buy tickets and space on an advertising billboard at the ball park.

The ball club accepted the $345 check with thanks and cashed it. Later, however, it refunded the money with the explanation that space on the billboard had been "oversold." GBBA members got the message—its helping hand had been slapped away again by the town's anti-union powers.

Twice before the GBBA local's efforts to aid the community had met with hostility. In 1964 the Salvation Army accepted a $1,600 union contribution to help outfit a boys' club league, then returned the check "due to existing conditions." In 1966, women of the Local 15 auxiliary were barred from taking part in a community Christmas parade. The ladies hired a plane, hooked on a Merry Christmas banner and drew all eyes away from the parade.

Union members have let it be known they will not be treated as second-class citizens.

TUC Leader Dies, Mourned in U.S.

London—Condolences on behalf of the AFL-CIO were extended by Federation Pres. George Meany to the family and colleagues of Sir Tom O'Brien, past president of the Trades Union Congress who died at 69 after a long illness. O'Brien was a member of Parliament from 1945 to 1959 and since 1932 had been secretary-general of the National Association of Theatrical & Kine Employes, largest union in the British entertainment world.

Meany said in a message to the TUC that "for many years it was my privilege to be associated with" O'Brien in the international trade union movement "and to have enjoyed both the quality of his leadership and the pleasure of his company. We mourn his death. . . ."

Woodworkers Vote Per Capita Boost

Portland, Ore.—A 25-cent increase in monthly per capita payments has been approved in referendum balloting by members of the Woodworkers.

Effective on dues paid in June, the higher per capita will raise the international's monthly income to $1 per member. This is the first increase in the union's per capita payments in more than 20 years.

The increase was approved by a nearly 3 to 1 margin.

NLRB Spells Out Rule:

New Owner Bound By Existing Contract

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that when one company buys another and "continues its operations essentially unchanged," the existing labor-management contract remains in force and is binding on both the new management and the union that represents its employes.

The NLRB described the decision in a series of four cases as one "spelling out for the first time" the rights and responsibilities of employers and unions when a business is sold.

By majority vote the board set up guidelines based in part on a 1964 Supreme Court ruling in the Wiley v. Livingston case.

The newly-enunciated rule upheld arguments by the NLRB's general counsel and the AFL-CIO. It was applied in the four cases with these results:

- The William J. Burns Detective Agency was ordered to bargain with United Plant Guards Local 162, unaffiliated, on contract terms that Burns "inherited" from the Wackenhut Corp. when it succeeded the latter plant guard firm at the Lockheed Aircraft Service Co. plant at Ontario, Calif., Airport in 1967.

- Hackney Iron & Steel Co., Navasota, Tex., was ordered to restore all contract benefits which it may have unlawfully withheld from employes under a contract with Chemical Workers Local 773, unaffiliated, when Hackney bought a predecessor company in 1966. The contract expired in 1967 and the ICWU was decertified in 1969.

- The board dismissed a charge by Local 496 of the Sheet Metal Workers that Kota Division of Dura Corp., Vermillion, S.D., had refused to negotiate a new contract after buying the plant. Both sides are bound to observe the old contract, the NLRB said in noting that the case involved the "reverse side of the coin" from the other two cases.

- Also dismissed was a charge by two Hotel & Restaurant Employes local unions that Mission Valley Travelodge refused to bargain with them when new owners took over the hotel restaurant, bar and coffee shop in San Diego in 1967. The board said there was no true successorship in this case. Neither has there been "that degree of continuity" in ownership which would require the new management to honor the contract negotiated eight years earlier with a multi-employer group, it said.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown formed the majority in the four cases. Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., dissented in three cases but concurred in dismissing the Travelodge case.

The majority, quoting the labor law and the 1964 Supreme Court decision, said "in the normal case, we perceive no real inequity in requiring a successor-employer to take over his predecessor's collective bargaining agreement, for he stands in the shoes of his predecessor."

The new employer, it said, can make whatever adjustments are necessary in his negotiations with the former owner but "normally, employes cannot make a comparable adjustment. Their basic security is the collective bargaining agreement negotiated on their behalf."

The AFL-CIO in a brief filed a year ago when the NLRB sought arguments on the issue, cited reasons why an employer who takes over a business should be bound by the entire labor contract of his predecessor. And, the federation said, the incumbent union should also be bound by the terms of the contract.

Since that time one employer has appealed an NLRB ruling in a related dispute. The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, at New Orleans, dismissed an appeal by Zayre, Inc., operating a national chain of discount department stores. The court enforced an NLRB order that Zayre must bargain with Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Local 885 in Miami, Fla. Zayre bought the store and is bound by the NLRB's certification of the union as the legal representative of the employes, the court ruled. It rejected the company's contention that the bargaining unit was no longer appropriate.

Fire Union's Chief Hails New Era of Bargaining

Cambridge, Mass.—The give-and-take of collective bargaining is the best way yet devised to work out the wages and working conditions of government employes, Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters told graduates of the Harvard Trade Union program at commencement exercises.

For many years fire fighters were restricted to lobbying "hat in hand" for improvements at city halls and state houses but "this is the era of unionism and collective bargaining in the public sector" as well as private employment, McClennan said.

The change was accelerated with the signing of Pres. John F. Kennedy's executive order enabling federal employes' unions to gain exclusive recognition by vote of their members, he recalled. Pres. Nixon's order of 1969 broadened the process, he noted.

McClennan reminded his audience of the recent strike by postal employes. Saying "we have seen the President of the United States and the president of the AFL-CIO at the collective bargaining table, working out the terms of a postal pay scale by negotiation," he asked: "Who can deny that 'this is a whole new era of labor-management relations in every corner of the public sector' of the economy?"

McClennan quoted Meany as saying "employes of the government have exactly the same desires as do employes in the private sector. . . . We believe that collective bargaining can be, and should be, extended to all workers in the federal government."

McClennan endorsed the statement and added his own belief "that it will soon be extended totally also throughout state and local governments. It must be, for collective bargaining is the only way that makes sense and promotes justice in a democracy."

4-Point Plan Urged to Bolster Economy

Council Condemns 'Bankrupt' Policies

● Action to curtail the continuing high rate of business mergers, a major factor in the price-raising ability of "the dominant corporations."

● Examination of the specific causes of costs of doctors' fees, hospital charges, housing costs and auto insurance rates to develop "sensible measures to dampen these pressures" on living costs.

Meany told reporters that basically the Administration policies are not working in terms of checking inflation or rising unemployment and had brought the housing industry to a dead halt.

If the President, after exercising the authority already granted him by Congress on credit controls, determines that he needs additional authority to impose other restraints, the AFL-CIO will cooperate, the council said, "so long as such restraints are equitably placed on all costs and incomes. . . . We are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice."

The council pointed to the latest unemployment figures, stressing that since last December, 1.1 million workers have been "added to the swelling ranks of the unemployed—victims of the Administration's deliberate policy to slow production and employment."

Production cutbacks and reductions in working hours have further shrunk paychecks while living costs continue to rise at a yearly rate of 6 percent since December 1969, the council said.

Of Nixon's visit, Meany said he had invited the President to the next meeting of the council when the group went to the White House in March, and the President accepted the other day. Nixon did not ask the council to support his Cambodian policy. Meany told the press conference; he just wanted the opportunity to explain it.

In reply to a query, Meany noted he had personally endorsed the President's decision and his explanation that the action in Cambodia was necessary to assure continuing withdrawal of U.S. troops from Viet Nam and protect U.S. troops still there. Meany said he would be opposed to Nixon if he thought it was a deliberate policy to escalate the war.

In announcing the council action supporting the earlier statement, Meany said in reply to a reporter's query that those opposed were Vice Presidents Herman D. Kenin, Jerry Wurf and William Pollock. Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal abstained.

Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler said at a White House briefing after Pres. Nixon's visit with the council that the President reported the capture in Cambodia of 1,300 enemy prisoners, 4 million pounds of rice, 8.4 million rounds of small ammunition, 11,000 grenades, and 19,000 mortars and rockets.

At press conferences held during the council sessions Meany also sharply denounced the use of violence by anyone at any time—students, National Guardsmen, or construction workers.

He said the defeat of Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) in the recent primary, and results of other primary elections, demonstrated that "money plays a tremendous role" in American political campaigns, a reference to the estimated millions of dollars spent by Yarborough's opponent, Lloyd M. Bentsen, Jr.

He commented that the Auto Workers face a difficult negotiating situation this year, especially with the death of Reuther, but that it is a "good, solid union" and he hopes it will secure the program set up by the recent UAW convention. In previous years, he noted, Reuther "called the shots" in negotiations and did a "very fine job."

In other actions the council:

● Approved a program to plan for the expansion of the AFL-CIO headquarters building in September 1971 when the federation takes formal possession of the next-door Lafayette Hotel which it bought several years ago. Meany named a council building committee of Vice Presidents Peter T. Schoemann, chairman, Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge, Joseph D. Keenan and Paul Jennings.

● Set up a council subcommittee to coordinate the efforts of unions in the public employe field with the federation's Dept. of Legislation to carry out the program adopted by the last AFL-CIO convention. This calls for legislation at the federal, state and local levels to repeal repressive laws inhibiting the rights of public employes to organize and bargain collectively and to guarantee basic bargaining rights and procedures similar to those in private industry. Meany named Vice Presidents Matthew Guinan, chairman, Jerry Wurf, John F. Griner, Peter Fosco and David Sullivan to the committee.

● Approved a requested name change without changing jurisdiction from the International Brotherhood of Operative Potters to make it the International Brotherhood of Pottery and Allied Workers.

● Voted funds to support the Afro-Asian Institute run by Histadrut in Israel to train young trade union leaders in developing countries, the National Planning Association, the A. Philip Randolph Institute, Keep America Beautiful, and groups involved with the environmental control program.

The next meeting of the council was set for August 3-5 in Chicago.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL of AFL-CIO listens attentively as Pres. Nixon comments briefly on the nation's economy. A council resolution termed the Administration's economic policies a "complete failure," citing rising unemployment as well as continued price rises. Labor Sec. George P. Shultz accompanied the President to the council meeting.

'Violence Begets Violence'—Meany

The lesson of our times is that violence begets violence, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters.

Queried on his views about "construction workers beating peace protesters," Meany replied:

"I don't like anybody beating anybody up. I don't like students blocking traffic. I don't like students crashing the skulls of policemen. I don't like the National Guard shooting at students. I don't like construction workers or anyone else resorting to violence because in my book violence begets violence.

"And I certainly feel that construction workers are no more to be condemned than the students who resort to violence or anyone else who resorts to violence."

Suit Dismissed on Pressmen's Vote

A federal district judge has dismissed a Labor Dept. suit under the Landrum-Griffin Act challenging the conduct of a 1968 election for officers of the Printing Pressmen. The original complaint had been made by a group backing an opposition slate to the administration of the late Anthony J. DeAndrade.

Judge C. G. Neese ruled that the suit had not been brought in the manner prescribed by law and was filed later than the 60-day time period set by Congress for the Secretary of Labor to act on a complaint.

Although the 1968 election was for four-year terms, the Pressmen will be voting this May 27th in a special election to fill the unexpired term of the union president.

California AFL-CIO Appoints Economist

San Francisco—Paul S. Taylor, former chairman of the economics department at the University of California, Berkeley, has been named economist and research director of the California AFL-CIO.

In announcing the appointment, State AFL-CIO Exec. Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning noted that Taylor is a recognized authority on reclamation law and has done extensive research in the fields of farm labor and rural rehabilitation.

OCAW Strike Closes Rexall Drug Factory

St. Louis—A strike by 550 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Union has halted production and distribution of Rexall Drug Co. products here.

Pickets were set up about 4 a.m. May 11 after a 14-hour negotiating session failed to break a stalemate over contract terms, OCAW International Rep. Larry Langford said. The old 3-year contract held by OCAW Local 5-136 expired at midnight May 10.

Robert Gomsrud, federal mediator, said he would attempt to get the parties together for another meeting late this week.

Langford said the union is asking for a 55-cents-an-hour wage increase plus fringe benefits in a one-year contract. The company has offered 14 cents an hour in each year of a two-year pact. The present average wage scale of $3 an hour is about 75 cents below the average for manufacturing in the St. Louis area, Langford noted.

About 370 of the strikers are employed at the manufacturing center and about 180 at the warehouse. The manufacturing center is Rexall's only such plant in the United States. Items such as drugs and cosmetics are made at the center for distribution to Rexall's 10,000 franchised outlets across the nation. Langford said the retail stores probably would be feeling the effects of the strike shortly. A trucking industry strike that just ended left inventories at local stores depleted, he noted.

Senate Panel Prodded On Welfare Reform

Public welfare reform "cannot be delayed any longer," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement urging the Senate Finance Committee "to move speedily" on the legislation.

The council called on the Senate panel "to substantially improve" the bill passed by the House last month and to include "essential safeguards" against exploitation of welfare recipients in its employment provisions. (Text, Page 6.)

Early in the year, the council noted, it had urged Congress to launch "a bold new approach to public welfare geared to the needs and potentialities of millions of poor Americans."

The House, in mid-April, approved a family assistance bill based largely on Administration proposals. The bill provides federal subsidies to needy families headed by persons making low wages as well as to welfare families without a wage-earner.

It would replace the present program of Aid to Families with Dependent Children by a new system of family assistance allowances. The basic federal payment—in effect a floor under welfare payments — would be $500 a year for the each of the first two family members and $300 for each additional person. In addition, the federal government would pay 30 percent of additional state benefits up to the current poverty level. Adults able to work, except for mothers of pre-school children, would be required to register for jobs or training.

While the House bill "contains some desirable features," the Executive Council noted, it "does not begin to accomplish all that is needed."

Nevertheless, the council said, "we urged the House to pass the measure, despite its deficiencies, so that the Senate would have a vehicle for action."

In asking the Senate Finance Committee to send an improved bill to the floor, the council declared: "The absolute need for major reform of public welfare requires prompt action."

Leather Workers Sanctions Ended

Sanctions required under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes plan have been removed from the International Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany informed federation affiliates.

He said the union "has fulfilled in all respects" the procedures of Section 16 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution dealing with removal of sanctions imposed for non-compliance with determinations of the impartial umpire. The sanctions had been imposed in November 1968.

The union is now "entitled to full protection under the internal disputes plan as well as all other rights enjoyed by AFL-CIO affiliates in good standing," Meany said.

Unions remaining under sanctions required by Article XX of the constitution are the Air Line Pilots Association, National Maritime Union and the International Typographical Union.

Prompt Aid to Israel Urged as Imperative

The AFL-CIO called on the Administration to "act favorably and promptly" on providing Israel with economic aid and "the jets and other military equipment it so urgently needs for its defense and self-preservation."

The Executive Council said the economic and military aid for Israel is imperative "not merely for the sake of Israel but in the interest of preserving world peace and freedom." (Text, Page 6.)

The council adopted a statement which noted the "sharp turn for the worse" of the crisis in the Middle East and the course of the Soviet Union is abetting that crisis. The Soviets have used the big four negotiations solely for arming Nasser and the UAR "for an eventual war to destroy Israel" and have installed anti-aircraft missile sites run by Soviet personnel and "put hundreds of Soviet pilots into flying operational missions."

It would be harmful to America's national interests if the Administration "were to hesitate and continue its delay in providing" Israel with adequate aid, the council declared.

The AFL-CIO has consistently supported the Israeli bid for economic and military aid to help bring peace to the Mideast, in previous council and convention statements.

to the United Auto Workers, to the cause of collective bargaining, to the future of the American labor movement and to his country."

In adopting its statement the Council voted also to send a delegation of AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, eight vice presidents and two heads of AFL-CIO staff departments to the funeral services.

They are Presidents I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America, Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers, Paul Jenning of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Karl F. Feller of the Brewery Workers, Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, and Directors William L. Kircher of the Dept. of Organization and Donald Slaiman, Dept. of Civil Rights.

Reuther was 62, and his wife was 59. President of the UAW since 1946, he served also as CIO president from 1952 to merger; as an AFL-CIO vice president until 1967, and as head of its Industrial Union Dept. until 1968, when the UAW withdrew from the federation.

Abel, who succeeded Reuther as IUD president, said that as head of the department from 1955 to 1968 Reuther was "dedicated to advancing the best interests not only of working people but of the whole American public."

Calling his death "a tragedy for all of American labor," Abel said Reuther "gave to the IUD a sense of inspiration and mission that has become a major part of our trade union heritage and philosophy."

Three weeks ago UAW convention delegates returned Reuther for another two-year term as president with only token opposition. On his death, Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey became acting president to serve until the union's executive board fills the vacancy.

The Reuthers and four others died May 9 when a private plane crashed 250 miles north of Detroit, en route to Black Lake, Mich., where the UAW is building a summer camp and family education center. The others were William Wolfman, a nephew of Mrs. Reuther and a UAW security officer; Oskar Stonorov, Philadelphia architect; and two pilots, George Evans and Joseph Karrafa of Columbus, Ohio.

At Meany's request, the AFL-CIO canceled the Murray-Green award dinner scheduled for May 14 in Washington. Flags at federation headquarters were flown at half staff.

The family asked that no flowers be sent and said those who desire to do so may send contributions to the Walter and May Reuther Memorial Fund, 8000 E. Jefferson Ave., Detroit 48214.

A donation of $5,000 to the fund was voted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Survivors of the Reuthers include daughters Linda, who teaches in San Francisco, and Lisa, a student at Oakland University; also Reuther's mother, Mrs. Valentine Reuther, Wheeling, W. Va., a sister, Mrs. Eugene Richey of Reading, Mass., and brothers Theodore of Wheeling and Victor of Washington, D.C., director of the UAW's international affairs department.

Mrs. Reuther is survived also by her father, Frank Wolfman, and brothers Earl Wolfman and Leo Wolf, Detroit.

Funeral services for the Reuthers were scheduled for May 15, at the Ford Auditorium in Detroit.

A special memorial service for the Reuthers was to be held from 11 a.m. to noon on Friday, May 22, in the main nave of the Washington National Cathedral.

Tributes to the UAW leader came from labor, management and government figures. Pres. Nixon called Reuther's death "a deep loss not only for organized labor but also for the cause of collective bargaining and the entire American process."

Born in Wheeling, W. Va., Reuther left high school at 15 to work at the Wheeling Steel Co. Four years later, as a journeyman tool and diemaker, he left home for Detroit, where auto industry jobs seemed more attractive.

He worked briefly at Briggs Mfg. Co., then wangled a job despite his youth as a tool and die leader at Ford Motor Co. Reuther stayed at Ford seven years, meanwhile completing his high school education at night school and majoring in economics and socialogy at Wayne State University over a three year period.

Ford fired Reuther in 1933 for trying to organize a union. He and his brother Victor and Roy made a bicycle tour of Europe, worked 18 months in the Gorki auto plant in Russia, and returned to Detroit at the end of 1935.

Walter Reuther got another job in a tool and die plant and resumed his union organizing efforts. He helped found West Side Local 174 of the Auto Workers and was elected its first president. In May 1936, at the UAW's first convention as an AFL union, he was elected to the executive board. He became a UAW vice president in 1942 and president of the union in 1946.

Reuther was elected president of the former CIO on the death of Philip Murray in 1952, and held that post until merger with the AFL.

Stonorov, who designed UAW's Solidarity House headquarters in Detroit, was on the way with the Reuthers to inspect progress on the Black Lake education center on which the architect was working.

He was involved also in labor's pioneer efforts to provide housing for low-income families. In 1932 he was architect for the $1 million project sponsored by the Hosiery Workers in Philadelphia. In early New Deal days, he joined in helping to launch labor's first housing program under Title III of the Industrial Recovery Act.

16% Pay Hike Ends Strike at Sprague Plant

North Adams, Mass.—Nearly 2,600 employes of the Sprague Electric Co. will get a 16 percent wage increase under a strike-settling contract agreement reached by a three-union joint bargaining committee and management.

Members of the Technical Engineers, Machinists and Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers voted to end a 10-week strike and return to work with a three-year contract. The pact was agreed to after a 30-hour negotiating session at the Washington offices of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Contract terms call for wage boosts of 6 percent the first year, plus 5 percent in each of the succeeding two years. A 10-cent inequity boost will be added to wages in the first and third years.

Also agreed to was full arbitration of grievances and the agency shop, under which non-members pay the union a fee for representing them; a cost-of-living escalator clause, and hikes in pension, hospitalization, sickness and accident benefits.

Union negotiators were headed by Presidents Walter Wood of IUE Local 200, Ronald Durant of AFTE Local 101, and Fred Baker, Jr., of IAM Lodge 1794. James D. Compton, executive assistant to IUE Pres. Paul Jennings, was chairman of the joint union committee during mediation.

The strike began March 2 when AFTE members walked out. The other two unions respected the picket lines, and the IUE joined the strike March 17 after winning a challenge to its bargaining rights in a National Labor Relations Board election by a 4-1 margain. The loser in the vote was the Independent Condenser Workers Local 2, unaffiliated.

Meany Takes 18th Term In United Funds Post

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has been named to an 18th consecutive term as a vice chairman for the United Community Campaigns of America.

His appointment symbolizes labor's commitment to support of local United Funds through volunteer community work and fund-raising campaigns.

Farm Workers on the March

The United Farm Workers, their ranks strengthened by the presence of more than 1,000 other trade unionists, students and clergymen, marched 30 miles from Columbia, Md., to Washington to rally public support for their union and boycott of non-union grapes. Carrying U.S. flags, the "strike" banner familiar to Southwest workers and the Aztec eagle of UFWOC, the marchers followed the emblem of Our Lady of Guadalupe and pulled a 300-pound "freedom" bell donated by Britain's Transport & General Workers. The bell will remain chained, UFWOC leader Cesar Chavez says, until all farm workers are free to organize and bargain.

The Right of Protest

THE AMERICAN trade union movement firmly supports every aspect of the democratic process, and that especially includes the right of peaceful protest by any American citizen.

We are equally opposed to violence, either by protesters or against peaceful protest, at any time.

Protest is a legitimate form of democratic procedure. But violence, either on the part of protesters or against legitimate protesters, must be vigorously deplored by all responsible elements in America.

Family Assistance Bill

THE AFL-CIO has long supported the enactment of welfare reform legislation.

Last February we urged the Congress to launch "a bold new approach to public welfare geared to the needs and potentialities of millions of poor Americans."

Since then, the House has passed the "Family Assistance Bill" which, while it contains some desirable features, does not begin to accomplish all that is needed.

We urged the House to pass the measure, despite its deficiencies, so that the Senate would have a vehicle for action.

Now the Senate Finance Committee is considering this legislation. We urge the committee to move speedily to substantially improve the House-passed bill, and we specifically urge the committee to include essential safeguards in the bill's employment provisions.

The absolute need for major reform of public welfare requires prompt action. This is one measure that cannot be delayed any longer.

Prompt Aid for Israel

IN RECENT MONTHS the crisis in the Middle East has taken a sharp turn for the worse. The course pursued by the Soviet government in this pivotal area is today more perilous than ever to the maintenance of world peace.

Moscow has used the Big Four negotiations solely for gaining more time in which to encourage and arm Nasser and his partners for an eventual war to destroy the State of Israel. More recently, the USSR has installed in Egypt SAM III anti-aircraft missile sites run by Soviet personnel and put hundreds of Soviet pilots into flying operational missions.

As a result, Pres. Nixon has had to tell the world that "the situation has become ominous" and that "this will dramatically shift the balance of power and it would make it necessary for the United States to re-evaluate its decision with regard to the sale of jets to Israel."

In this situation, it would be harmful to America's vital national interests if the Administration were to hesitate and continue its delay in providing Israel with adequate economic assistance and the jets and other military equipment it so urgently needs for its defense and self-preservation.

We strongly urge the Administration to act favorably and promptly on Israel's economic and military needs and thus preserve the balance of power—not merely for the sake of Israel but in the interest of preserving world peace and freedom.

A Word Edgewise:

Academic Freedom the Loser If Professors Parrot Students

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE MOST APPALLING things about the contemporary academic environment is the number of faculty people who indicate their complete contempt for students.

Paradoxically, this does not take the form of denouncing the young for their eccentricities. On the contrary, it normally works itself out in slavish praise of the "wisdom," "virtue," "sincerity," etc. of the student body.

It is only human that most youngsters rather like this shmeer—it tickles their ego—but at the same time, it makes them uneasy because it insults their intelligence. After all, they know down inside they are not particularly wise and virtuous.

This is not said in a patronizing manner. It involves no inflated claims on behalf of older generations, which have not been notable for wisdom and virtue either. What it suggests is that all hands should put aside their moral posturings, drop the conceit that any one generation has been charged by God with the reform of humanity, and get down to the business of education, the core of which is intellectual interplay between generations.

My vocation is the teaching of history and politics. I am a man of very strong convictions—which, I hasten to add, may be mistaken. I believe and hope that I am correct, and experience over a quarter of a century has led me to think that my convictions are basically sound. But, and this is the crucial point, I would never dream of ramming them down a student's throat.

The opposite side of the coin is that my students have no right to tell me how to think.

Indeed, as I have pointed out to them more than once, if I changed my position because they disliked it, I would be an intellectual whore who should be dismissed summarily from the teaching profession. And any institutional efforts to force me to think "right" not only violate my freedom, but destroy the fundamental rationale of a university.

Take the question of a student strike over President Nixon's actions in Cambodia.

Students have a right to strike any time they feel like it—I led some reasonably successful strikes against war back in 1940-41—but colleges and universities should not get into the act. They are not sovereign states with their own foreign and domestic policies and it is outrageous when they start imposing a party line on their students and faculty.

When Andrew Cordier, the "Secretary of State" of Columbia University, gave the university's blessing to the student strike, he was endorsing a policy of coercion. Presumably the next step will be a faculty loyalty oath to "New Mobe."

NOW WE CAN anticipate a rush of "emergency faculty meetings" around the country as one institution after another lines up in behalf of "dissent."

The fact that university and college presidents act like lemmings is hardly surprising: their goal is survival.

With a few exceptions (notably Edward Levi at the University of Chicago) most of them would, I suspect, do anything to get the militants off their backs. This is par for the course: their response to Joe McCarthy was identical.

But when faculties solemnly meet to determine "truth"—and implicitly to excommunicate those who dissent from this microorthodoxy—they have confused themselves with the Inquisition. And the worst of it is that their actions are not based on the religious fanaticism which provided the Inquisition with its baleful energy, but on the desire to be loved by the young.

In short, they "dig it," and seem blithely unaware they are digging a grave for academic freedom.

Council Charges 'Complete Failure':

Administration Policies Bring Higher Prices, More Jobless

Excerpted from a statement on the national economy by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, May 12, 1970, Washington, D.C.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S campaign against inflation has been a complete failure. Prices have gone up, unemployment has grown, and the nation has crossed the threshold of recession.

The time has obviously come for the Administration to abandon its bankrupt economic policies before the already grave damage to American living standards snowballs.

In April, unemployment soared to 4.8 percent of the labor force or close to 4 million workers—equalling the sharpest month-to-month rise since the 1960 recession. The jobless rate for Negro workers shot up to 8.7 percent; for teenagers, to 15.7 percent. In the four months since last December, 1.1 million workers were added to the swelling ranks of the unemployed—victims of the Administration's deliberate policy to slow production and employment.

Millions of additional workers have seen their paychecks shrink as the spreading effects of the squeeze on the economy has brought production cutbacks and reductions in working hours.

But living costs have continued to mount. The Consumer Price Index has risen at a yearly rate of about 6 percent since December.

The buying power of the weekly after-tax earnings of the average non-supervisory worker in private employment—about 48 million wage and salary earners—is less than last year and below 1965.

With unemployment rising sharply and industry operating at merely 79.5 percent of its productive capacity, there is no classical inflationary condition of widespread shortages of goods and manpower that could justify government measures of severe, general economic restraint.

The Administration's policy—with the highest interest rates in 100 years—has been discriminatory, as well as ineffective, in combatting the rapid rise of prices. It has cut urgently needed residential construction—with housing starts down from a yearly rate of 1.9 million in January 1969 to 1.4 million last March. It has hit the expansion of state and local government facilities and smaller businesses. In addition, skyrocketing interest rates have raised costs and prices all along the line to the consumer—adding to inflationary pressures.

Moreover, the blunderbuss policy has not curbed business profiteering, while it boosts bank profits. Cuts in government appropriations, as those for medical schools which threaten to continue the shortage of medical personnel, will continue the soaring rise of medical costs. And the tight monetary squeeze has not curtailed the credit inflation of the banks, with their lines of credit to the blue-chip corporations and wealthy families for lendable funds.

THE TIME is long overdue for a sharp change in the nation's economic policies. The pace of rising prices must be slowed, without a growing army of unemployed. The urgent need is not last week's reduction of margin requirements for purchases in the stock markets to stimulate increased speculation.

The government must channel available credit, at low interest rates, to where it is needed and curb the inflationary expansion of credit for purposes that are less important to society.

Last December, Congress passed a bill entitled "Lowering Interest Rates, Fighting Inflation, Helping Small Business and Expanding the Mortgage Market"—which grants broad authority to the President for selective measures to curb the specific causes of credit inflation, while expanding credit for needed facilities and business operations. It provides the government with flexible means to re-balance the nation's credit structure and to finance housing, schools, hospitals and other community facilities at low interest rates.

More than four months have passed and still the President has not exercised this authority.

The need for increased low- and moderate-income home construction, at reasonable interest rates, is not being met, forcing the government to initiate interest-subsidy programs that reward high interest rate policies at taxpayers' expense, in order to prevent the complete collapse of home-building. Small and medium-sized businesses have been hit by a lack of available credit at reasonable interest rates. The inability of local governments to obtain low-interest loans is resulting in postponing construction of needed schools, hospitals and other facilities, while available credit is being drained off for less-urgent investments and dubious objectives.

So prices continue to rise rapidly; layoffs and production cutbacks are spreading; urgent social needs are not being met.

THEREFORE WE RECOMMEND the following steps to take America out of recession and end inflation:

1. Confronted by the President's failure to use his authority, we urge the Congress to direct the Federal Reserve system to establish selective credit controls, maximum interest rates on specific types of loans and the allocation of available credit to where it will do the most good for America.

2. To meet the goal of 26 million new and rehabilitated housing units in ten years, the government should also require that a portion of such tax-exempt funds as pension, college endowment and foundation funds, as well as bank reserves, be invested in government-guaranteed mortgages.

3. To curb the price-raising ability of the dominant corporations, government action is needed to curtail the continuing high rate of business mergers, which has been greatly increasing the concentration of economic power in a narrowing group of corporations and banks.

4. The specific causes of soaring pressures on living costs, such as physicians' fees, hospital charges, housing costs and auto insurance rates, should be examined for the development of practical, sensible measures to dampen these pressures.

If the President, after exercising that authority voted him by Congress, determines he needs additional authority and decides that the situation warrants extraordinary overall stabilization measures, the AFL-CIO will cooperate, so long as such restraints are equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries. We are prepared to sacrifice as much as anyone else, as long as anyone else, so long as there is equality of sacrifice.

Chavez Calls on Defense Dept. To Stop Buying 'Scab Grapes'

THE LEADER of the AFL-CIO's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee called on the Defense Dept. to stop buying "scab grapes" and urged a halt in government subsidies for growers fighting the right of farm workers to build a union and bargain collectively.

Cesar Chavez, UFWOC director, charged that the Defense Dept.'s stepped-up grape buying is more than a coincidence. "I think it is planned," he said in an interview on Labor News Conference.

Chavez said that "during those periods last year when the boycott was its most effective, the Defense Dept. assigned a buyer" who most often purchased grapes from the growers "who were feeling the most heat from the boycott."

HE SAID it is too early to tell whether or not the recent Farm Workers March on Washington "convinced" the Defense Dept. that it should stop buying "scab grapes, but it did demonstrate that union label grapes will be on the market soon, and those are the ones they should buy, if they feel a great need to buy grapes."

Chavez said the union is mounting a campaign to promote the sale of union label grapes. There may not be enough "to make a real impact on the market . . . in the beginning," he said, but "we have a strong feeling" that contracts will be signed with other table grape growers before the crop comes in.

The union leader was also critical of federal farm subsidies to table grape growers "who are fighting the union." He said that "in most cases, those growers who are the most reluctant to recognize a union are the ones that get the most money from the government."

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN THIS TIME of rapid movement of events and ideas, new words and terms are frequently devised because the old expressions are just not adequate.

This is true of an entirely new field which embraces the employment and retirement problems of middle-aged and older workers. It has been given the name industrial gerontology.

There is already a National Institute of Industrial Gerontology which is funded by a grant of the Dept. of Labor to the National Council on the Aging.

The director of the institute is Norman Sprague, who defines industrial gerontology as a "new applied science . . . of aging and work."

"Industrial gerontology begins where age in itself becomes a handicap to employment," he says. "Age discrimination in employment may start at 35 or 40 in some industries and occupations and begins to take on major dimensions at age 45."

Sprague's definition appears in the preface of a new book, "Toward an Industrial Gerontology" by Harold L. Sheppard of the W. E. Upjohn Institute for Economic Research. The book consists largely of a set of essays or papers which were presented at a 1968 seminar sponsored by the National Council on the Aging on industrial gerontology.

The participants in the conference were pioneers in the field long concerned with such problems as employment assistance for older workers, continued employment, pursuit of new skills, and, generally, all the barriers that workers find in relation to work as they grow older.

EVERYONE WHO WORKS for a living must be concerned about industrial gerontology since growing older is part of life.

Within the field of gerontology is a question that has been the subject of serious debate within the industrial community and within the labor movement—compulsory retirement. There are many advocates and many positions on this issue.

Sheppard, in his essay, suggests that "pre-retirement attitudes and preparations should be examined as possible influences on the work behavior of older workers."

He raises the question of whether it is not possible that under conditions of a general inflationary trend, for example, "older persons would want to work longer to replenish their eroded assets or to guard assets threatened by rising prices."

Sheppard develops other questions too.

For example, he notes that 20 to 30 years from now older workers may not actively seek the "release" from work to the same degree that workers do today. He points out that in higher-educated, white-collar and professional areas, the percentage of workers in their 70s in the labor force remains quite high.

"There is a great danger," Sheppard writes, "stemming from the fact that policies affecting the work-play-retirement patterns of future generations of the older population are grounded into today's and yesterday's factual situations—situations which may no longer prevail in future decades."

He observes that with the "process of aging" slowing down and the cultural stress on the prolongation of life, the trend toward early retirement may be reversed in some occupations.

This question, of course, is only one small but important facet of the study of industrial gerontology.

Among other areas it is concerned with aptitude testing of middle-aged and older workers, with job counseling, vocational training and placement. It also covers job assignments, reassignment, retention and redesign.

The Senate Special Committee on the Aging, in its recent hearings on "Economics of Aging—Toward a Full Share in Abundance" dug deeply into industrial gerontology.

It is a field that those who work for a living will be progressively more and more concerned with.

THE DEFENSE DEPT. should drop "scab grapes" from its shopping list, Dir. Cesar Chavez (center) of the AFL-CIO Farm Workers, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio.

Job Cuts 'Cool Off' Workers But Consumer Prices Stay Up

By Sidney Margolius

WHAT'S IT LIKE to be a "front-line fighter against inflation"—the man who is laid off because the Administration is tightening the economy in an effort to "cool off" inflation? Let this wife tell you:

"I'm not so worried that we were laid off as that my husband is not able to find temporary work. The job market is flooded with people. Many are older than my husband, who is 31, and have devoted half their life to a company that had to shut down.

"It seems like the only thing 'cooled off' is the working man who pays both the rich and poor man's taxes. I could stand price fixing a lot better than a depression. When Nixon cut all these people out of jobs you can imagine what it did to the bank and loan companies. Banks no longer lend money on cars in this town. My husband and I have had excellent credit for the last eight years. But now people can't help us.

"We've paid all these taxes and now all we can get is $45 a week unemployment. I feel this should be coupled with food stamps and medical care if one's children get sick."

It's true that the chief method the Nixon administration has tried to use to fight inflation has been to slow down economic activity, with the resultant layoffs. The Administration has not tried the "jawbone control" exerted by the previous Administration (public pressure on business to minimize price increases).

The layoffs have not succeeded in stopping inflation. Meanwhile, living costs have jumped 6.3 percent in the last 12 months. Food prices are a main culprit—up about 8 percent. Meat, poultry and fish have leaped 11.5 percent in one year.

THE FOOD INDUSTRY certainly could use some "jawboning." If the Administration won't do it, consumers may have to. Most of the increase in prices has gone to middlemen. You can figure that for every $1 extra you pay for food this year over last, the farmer is getting about 22 cents and the middlemen about 78 cents.

There is a real price holdup on some foods. At wholesale, bacon has gone up 6-7 cents a pound. But in the cities we checked in April bacon cost 10 to 15 cents a pound more in most stores.

Broilers actually should cost less this year. Wholesale prices are about 27½ cents, 2 cents a pound less than last year. But in many stores broilers, at their regular prices of 41-47 cents, are higher than last year.

But the worst holdup is on beef. Wholesale prices recently have been about 1½ cents a pound more than last year. while retail prices on various cuts are 5 to 15 cents more. Stores especially have been rooking the public on some of the preferred cuts like round, and have raised prices less on chuck. But even hamburger costs about 10 cents more than last year.

MAY IS A MONTH of White Sales (linens, towels, etc.). Sheets of polyester-cotton blends (about 50 per cent of each fiber) are increasingly popular because of their greater durability and crease-resistance (no ironing). The polyester blends now cost little more than the all-cotton type.

Look for tire sales just before Decoration Day.

May also is the month this year's models of TV sets are cleared. Look for especially sharp price cuts as makers try to unload current heavy inventories.

Besides 29-cent broilers, the buy of the month is eggs. They have come down more than 35 cents from last winter's high prices, and now are about the same price as a year ago. Other relative food values include sales of beef chuck and loin of pork, and canned and smoked hams and butts. But in general meat prices, and especially pork, are high and going even higher.

Lure of Magic Offers Hope Of Escaping Hard Decisions

By Jane Goodsell

THE OTHER DAY I went shopping for a ouija board which Molly, my 14-year-old daughter, wanted to give to a friend for her birthday. It wasn't easy to find. Store after store was sold out. But finally, I went to a department store which had one in stock. Feeling as self-conscious as I did a few years back when I asked for a copy of "Sex and the Single Girl," I felt compelled to explain to the clerk that I was buying it as a gift for someone else. Having established that, I asked her to explain how a ouija board worked.

"I know they've been around for years," I said, "but I must somehow have missed that phase in my youth."

The clerk showed me how to place my hands over the board, and to ask questions to which the message indicator would respond by moving.

"My goodness," I said, rather more impressed than I had intended to be, "does it really work?"

"Lady," the clerk answered, "if it really worked, it would cost more than $4.95."

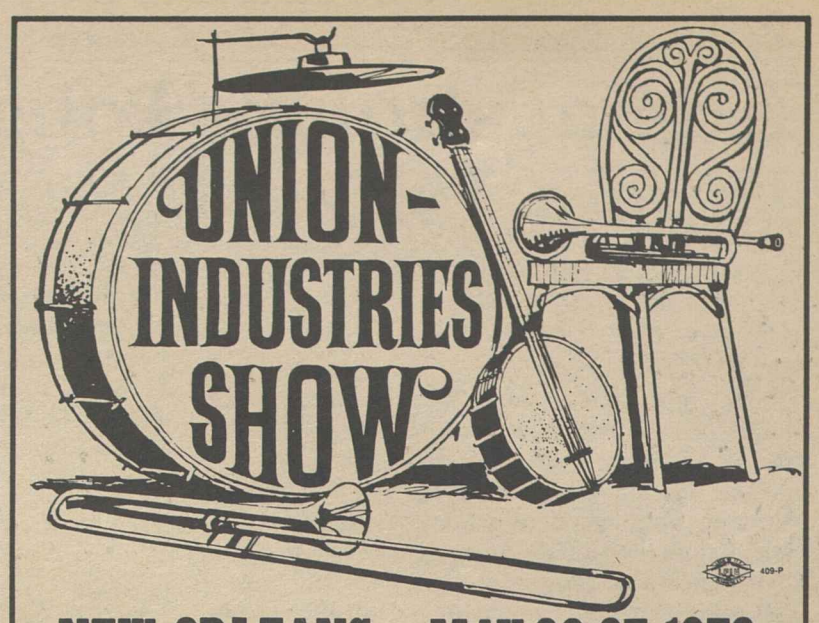
That struck me then as a good, logical, no-nonsense answer to the craze for the occult which has swept the world in the Age of Aquarius. It still seems to me a good, sensible answer, but I can't bring myself to accept it. Not quite. Of course, I don't really believe in ouija boards and Tarot cards and astrological horoscopes but, at the same time, I don't exactly not believe in them.



Way deep down, I instinctively believe in magic. I think most people do, sort of. It's what impels us to play it safe where superstitions are involved: to toss salt over our shoulders, to walk around rather than under ladders, and to think carefully before blowing out our birthday candles.

It's all nonsense, I know that. How preposterous to believe that a black cat crossing the street in front of us could change the course of our lives. How idiotic to think that the configuration of the planets has anything to do with our successes and failures. How childish to believe that the future can be predicted by the turning up of the Queen of Cups or the Tower of Destruction in a pack of Tarot cards.

IT WOULD BE FRIGHTENING to really, truly believe that our fates are written in the stars, and that we are merely acting out our destinies which are pre-determined, non-negotiable and non-cancellable. But it is just as scary, maybe more so, to believe the reverse: that we are captains of our fate and are, therefore, responsible for the choices we make in life. If the fault is not in the stars but in ourselves, we must accept the cause-and-effect relationships of our own actions.

But why is it that the occult has such allure for us now, in this scientific, mechanized, computerized age? How is that we seek answers from the stars at the same time that we send satellites into space? Perhaps that is precisely why. Because now, more than ever, we feel a need for magic and mystery.

Disenchanted by scientific evidence that the moon is neither made of green cheese nor inhabited by googly-eyed monsters, we look elsewhere to fill our need for fantasy. We need magic to persuade ourselves (or, as in my case, to half persuade ourselves) that there are some things in heaven and earth which can't be programmed by an IBM computer.

Union Project Aids Mental Health Goals

A MAN IS what he does. Most men derive their sense of status and self-worth from the contribution they make through work. When mental illness impairs the worker's ability to perform his job, his world—in the shop and at home—may fall apart. His employer may feel justified in firing him, his co-workers in spurning him, and his family relationships will deteriorate.

Recognition of this close relationship between "work" and mental health led one union to pioneer in one of the first mental health programs to emphasize the importance of the work environment.

The results from the five-year project by the New York Joint Board of the Clothing Workers are in: More than 600 union members have returned to or been maintained at productive work. "Normal living" was achieved by more than half the cases after as few as eight treatment sessions, or within three months.

The ACWA's mental health program is co-sponsored by the New York Clothing Manufacturers Association, financed in large part by federal grants, and operates from the Sidney Hillman Health Center.

Dr. Hyman J. Weiner, project director, said a "short-term, crisis oriented" approach was used in which the worker was interviewed, his problem uncovered and discussed, and a practical method sought to cope with it. Those helping the worker included the patient himself, his family and co-workers, the union's business agent, the employer, the psychiatrist and the social worker.

Emphasis was on what the worker could do, rather than on "defining" his illness. Therapy helped him test out different ways of dealing with conflicts on the job, such as controlling his anger. He was taught to stay with, not run away from conflicts.

"The inability to face conflict squarely generally leads to many difficulties," Dr. Weiner said. "Anger builds up and becomes directed either toward the other party or toward oneself."

THE IMPORTANCE of work as an avenue for identifying the ill is illustrated by some typical referrals:

- A skilled, stable worker lost his fifth job in a year because of a fight in the shop. His recent employment instability was diagnosed at the Center as a type of mental illness.
- A consistently late-to-work union member was helped over his alcoholism problem.
- Personal and family problems caused numerous other emotional problems in workers which were reflected in their poor or erratic job performance.

The clinic maintained an open door, with any worker in the industry or member of his immediate family eligible for free treatment. While work-connected problems received staff priority, walk-in and in-patient care were provide those with other emotional problems through an agreement with three New York hospitals.

The Amalgamated Insurance Fund relieved workers' financial pressures. Jobs were found for workers requiring them through the union's job-placement service.

The project's results—analysis of experiences with patients and new treatment techniques—will be available shortly to central labor bodies, unions, community health facilities, consumer-sponsored health programs and government agencies. Meanwhile, a report based on a Labor-Mental Health Conference is available from the Sidney Hillman Health Center, 16 East 16th St., New York, N.Y. 10003.

Services to Match Growth:

State-County Delegates Vote Dues Hike, Bigger Program

By John R. Oravec

Denver—The State, County & Municipal Employes—stressing programs to keep pace with the union's rapid membership growth—expanded the union's executive board to 20 vice presidents and voted to boost its per capita tax by 50 cents to $1.50 a month.

Delegates to the 18th biennial convention reaffirmed their support for the adoption of a national health insurance program and called for enactment of a federally financed welfare system that would guarantee every American family an income at no less than the poverty level. They passed also a resolution calling for an "immediate and total withdrawal of U.S. armed forces" from Southeast Asia.

Another resolution eliminated the "no strike" provision in the SCME constitution that applied to law enforcement officers among its membership. SCME represents about 10,000 policemen across the country.

Action on the per capita tax increase will boost payments from $1 a month per member to $1.50 in two steps of 25 cents each. The first raise will come July 1 and the other will be effective next Jan. 1.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph L. Ames reported that because of expanding operations and rising costs, the union's budget had to be enlarged and a per capita increase was recommended to meet the higher costs.

The three new seats on the expanded executive board are the result of a constitutional amendment that creates a new Capital District—taking in Maryland, Delaware, Virginia and the District of Columbia—and adding a new vice president both to the Michigan and New York City districts.

Seven board members were re-elected, six of these without opposition. Six other board members were defeated. One seat was vacant, two members retired at the convention and another earlier.

The 13 new vice presidents are Robert Oberbeck, Wisconsin; Ira A. Bickel, Central; Saturnin G. Mauge, Caribbean; Larry McKibben, Northwestern; Jerol Brown, Western; Dominic Badolato, Southern New England; James V. Corbett and Joe Zurlo, New York City; Charles Hendrix, Mideastern; George Hammond, Rocky Mountain; Ernie Crofoot, Capital, and Walter L. Oliver and Mozelle McNorriell, Michigan.

Re-elected without opposition were the Rev. Albert Blatz, North Central; James A. Broyer, Northern New England; Constance Cabell, New York State; Arthur O. Hamm, Midwestern; Victor C. Solito, Southwestern, and Earl Stout, Eastern. Incumbent Lee A. Tafel of the Southeastern District defeated Ed Prata to win re-election.

Pres. Jerry Wurf and Sec.-Treas. Ames were re-elected earlier in the convention by acclamation.

Speakers addressing the convention included Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.), chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, who warned against underfunding and shortchanging of essential domestic programs.

On major domestic issues, the convention called for improved food distribution programs for America's hungry and undernourished. It urged lower eligibility standards for food stamps, free school lunches and guaranteed income.

The convention also urged improved federal consumer protection programs, called for Congress and the President to take action to roll back high interest rates, and recommended immediate steps to halt pollution of air and water.

The resolution on Southeast Asia charged that "adequate expenditures for sorely needed domestic development programs—programs of housing, food for the hungry, education, manpower training, pollution prevention, model cities, medical care and research—are being precluded by the costs of warfare. . . ."

Delegates also called for SCME to step up its organizing drive to win representation for the white collar workers, noting that only about 12 percent of this group is now unionized.

Pres. David Selden of the Teachers, who was recently released from a New Jersey jail where he had been sentenced for picketing in the Newark school strike, expressed concern for the lack of full union rights for teachers and other public employes.

He said that the United States is the only democratic country in the world that does not allow its public employes "to stop work, to exercise their economic power in order to achieve their programs."

"Teachers in most of the major cities of the nation can carry on what is called collective bargaining, but there can be no collective bargaining without the right to strike," he declared.

Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.), a former business agent for SCME Local 410 in St. Louis, warned that America will suffer severe consequences if it ignores the need for change.

"Unless the need for change is recognized by the decision makers of this country, I am afraid that the revolution begun by the young will be embraced by the old," he declared.

YOUNGEST SPEAKER at Minnesota State AFL-CIO's recent conference on pollution was Bill Stelberg, a 6th grader at Ensign Elementary School in Duluth. Bill told the statewide conference that he became interested in pollution problems as a result of a school project. His father, Herbert Stelberg, is a member of Local 1028 of the Steelworkers. State AFL-CIO Pres. David K. Roe is shown seated.

Haggerty Hits Failure Of Anti-Inflation Policy

New York—The Administration's anti-inflation policies have made a shambles of the housing industry and the worst is yet to come, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told the annual luncheon of the New York Building Congress, an employers' group.

Land costs and interest rates rise so high as to price low and middle-income families out of buying housing, Haggerty charged, and the homebuilding industry is producing at a rate less than half the 2.6 million-a-year goal envisioned by Congress two years ago, the speaker said.

Meanwhile, he said, "we continually are assured that soon we will have industrialized housing coming off the assembly lines like automobiles. They will be cheaper because of factory wages. They will go up real fast and the crisis will be over." But, he added, "I don't believe the solution will be that simple."

Haggerty cited a horrible example under the year-old program called Project Breakthrough by Sec. of Housing & Urban Development George W. Romney.

HUD has awarded two contracts totaling $599,000 to Christiana Western Structures of Los Angeles, Calif., one of 22 producers of factory-built housing systems selected by the department to build prototype house models on Operation Breakthrough sites in 10 states, Haggerty related.

The firm's manpower training program, he said, is keyed to extremely low wages subsidized by the government under the guise of training.

Haggerty called the project "one of the most flagrant corporate boondoggles in history." It could, he said, turn out to be a "prefabricated bombshell."

He recalled that Romney described Operation Breakthrough as a way to "break through to total new systems of housing production, financing, marketing, management and land use" and to seek solutions to "restrictive zoning and building codes . . . and inefficient use of labor forces."

Under a contract awarded by HUD to Christiana to build housing in panels at Blythe, Calif., Haggerty said the workers to be trained are paid $2 an hour but the company is reimbursed an average of $12.84 a day. Thus the company has a labor cost of $3.16 a day per trainee.

"The completion certificate states that the recipient of training is not eligible for employment in any construction trade, nor is he eligible to be an apprentice in any such trade," Haggerty said, adding: "So what are they being trained for?"

He called it "inconceivable" that the government would "condone this, let alone finance it and then select them . . . to set up the prototype" of the future.

New Hawaii Law Allows Public Employe Strikes

exclusive bargaining rights to unions representing the employes, allows negotiations for an agency shop, and sets up a five-member Hawaii Public Employment Relations Board.

The board, made up of two labor and two management representatives with an impartial chairman, will enforce a code of unfair practices, establish procedures for representation elections, and seek to resolve disputes.

Procedures designed to avert strikes are provided, including mediation, fact-finding with recommendations, and voluntary arbitration if both parties agree. The measure also requires a 60-day negotiation and "cooling-off" period after a fact-finding panel reports and a 10-day notice of intent to strike.

But when the procedures are exhausted, strikes are legal provided the public health is not endangered. The determination of when a strike threatens health will be made by the five-member public employment relations board, which then would have leeway to limit the extent of the strike or take other steps to resolve the dispute.

Bargaining units include such categories as non-supervisory blue-collar workers, supervisory blue-collar workers, a similar division of white-collar workers, professional and non-professional hospital workers, police, firefighters, teachers, educational office employes, the faculty of the University of Hawaii and non-teaching employes of the university.

Professional units may, if they wish, choose to be included in larger bargaining units embracing other groups of workers.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Walter Kupau set the stage for the successful legislative drive by bringing together all unions in the state to work out a joint program. The state federation said two representatives of the Teachers, James Crane and David Oshige, had major roles in the legislative campaign.

State Sen. Sakae Takahashi, chairman of the Public Employment Committee, introduced the bill and State Rep. Ted. T. Morioka helped steer it through the House.

If signed by the governor, the new law will take effect July 1.

Hawaii Praises Maritime Parley

Honolulu—The Hawaii legislature has passed a resolution commending maritime labor and management "for their concern for the well-being of Hawaii."

Singled out in the resolution were the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the Transportation Institute, an industry supported research organization, for their joint sponsorship of a recent conference in Washington.

Out of the conference came a pledge by the MTD and the institute to draw up a program to deal with any impact that shipping costs may be having on the economies of Hawaii, Alaska and Puerto Rico.

High Court to Review Federal No-Strike Oath

The Supreme Court agreed to take another look at a law requiring federal employes to swear that they will not assert the right to strike.

The court consented, at the request of the Justice Dept., to review a District of Columbia federal court ruling that the law is unconstitutional.

That decision was reached by Senior Circuit Judge Charles Fahy and District Judges Howard F. Corcoran and Gerhard A. Gesell. The case was initiated by the Letter Carriers in a suit against the Post Office Dept. The union contended that those portions of the law prohibiting employes from asserting the right to strike, or belonging to a union that asserts the right to strike against the government, violate the Constitution.

The judges ruled that the oath, required of government employes as a condition of employment, could have a "chilling" effect on the rights of free speech and petition guaranteed to all citizens under the Constitution.

The law bars from federal employment anyone who asserts the right to strike, who is a member of a union that asserts such a right, or who participates in a strike against the government. The Letter Carriers, for the purposes of the lawsuit, concede that Congress may prohibit government employes from striking, but challenge the other two points.

In suing, the union said it supports the "right of postal employes, along with other federal employes, to strike." The Justice Dept. defended the law and the oath on the ground that they were aimed, not against asserting the right to strike but against "overt action" in a strike.

The suit was filed before recent postal walkouts for higher wages.

Esther Peterson Gets Honorary Laws Degree

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Esther Peterson, former assistant Secretary of Labor, was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree at the University of Michigan commencement exercises.

Mrs. Peterson, now the legislative representative for the Clothing Workers, was cited for "firmly and courageously" espousing the cause of "persons otherwise feebly defended"—the laborer, the housewife and the working woman.

HILLMAN FOUNDATION award is presented to William J. Eaton of the Chicago Daily News for stories exposing conflict of interest which helped defeat the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr. Making the presentation is Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, the union Sidney Hillman helped found. At left is Harrison Salisbury of the New York Times, one of the award judges. Eaton also won a Pulitzer Prize for the series of articles.

Crosses 'Threshold of Recession':

Jobless Rate Soars to 4.8%, Highest Level in Five Years

By Duane Emme

The nation's unemployment rate rose for the fourth consecutive month in April to reach 4.8 percent —its highest level in five years, the Labor Dept. reported.

The increase of four-tenths of 1 percent from March equals the January increase as the sharpest one-month spurt in unemployment since the 1960 recession.

Bureau of Labor Statistics' records show that the rise in the rate so far this year—1.3 percent—is the steepest for a four-month period since the severe 1958 recession.

On the jobs side, with total employment of 78.9 million unchanged from March, a BLS spokesman described the situation as one in which new employment gains "have come to a virtual standstill."

Other areas of the government's April report showed reduced hours of work and overtime and pay increases for workers that were more than wiped out by inflation.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany cited the latest report as proof that the economy had "crossed the threshold of recession." He called for "prompt, effective sensible action by the White House" to prevent the situation from getting worse.

Meany's comments on the unemployment report came a few days before the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged a four-point program to combat both recession and inflation. Meany said that the "shocking rise" in joblessness "while living costs continue to mount rapidly clearly indicates the failure of the Administration's economic policies."

In addition to the nearly 4 million workers unemployed in April, Meany pointed out, "Millions of others are affected by production cutbacks and smaller paychecks at a time when everything costs them more."

During a televised press conference, Pres. Nixon described the rising unemployment rate as evidence of "the cooling off of the economy" in the fight against inflation.

He noted that the April rate was still below levels of 1961 to 1965, but did not mention its subsequent decline to 3.3 percent in January 1969, when he took office.

BLS said the number of unemployed persons, which usually drops significantly in April, declined much less than usual. After seasonal adjustment, unemployment was up 300,000 to 3.9 million.

Since December, unemployment has risen by 1.1 million. Although both full- and part-time jobless rates have risen since then, the increase has been substantially greater among full-time workers. In April, nearly all of the increase occurred among full-time workers, with their rate going from 4 to 4.4 percent.

The unemployment rate for adult men rose from 2.9 to 3.2 percent in April. The rate for adult women was virtually unchanged at 4.4 percent. However, both rates have risen steadily since the beginning of 1970.

The jobless rate for teenagers, which had been holding steady in recent months, shot up from 13.9 to 15.7 percent in April. As a result, a department official predicted youths would find it difficult to get jobs this summer.

Also, a sharp increase in unemployment was reported among Negroes in April, with their jobless rate going from 7.1 to 8.7 percent. The rate among whites rose from 4.1 to 4.3 percent. Thus, the joblessness among Negroes and whites was at the 2-to-1 ratio that has prevailed for several years.

Among occupation groups, the unemployment rate for blue collar workers rose from 5.2 to 5.7 percent, up by 1.1 percent since the first of the year. The rate for white collar workers went from 2.7 to 2.9 percent. It is up eight-tenths of 1 percent since January.

Although the only significant rate increases on an industry basis occurred in trade and transportation, these were the only industries that had not experienced steady increases in joblessness in recent months.

Short-term unemployment of less than five weeks duration rose by 300,000 in April to 2.3 million, its highest level since the government began recording this category in 1948. The number of workers unemployed 15 weeks or more was unchanged in April at 575,000.

On the jobs side, non-farm payroll employment in April was 75.3 million seasonally adjusted, down about 24,000 from March. However, BLS attributed most of the decline to strike activity.

Employment in manufacturing declined by 145,000 seasonally adjusted between March and April and jobs in construction dropped by 65,000. These drops were mostly offset by increases in employment in government, trade, services and finance, insurance and real estate.

In another area, the Labor Dept. said that the average workweek for rank-and-file workers was unchanged in April at 37.4 hours seasonally adjusted. The figure was four-tenths of an hour below levels of last fall.

Factory overtime continued its downward trend of recent months, falling by one-tenth of 1 hour to 3 hours in April. Since the high reached in January 1969, factory overtime has steadily dropped to its lowest point in six years.

Average weekly earnings, before taxes, were virtually unchanged at $117.98 in April for production and nonsupervisory workers. BLS noted that while these earnings were up 5.6 percent for the year ending in March, they were actually down four-tenths of 1 percent when adjusted for price changes.

Canadians Narrow Factory Wage Gap

Ottawa—Wages paid workers in manufacturing, metal mining and construction increased at a greater rate in Canada than in the United States in the 1950s and 1960s, according to a Canadian Dept. of Labor study.

As a result, the differential between higher U.S. wages and those paid in Canada in the three categories narrowed over the two decades even when adjusted for Canada's greater rate of inflation.

For all employment, however, the differential increased when the price changes were considered, the study showed.

The study, "Wages in Canada & the United States," found that the differential in manufacturing, adjusted for living costs, dropped from a 38.3 to a 26.3 percent margin for the United States between 1949 and 1967.

In metal mining, the adjusted margin dropped from 19.8 to 16.6 percent over the 18 years. The decline in the margin in construction was from 65.7 to 59.4 percent between 1949 and 1965. Data up to 1967 in construction were not available, the study said.

The study centered chiefly on changes in wages in manufacturing in the two nations, with 15 industries being scrutinized over the 1949-1965 period.

Out of that section of its study, the department said, "two notable features emerged":

'Notable' Features

"In no instance was there an increase in the U.S. margin over the comparable Canadian wage; and there was a wide variation, from one manufacturing industry to another, in the extent to which the gap was closed."

The greatest narrowing of the gap was found in printing and publishing, where the U.S. margin was reduced by 23.6 percent. The smallest reduction, 4 percent, was in tobacco. The average reduction in the margin in the 15 industries was 15 percent.

The study said that "it would be tempting to surmise that the improvement of Canadian manufacturing labor income relative to that in the United States is a result of the 'maturing' of our manufacturing industries."

Further, it speculated that an expansion of domestic markets for goods, increased exports, enlarged production facilities and greater efficiency contributed to the improvement.

"However," it concluded, "it is not the purpose of this study to examine all the factors necessary to test this hypothesis."

Teachers Vote To End Strike In Los Angeles

Los Angeles — Public school teachers ended a one-month strike and returned to their classrooms after voting to accept a 5 percent pay increase and other benefits in a first contract.

The vote in Shrine Auditorium was 6,702-2,070 in favor of accepting the Board of Education's "final" offer to settle a walkout that started Apr. 13.

Earlier, members of the United Teachers had called for a 7 percent pay raise and other improvements. This was the compromise proposed by Mediator Benjamin Aaron of the University of California at Los Angeles labor school. School officials rejected it, however, as beyond the school district's means.

The final offer included recognition of the United Teachers as bargaining agent for 25,000 school employes and a grievance procedure with binding arbitration on contract disputes only. All other differences will be submitted to the School Board for its decision.

Before the balloting, the United Teachers offered to give up any salary increase if the money, estimated at $18 million, were used for school improvements and smaller class sizes. School Superintendent Robert Kelly said he doubts this could be done legally.

The United Teachers was formed Feb. 1 by a merger of Local 1021, American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, and the Association of Classroom Teachers, affiliated with the National Education Association.

Study Shows Average Compensation Rose 13.1% Between '66 and '68

Total compensation for American workers in private industry averaged $3.89 an hour in 1968, up 13.1 percent or 45 cents an hour from 1966, the Labor Dept. reported.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, in issuing the results of its second biennial study of compensation in the entire private non-farm sector of the economy, noted that the term compensation covers more than wages for working time.

It also includes pay for vacations, holidays and other leave, and expenditures by employers to finance a wide range of insurance and welfare programs for employes.

Wages alone—accounting for 82.8 percent of total compensation—averaged $3.22 per hour of work time in 1968, about 13 percent above its 1966 level.

Employer expenditures for retirement programs—making up 6 percent of total compensation and its second largest element—averaged 24 cents an hour, up four cents from 1966. This rise was divided between social security, which accounted for 54 percent of total retirement program expenditures and private pension plans.

Pay for leave time—except sick leave—moved up 16.7 percent from its 1966 level to 21 cents for a work hour in 1968. Leave time pay accounted for 5.3 percent of the compensation package.

Employer expenditures for health and insurance programs (life, accident and health insurance, sick leave and workmen's compensation) averaged 15 cents a working hour for an employe in 1968, an increase of 25 percent over two years. These expenditures amounted to 3.7 percent of compensation.

Other elements of compensation were employers' expenditures for unemployment benefit programs, averaging 4 cents per hour of work in 1968; nonproduction bonuses, also averaging 4 cents; and savings and thrift plans, averaging 1 cent.

Total compensation for workers in manufacturing averaged $4.21 an hour, exceeding the 1966 average by 12 percent or 45 cents. Compensation in nonmanufacturing was $3.70, up 14.6 percent or 47 cents.

Pay for working time in manufacturing was $3.41 an hour, up 11 percent or 34 cents over two years. In non-manufacturing pay for working time was $3.11 an hour, 15 percent or 40 cents higher than in 1966.

In manufacturing, retirement expenditure averaged 27 cents an hour per worker or 6.3 percent of total compensation, leave time expenditures were 26 cents an hour or 6.2 percent, and contributions for health and insurance benefits were 18 cents or 4.2 percent of the total.

In non-manufacturing, expenditures were 22 cents a work hour or 5.9 percent for retirement benefits, 18 cents an hour or 4.7 percent for leave time and 13 cents an hour or 3.4 percent for health-insurance programs.

BLS also reported that total compensation for office workers in 1968, at $5.01 per work hour, rose by 11.1 percent or 40 cents from 1966. By definition, office workers included primarily clerical employes but also executive, administrative and professional employes.

For non-office workers the average total compensation in 1968 was $3.38 per work hour, 13.4 percent or 40 cents more than it was in 1966. The non-office category includes employes in manufacturing, production, construction, maintenance or custodial work, operating vehicles, and retail sales work.

About four-fifths of the advancement made by the two groups over the periods, BLS said, was due to pay gains for working time amounting to $4.08 an hour for office workers and $2.82 for non-office workers.

Jobless Aid Bill Hit For Farm Exclusion

anti-civil rights restrictions that the House wrote into the appropriations bill funding aid to education programs for the fiscal year starting July 1.

Two of the legislative restrictions, Biemiller charged, "are designed to create administrative confusion in school desegregation programs. The third and worst," he said, "would require use of the so-called freedom-of-choice technique" in school desegregation and would "fly in the face of decisions of the courts, including the Supreme Court."

Biemiller also urged the Senate to boost appropriations for education programs to "more adequate levels," closer to the amount that Congress authorized to be spent for these programs.

In other congressional action:

● The House Post Office & Civil Service Committee altered important sections of the postal reorganization, pay and collective bargaining agreement worked out by the seven postal unions with exclusive national bargaining rights and the Administration.

After having adopted extensive amendments to the bill, including weakening of some of the bargaining provisions, it defeated by a tie vote a union-supported motion to restore most of the provisions of the original legislation.

The Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, meanwhile, is also working on the legislation, without waiting on the House to complete action. One provision of the House bill would make the effective date of the promised 8 percent postal pay raise retroactive to Apr. 15 as a protection against delays in final congressional action.

● The Senate voted 78-3 approval of a bill that unions, railroads and the Administration agreed offers hope of salvaging inter-city rail passenger service.

The legislation, steered to passage by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), would establish a semi-public National Rail Passenger Corp. to operate a "basic national rail passenger system" of inter-city trains as determined by the Sec. of Transportation.

Railroads refusing to enter into a contract with the corporation would be barred from discontinuing any passenger service before 1975.

The House has not yet acted on the bill, but prospects for enactment were considered good.

● A Senate Labor Committee approved legislation urged by the AFL-CIO to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to issue cease-and-desist orders against violation of the federal fair employment law. Its authority in the anti-discrimination field would be comparable to the power of the National Labor Relations Board in dealing with violations of the labor law.

The full Labor Committee will now take up the bill and a number of senators of both parties have served notice that they will seek various amendments.

The original bill was co-sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr., 22 other Democratic senators and 12 Republicans.

APPOINTMENT OF a management attorney, Edward B. Miller, to the National Labor Relations Board is opposed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at Senate Labor Committee hearings. He told the committee that the AFL-CIO would also be opposed to appointment of a union attorney to the impartial, quasi-judicial agency. With Meany at the witness table are AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, left, and General Counsel J. Albert Woll.

Citizens Fact-Finding Panel Cites Gains in Vietnamization Program

Vietnamization—preparing South Viet Nam to take over its own defense—"is working in both its military and pacification aspects," a private fact-finding group told Pres. Nixon.

Continued withdrawal of American forces is "feasible," it added, provided such withdrawal is "prudent and flexible" in line with continuing improvement in South Viet Nam's capability.

The fact-finding was done by a mission sent to Viet Nam by the Citizens Committee for Peace with Freedom in Viet Nam and its report was presented to Nixon at the White House.

The committee was founded in 1967 by the late Pres. Eisenhower, former Pres. Truman, former Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and 127 other national leaders. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany serves as committee co-chairman.

The trip of a seven-man commission covered the first three weeks of April and was similar to that of a nine-member team in August, which also found that Vietnamization was working.

The report emphasized that withdrawals should be linked to three criteria set by Nixon: progress in negotiations at Paris or elsewhere, improvement in Vietnamese capacities, and "the level of enemy activity including its new dimensions in Cambodia and Laos."

Former Ambassador to the Congo, Edmund A. Gullion, who was part of the latest commission and its spoksman following presentation of the report at the White House, noted that the trip had been completed before the current movement of U.S. forces into Cambodia.

The report said that "the greatest danger to Viet Nam and to our own troops" now comes from North Viet Nam's invaders in Cambodia, but the decisive struggle for Viet Nam "is taking place in the arena of public opinion."

"It will require of Americans," the report explained, "a willingness to stay the course set by Pres. Nixon's three criteria and to accept some sacrifice for yet a little while."

The report agreed with the prediction of the earlier team that "a protracted war" or "standoff" is in prospect for some time and that there will continue to be "ups and downs and a lack of a dramatic breakthrough."

The South Vietnamese, the commission found, are anxious to get on with the job of taking over the war themselves because "they know they are winning the contest for the countryside."

"They see 1970 as the year of consolidation," it added, "and they begin to see faint signs of a dawning peace which, however imperfect, will be better than what they have endured for a quarter of a century."

Among the commission's recommendations was one that the United States recognize that mounting rate of inflation in South Viet Nam as "a major threat" to Vietnamization and help South Viet Nam's government to curb soaring prices.

The commission called upon U.S. news media and the U.S. Information Agency to emphasize developments in Viet Nam which have been "somewhat neglected," such as:

"Rice-roots opinion" in Viet Nam, which is far more hostile to Hanoi than the United States appears to recognize; the emergence of South Vietnamese defense forces, and "enlightened treatment" of prisoners in South Viet Nam as contrasted to Hanoi's practices.

It also urged U.S. media to give more attention to "the unfolding of one of the most sweeping land reform programs in modern times" now under way in South Viet Nam.

The report concluded that "while the United States cannot and should not be the world's policeman" it must understand that nations that defend themselves against aggression should have our understanding and support because "their death would diminish ourselves."

Rep. Cunningham Loses In Nebraska GOP Vote

A seven-term Republican congressman in Nebraska lost his bid for renomination and a football star failed to make the congressional lineup in West Virginia's Democratic primary.

The defeated congressman was Glenn Cunningham, who had repeatedly been elected from a metropolitan Omaha district that has more registered Democrats than Republicans. GOP voters gave the nod to John E. McCollister, a county commissioner and oil corporation executive.

In the Nebraska senatorial primaries, Sen. Roman L. Hruska won easy nomination in the GOP primary. But he will face a strong Democratic opponent in November, former Gov. Frank B. Morrison.

The closest Nebraska race was the Republican gubernatorial primary, where a protest against tax increases nearly cost Gov. Norbert T. Tiemann renomination. He narrowly beat State Sen. Clifton F. Batchelder, who was described in a New York Times story as "a staunch conservative who prides himself on his votes against taxes and programs to aid the handicapped and mentally retarded."

In West Virginia, Sen. Robert C. Byrd and all five of the state's incumbent congressmen won easy renomination in the Democratic primary.

In the contest which attracted the most interest, football player-coach Sam Huff of the Washington Redskins failed to unseat Rep. Robert H. Mollohan in the state's 1st Congressional District.

Mollohan polled 36,000 votes to Huff's 17,000 in unofficial returns. It was Huff's first bid for political office.

In Democratic primiaries for the legislature, the upset defeat of a number of Old Guard state senators was seen as strengthening the political influence of John D. Rockefeller 4th, West Virginia's secretary of state and a likely candidate for governor in 1974.

The local election attracting the most attention was in New Jersey's largest city—Newark—where incumbent Mayor Hugh J. Addonizio ran a poor second to Kenneth A. Gibson, a Negro civil engineer.

The two will meet again in a runoff election on June 16. Two of the three also-ran candidates in the first election, both white, have endorsed Gibson against Addonizio, who has been indicted on federal charges of extortion and income tax evasion.

Newark has a Negro population majority, but a majority of the registered voters are white.

USWA Certified At Carolina Mill

The Steelworkers have been certified by the National Labor Relations Board as collective bargaining agent for employes of the Georgetown, S.C., Steel Corp., making the firm the first organized foreign-owned steel producer in the United States. It has West German owners.

The USWA won a representation election at the South Carolina plant by the lopsided vote of 376 to 89.

The new $30 million "mini-steel" plant, in operation since last July, specializes in making concrete reinforcing bars and wire mesh for the construction industry. It was formally dedicated Apr. 17 with Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) participating in the ceremonies.

NLRB Upholds Unions On Naming Stewards

Unions have an absolute right to appoint department or shop stewards, and employers must deal with them in discussing employe grievances, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

The board rejected the claim of Lee Deane Products, Inc., that the Allied Industrial Workers are not entitled to name shop stewards "as a matter of right," and ordered it to recognize and deal with the stewards, or other in-plant representatives of the union.

The company makes plastic and fiberglass products in a plant at Santa Fe Springs, Calif. The union won an election there in 1968, and later filed charges that the firm refused to bargain with it. The refusal triggered and prolonged a strike that started more than a year ago, the union said.

The NLRB upheld Trial Examiner David B. Davis' finding that the company's position on stewards violated the law but dismissed other unfair practice charges.

"It is well established," a board panel said, "that an employer may not deny a union the right to the services of stewards in representing its members."

It noted that Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act "secures to the bargaining agent the right to attend the adjustment of grievances without qualification. Thus the right of union stewards to participate in the processing of grievances is a statutory right which an employer may not nullify by refusing to agree to deal with stewards."

The panel consisting of NLRB Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., ordered management to stop refusing to recognize and deal with AIW stewards. They dismissed other remedies recommended by the NLRB hearing officer.

High Joblessness Affects 11 Key Areas

Three major manpower centers—Grand Rapids, Mich.; Lowell, Mass., and Utica-Rome, N.Y.—were added to the Labor Dept.'s "substantial" unemployment list in April, bringing the total to 11. There were only four in April 1969.

The eight other major areas of substantial unemployment last month were: Tacoma and Seattle, Wash.; Fresno and Stockton, Calif.; Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich.; New Bedford, Mass., and Ponce and Mayaguez, Puerto Rico.

The department classifies an area as having "substantial" unemployment when the jobless rate averages 6 percent or more of the workforce, discounting seasonal and temporary factors.

Community Action Key to Social Gains

- Do some homework—know what food stamps and welfare are all about; read the fine print.
- Transmit this information by way of seminars and similar means to people in the local community.
- Participate actively in the local administration of programs by belonging to advisory committees and other community bodies.
- See that suggestions for improvement are channeled to the proper authorities for action.

At a luncheon session, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany emphasized the importance of trade union legislative activity to all workers.

He enumerated a lengthy list of laws that labor initiated and fought for, from free public education to unemployment insurance. "We put them on the statute books for everybody, for the whole community," Meany stressed. He said labor's community services program "gives the lie to the argument that the trade union movement is only interested in the welfare of its own members."

The luncheon honored AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, who recently succeeded Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne as chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee.

At Meany's request, the AFL-CIO's annual Murray-Green Award dinner and reception, scheduled for the final night of the conference, was cancelled as part of labor's mourning for the death of Walter P. Reuther and Mrs. Reuther. John W. Gardner, chairman of the National Urban Coalition, was to have received the award.

Rep. Lenor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Consumer Affairs subcommittee, called on community service workers to help enforce consumer protection laws for the young, the poor and the disabled. As examples of such action, she suggested becoming "customers" in notorious "gyp outfits," and using food stamps in a poor neighborhood to see whether the grocery store misuses them.

She urged that the information gathered on any abuses be passed along to the AFL-CIO legislative staff to document labor's testimony on consumer legislation.

A tragic abuse of federal and state standards is that practiced by most nursing homes in the country, Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.) told the conference audience.

From first-hand knowledge, Pryor said nursing homes are being run as a "booming, profitable industry" instead of places where an aged person's last months or years might be spent in peace. Pryor acted as an unidentified volunteer in homes in the Maryland-Virginia-D.C. area for several months.

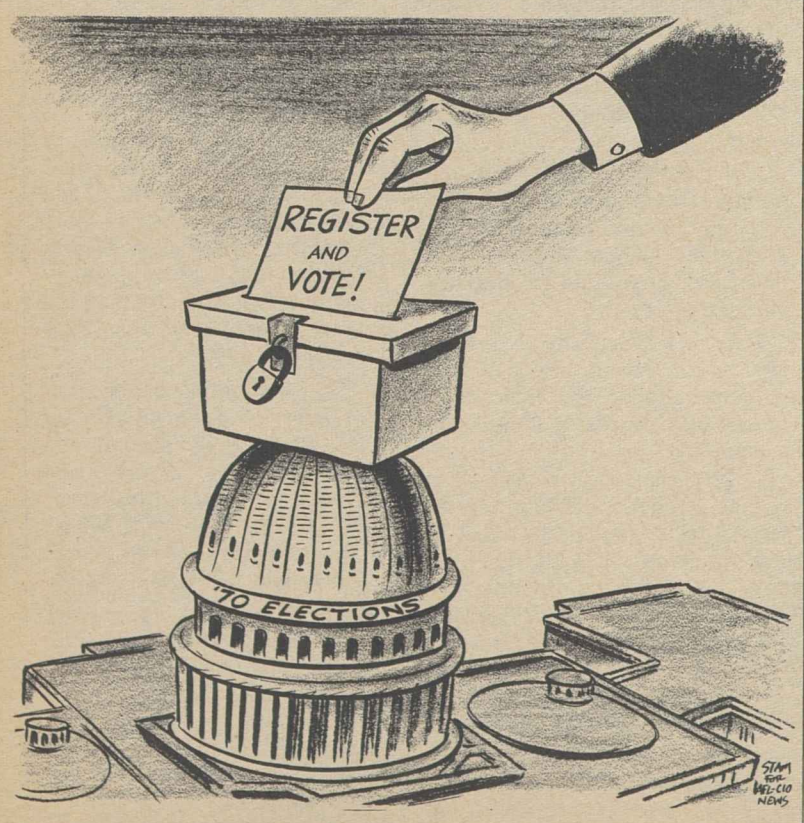
Cases of inadequate food, "medicine" in the form of tranquilizers for the purpose of making patients manageable; filth; cruelty; neglect and thievery were observed by Pryor and detailed in letters to his congressional office.

He called on labor's representatives to "join together to become the voice of one million old and weak people confined to nursing homes." He urged conference participants to act as "watchdogs" in their communities and insist that state and federal legislators enact and enforce laws to protect nursing home patients—not just the owners.



Other conference speakers included AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair, who discussed the route "From Capitol Hill to Local Community;" Bill Burson, director, Georgia State Dept. of Family & Children Services; Mitchell I. Ginsberg, administrator of New York City's Human Resources Administration; and three experts on federal food programs from the Dept. of Agriculture, Neill W. Freeman, Jr., Isabelle M. Kelley and Herbert D. Rorex.

Scheduled speakers for the last day of the conference included Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.); Bud Wilkinson, White House Coordinator for Voluntary Action, and Junius L. Allison, executive director of National Legal Aid.

Evening sessions on social security, truth-in-lending, and day care, were led by experts in these fields and followed by movies, slides and discussion.

Afternoon workshop sessions provided community services staff and volunteers with specific techniques to enable them to put their knowledge of social welfare legislation gained during the conference to work in their local communities. These seminars were directed by William A. Davies, AFL-CIO-CSA representative with the United Community Funds & Councils of America.

Community Services staff members Ray Andrus and Edward J. Carlin coordinated all conference activities.

TRADE UNION MOVEMENT has a special responsibility to the total community in which its members live and work, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared. He spoke to the AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services. Shown seated, from left, are Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities; Ray Andrus of the CSA staff, and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan.

5 Unions Hit Tariff Loopholes, Cite Heavy Loss of U.S. Jobs

Spokesmen for five unions told the U.S. Tariff Commission that the flow of jobs from the United States to other countries has reached flood proportions because of tariff loopholes.

They urged swift action by Congress to repeal Items 830.6 and 807 of the Tariff Code, which permit sharply reduced duties on imports that contain U.S.-exported components assembled and processed abroad.

Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said that loopholes in the tariff law have turned garment manufacturing into an "industry on wheels," rolling along looking for cheap labor and leaving unemployed workers in its path. He was also testifying for the Clothing Workers.

A statement from Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers emphasized that 830.6 and 807 must be eliminated "to keep the harm done to American workers and the American economy from growing dramatically worse—beyond remedy."

Jennings' statement, presented by Abe Morganstern, IUE research director, was also on behalf of the Machinists and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Earlier, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger testified before the commission that the tariff loopholes have already led to the "export" of 100,000 U.S. jobs since 1967.

Teper presented a first-hand picture of the "erosion" of the apparel industry caused by employers who have fled to Mexico and other countries with resulting hardships to workers and their families in the United States.

He charged that the loopholes, abetted by foreign governments' subsidies to U.S. firms and the attraction of cheap labor, have resulted in a "stupendous 2,243 percent" increase in the import of apparels in just five years.

In addition to wiping out jobs, Teper said, the loopholes have become the avenue through which employers can flee from unions and their obligation to live up to the nation's minimum wage law.

"It is American production, American jobs that are being exported outside our borders," Jennings said, "and the export of production and jobs has begun to assume alarming proportions."

Jennings listed 19 companies that have shut down or reduced their operations in the past year, "transferring production and jobs outside U.S. borders." The runaway firms went to such countries as Mexico, Germany, Japan, Taiwan and other countries in the Far East.

Meanwhile, the nation's trade laws, the deterioration of America's trade position and a wide range of trade bills now in Congress continued to be the subject of hearings before the House Ways & Means Committee.

Administration spokesmen who appeared before the committee included Sec. of Commerce Maurice H. Stans, Sec. of State William P. Rogers, Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz, Sec. of the Treasury David M. Kennedy and Carl J. Gilbert, Pres. Nixon's special representative for trade negotiations.

Gilbert appeared to be in opposition to pending legislation that would impose quotas on imports of textiles and shoes—two industries that have been hard hit by imports.

He said the Administration still preferred a "voluntary solution" of the textile problem, claiming that headway is being made in negotiations with Japan and other nations for agreements to curb textile exports to the United States.

As for the shoe industry, Gilbert said, conditions vary so much that industry-wide relief through quotas wouldn't work. He said the Administration will soon propose selective measures to help that industry.

Stans gave qualified support to the bill to impose quotas but asked the committee to defer action on quota legislation until near the end of its hearings. He and Rogers also saw the likelihood of reaching a "voluntary solution."

Shultz proposed adding medical and dental assistance and "job coaching" to the benefits available to workers who are found to have suffered job losses under the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

Kennedy unveiled an Administration plan to authorize tax incentives, totaling as much as $600 million a year, to stimulate U.S. industries to increase their exports.

But the scheme ran into immediate fire. Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) charged it amounted to a "tax bonanza" for business. A Treasury Dept. official conceded that industries could get the tax break even without increasing exports.

Maritime Bill Wins Approval Of Congress

Legislation authorizing $429 million for maritime programs in fiscal 1971 as the first installment on Pres. Nixon's program to rejuvenate the merchant marine has passed Congress.

The measure authorizes an expenditure of $119.5 million to subsidize construction of 19 vessels in the Administration's program to build 300 new ships over the next 10 years.

The program, supported by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., also calls for "differential subsidies" for U.S. ship operators to compensate them for the wage and insurance costs they have in excess of those borne by operations under foreign flags.

The bill authorizes $193 million in subsidies for ship operations. It also calls for $20.7 million for research. But all money must still be appropriated in separate legislation before it can be spent.

Prices Continue Upward Surge in April

Real Wages Eroded by Living Costs

By Rex Hardesty

The buying power of workers' wages continued to be eroded by the worst inflation in 20 years as the Labor Dept. reported an increase in the Consumer Price Index of six-tenths of 1 percent for April.

The April increase put the index at 134 percent of the 1957-59 average, which means goods and services costing $100 then would cost $134 now. Stated the other way, the 1957-59 purchasing dollar is now worth 74 cents.

At the same time, the Labor Dept. announced that the average worker's earnings were "virtually unchanged" in April at $117.98 leaving him in a slightly worse position in terms of purchasing power than he was a month before.

The Consumer Price Index is now 6 percent above the figure for April of 1969, marking the fourth straight month in which the CPI has exceeded year-ago figures by 6 percent or more. It was up 6.1 percent in March, 6.3 percent in February and 6.2 percent in January over the corresponding months of 1969.

And the rate of increase in 1969 was the worst since the Korean War year of 1951. For all of 1969, that increase was 5.4 percent higher than 1968.

With the one-year increase running over 6 percent for all four months of 1970, labor economists were prompted to interpret the April rise as making it "self-evident that the Administration's anti-inflation campaign is just not working."

On a month-to-month basis, the six-tenths of 1 percent increase in April followed increases of five-tenths of 1 percent in both February and March. Before that, the index had risen six-tenths of 1 percent for each of the three previous months.

In announcing the figures, Dr. Joel Popkin, assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, termed the April increase "significant," but pointed out that the increase in a three-month period was slightly smaller than for the three months of November, December and January.

However, he declined to interpret the three-month figures as any indication that inflation is cooling off.

The April increase came despite a leveling off in commodities, especially food prices, and was primarily due to a sharp increase in the cost of consumer services. These accounted for about four-tenths of the April increase, the BLS said. Other notable increases occurred in services associated with housing, such as utilities, residential

House Votes 5% Increase In Social Security Benefits

Bill Provides Added Gains For Millions

The House passed and sent to the Senate legislation raising social security benefits for all 22.6 million persons now on the rolls —and for the millions of others who will become eligible in future years.

It includes an across-the-board benefit hike of 5 percent, effective next Jan. 1, which will add $1.7 billion to social security checks the first year. More than half the people on the social security rolls will receive additional increases, valued at $2.2 billion a year, through other improvements in the law.

The legislation marks the second step of social security benefit increases enacted by the 91st Congress. A first-stage 15 percent across-the-board benefit hike took effect this past Jan. 1.

In a surprise move, the House approved a Republican-sponsored motion to add to the bill an automatic cost-of-living escalator. Benefits would be raised in the future, without congressional action, whenever the cost of living increased at least 3 percent during the previous year.

As is customary, the House had taken up the social security bill written by its Ways & Means Committee under a no-amendment rule. However, one motion is permitted under such a rule, to send the bill back to committee—usually with instructions to change it in some way.

The recommittal motion was to add the cost of living provision,

Despite Basic Differences:

Labor, Management Affirm Faith in Bargaining Process

By David L. Perlman

New York—Union and management leaders found themselves far apart on basic economic issues after a three-day dialogue here, but strongly agreed that the bargaining table is the best place to resolve their differences.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summed up the theme of the second annual Collective Bargaining Forum when he stressed that both labor and management have a "tremendous stake" in making collective bargaining work, "and that neither side can make it work unless both sides want it to."

The alternative to "give and take at the bargaining table," Meany noted, is "all-or-nothing confrontations in the streets." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

Earlier, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and the chairman of the Industrial Relations Committee of the National Association of Manufacturers spoke from the same platform to point up the twin areas of conflict and agreement.

The NAM spokesman, Republic Steel Vice Pres. Harold C. Lumb, complained that unions are using "record wage agreements last year . . . as a plateau from which to demand even higher settlements." He argued that unions have too much "power" which has "tended to subvert the free interplay of economic and market forces."

Kirkland said it was the "dismal management" of the nation's economy—not wage increases—that has brought about "the bizarre phenomenon of rapid inflation coupled with a deepening recession."

Unions, he told the forum, "will continue to represent their members, first and foremost, and to pursue wage increases which compensate for past and expected increases in living costs. They will do better if they can."

Interest rates, land costs and medical care have been "the most volatile ingredients" of today's inflation, Kirkland noted. And there is no reason for unions to asume "that voluntary restraint on labor's part —even if practical, which it is not —would accomplish anything other than the pointless sacrifice of their

Foreign Trade Quotas Proposed Should Voluntary Agreements Fail

The AFL-CIO favors voluntary international agreements on imports, but failing such agreements quotas are called for when significant percentages of U.S. output and jobs are threatened.

That view was presented to the House Ways & Means Committee as the AFL-CIO spelled out its position on a number of foreign trade proposals and on the general nature of the trade problem.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, accompanied by Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, presented a detailed, documented statement reviewing the post World War II developments in trade and analyzing the current situation.

The choice in the 1970s, the federation said, is not between outworn theories and cliches of free trade or protectionism. "Free competitive trade relations hardly exist any longer in this world of managed national economies and the large-scale operations of foreign subsidiaries of U.S. companies."

"It is neither possible for the American economy to hide behind high tariff walls nor to pretend that free, competitive trade relations are possible."

The AFL-CIO told the committee that legislation is required to stop helping and subsidizing U.S.

Table Grape Pacts Reached In Delano Area

Delano, Calif.—As the first clusters of union label table grapes were being plucked in California vineyards this week, the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee scored impressive new contract victories with additional growers.

Two major growers agreed to terms that will mean production of some 2.5 million boxes of grapes entering the market with the Farm Workers' bright red and black union label. The ranches covered are in the Coachella Valley, near the Mexican border, where harvesting has begun; in Delano, UFWOC's birthplace and headquarters, and in Arizona.

Shanker Jailed For Violation Of Taylor Law

New York—Pres. Albert Shanker of the local teachers' union began serving a 14-day term in the New York Civil Jail with a blast at the state's Taylor no-strike law under which he was sentenced.

"It's ridiculous," Shanker told a crowd of well-wishers and newsmen, "that people in private schools should be able to strike while we can't." The right to bargain collectively means the right to strike, but teachers and other government employes are penalized by the Taylor Act if they do, he noted.

Members of Shanker's union, the United Federation of Teachers—Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers — walked out three times in 1968 when school officials failed to protect members against harassment by militants in central city schools.

The courts upheld a jail sentence, a $200 personal fine on Shanker and a $220,000 fine against the union for refusing to return on a judge's order.

Shanker is due for release May 29, one day earlier than the mandated 15 days because of a jail rule.

In Boston, Pres. John Reilly of AFT Local 66 was jailed May 6 under a state no-strike law because more than half the city's public school teachers went on strike. A judge said Reilly "might" be released when the strike ends. He also fined nine union members and levied a fine of $1,000 a day against the local. The walkout ended May 19 in an agreement to arbitrate.

In Massapequa, N.Y., more than two thirds of the school district's teachers have been out since May 7 protesting wages and teaching conditions. Last-minute agreements were won in two other Long Island communities, Farmingdale and Plainview-Old Bethpage, the AFT said.

Tribute Paid To Reuther in Detroit Rites

Detroit—Top national leaders together with thousands of unionists and other mourners paid their final tribute at funeral ceremonies for UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and his wife May.

For two days a steady stream of people had moved by the two coffins at the Veterans Memorial Building.

There were 51 honorary pallbearers, UAW officials and staffers, who worked closely with Reuther in life. A 12-member AFL-CIO delegation was headed by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

Other delegation members were AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel, William Pollock, Matthew Guinan, Paul Jennings, Karl F. Feller, Max Greenberg, Joseph A. Beirne, C. L. Dennis, Jerry Wurf, and Directors William L. Kircher of the Dept. of Organization and Donald Slaiman, Dept. of Civil Rights.

As the funeral got under way at 10 a.m., May 15, UAW members across the nation stood in silence for three minutes in tribute to Reuther.

Among the speakers at the memorial service were Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.); Reuther assistant Irving Bluestone; Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr.; John Gardner, chairman of the National Urban Coalition; Whitney Young, executive director of the National Urban League, and Dave Miller, a longtime associate of Reuther and chairman of the UAW retirees council.

Public Supports Unions On the Right to Strike

The prevailing mood of American people favors the side of unions in recent management-labor disputes, a survey by pollster Louis Harris shows. The dominant view of the public is that federal employes, including postal workers and air traffic controllers, should have the right to strike.

Harris also says the public does not look on the efforts of unions to win wage increases as a major cause of inflation.

The general right of labor to strike is recognized by the public with 65 percent in favor and 25 percent opposed. But this overall view varies for different categories of employment, Harris reports.

By a slim margin of 47 to 46 percent, the public backs the right of school teachers to strike. But the majority expressed opposition to walkouts by hospital employes.

The poll was taken between April 20-24 from a national cross section of 1,470 households.

Support for the right to strike runs strongest among union members themselves, who make up 24 percent of the total national sample, Harris said. Close behind came young people under 30, Negroes and the college-educated.

First Table Grape Pacts Reached in Delano Area

Agreements, for two years beginning May 13, were signed in Delano with the Bianco Fruit Co. and the Bruno Dispoto Co.

Dispoto, who also has ranches in Arizona, until six weeks ago had been adamant in his refusal to bargain with the union and had been in the forefront of growers resisting UFWOC since its inception five years ago.

The bishops' ad hoc committee of the U.S. Catholic Conference played a key role in bringing both sides together. Talks which began in early April at the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service office in Los Angeles stalled several weeks ago and as recently as a week ago appeared futile.

Negotiations then moved to the Delano area, where Bishop Joseph F. Donnelly of Hartford, Conn., who heads the bishops' committee, became an active participant at the bargaining table.

Since last November the committee has met with dozens of growers up and down the state in an effort to achieve labor harmony at the bargaining table and equity for workers in the fields.

The new contracts vary only slightly from the six agreements hammered out since Mar. 31, most of them with growers in the Coachella Valley.

The previously signed contracts are for three years. There also are some wage variances but the new pacts otherwise parallel terms of the prior agreements including successor, hiring hall and pesticide clauses.

Pay Guarantee

Under the newest contracts, workers in Coachella will receive an hourly minimum of $1.80 and those in Delano and Arizona $1.75. The rate will increase to $1.90 in all areas beginning next Jan. 1.

Also provided is incentive pay of 25 cents per box of grapes harvested; an employer contribution of 10 cents an hour per worker for health and welfare funds, and two cents an hour toward an economic development fund for workers displaced due to age or mechanization of the industry.

Each box of grapes contains 26 pounds.

Most of the grapes grown by the latest two signers with the union will come out of the Delano area in the lush San Joaquin Valley—hub of the nation's largest production of grapes, some 80,000 acres.

The Coachella Valley, where grapes have only a 60-day growing period in the intense, searing sun of the low desert country, produces only about one-tenth of the state's total output.

Harvesting under way there now will continue for the next seven to eight weeks.

Central valley grapes — grown much farther north in the San Joaquin-Sacramento areas of which Delano is a part—reach fruitation in about 90 days and will start rolling into the marketplace in mid-July.

Signing of the newest contracts took place in the Delano office of a growers' attorney. The Farm Workers' negotiating committee was headed by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong, and Vice Pres. Dolores Huerta.

Al Caplan, a management consultant, represented the growers from the start of the talks. A federal mediator from Los Angeles also took part in the windup session.

250,000 Jobs Jeopardized:

Shoeworkers Cite Threat of Imports

St. Louis—The 250,000 jobs in the shoe industry in the United States could be wiped out in the next 10 years unless the federal government acts to curb imports of footwear, leaders of the United Shoe Workers warned delegates to the union's 15th constitutional convention here.

The threat that foreign-made footwear poses to the industry in this country and Canada was the over-riding concern of the convention.

Pres. George O. Fecteau and Sec.-Treas. Angelo G. Georgian emphasized the threat to shoeworkers' jobs in their reports to the delegates.

A resolution pledged all-out support for the Orderly Marketing Act sponsored by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) and Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.). About 250 delegates represented the union's 45,000 members.

A wage policy conference was scheduled immediately following the convention to set contract goals for future negotiations. Fecteau said the union will seek substantial wage increases, improvements in the health and welfare insurance program and in the pension funds.

In an address to the opening session of the convention, Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan opposed the imposition of wage and price controls and urged the Nixon Administration to use its economic power to curb inflation.

Instead of controls, she suggested that the government take action "designed to encourage one form of expenditure or investment in time of national need and discourage another."

"This is what we have been urging the present Administration to use its vast powers to accomplish, but so far without any success," she declared, adding:

"I would say to those whose solution for inflation is merely to control labor union wage demands, that they would achieve far more . . . by getting Mr. Nixon to do something about the 'credit crunch' which is undermining our entire economy."

Concerning import controls, Mrs. Sullivan said she is sure something will come out of the House Ways & Means Committee that will satisfy in part, at least, the union.

In another resolution submitted to the delegates, the executive committee and general executive board recommended that continued effort be made to effect a merger with the Boot & Shoe Workers.

New Guideline Set For Disputes Plan

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has set up a new guideline under the Internal Disputes Plan for handling cases involving the setting of wage rates in public employment by governmental bodies.

In a dispute that came before it via the appeals route, the council adopted the following position:

"It is the view of the Executive Council that, where laws provide that wage rates for particular trades or job classifications are to be set or adjusted in accordance with a determination of the rates prevailing for such classifications in private employment in the area, the presentation by a union, by personal appearance or otherwise, of data concerning the rates paid for those classifications under its contracts at a hearing or other proceeding conducted for the purpose of such a determination is not, in itself, a violation of Article XX, even though the employes directly affected by the determination are represented by another union."

Foreign Trade Limitations Favored Should Voluntary Agreements Fail

companies in setting up foreign subsidiaries, to supervise and curb the substantial outflows of American companies for investment in foreign operations, to develop regulations covering U.S.-based multinational companies, to press for establishment of international fair labor standards in world trade and, as a "stop-gap in the face of growing unresolved problems" to regulate the flow of imports into the United States.

Biemiller pointed out that "the need for guarding against a sharp inrush of imports . . . to prevent adverse impacts of American workers, communities, farms or industries has become crucial."

The AFL-CIO, he said, supports the "general approach" of bills that would impose quotas on imports "whenever a significant share of the U.S. market in such a product or component is threatened."

International agreements, the statement pointed out, would supersede the imposition of import limitations, but quotas would be established for imports from countries not party to the agreements.

"This approach provides for the orderly marketing of articles imported into the United States as well as a flexible basis for allowing foreign-produced products to enjoy a fair share of growth of the U.S. market in the product or component," Biemiller said.

Tracing the deterioration of the U.S. foreign trade position in the 1960s, the AFL-CIO stressed that there were certain "obvious impacts on jobs, on collective bargaining strength of unions, on wages and labor standards in adversely affected industries."

Noting the earlier testimony of Labor Sec. George P. Shultz on the number of workers necessary to produce domestically goods equivalent in value to imports in 1966 and 1969, Biemiller said that the secretary's "rough estimates indicate the loss of approximately 700,000 American jobs in the three years 1966-1969 as a result of the rising tide of imports that compete with U.S.-made products.

U.S. government policies and doctrines developed to meet world conditions of the 1930s and 1940s "are utterly unrealistic today" and their continuation in the 1970s "spells further losses for U.S. production and employment," the statement warned.

It went on to review the major changes in "world economic relationships" during the past 25 years including the revival of the war-shattered economies of Germany, Japan and other countries, the emergence of trading blocs such as the European Common Market "with its inward-looking, protectionist tendencies," the spread of managed national economies, the internationalization of technology, the sharp rise of investments of U.S. firms in foreign subsidiaries, and the rapid spread of U.S.-based multi-national corporations.

In dealing with other proposed legislation, Biemiller said the AFL-CIO is concerned that the escape clause provisions of the 1962 trade act be changed to recognize that imports are "a cause of injury."

He told the committee also that the federation supports proposals for a workable adjustment assistance policy helping workers to be retrained and relocated, but stressed that "adjustment assistance is most decidedly not a substitute" for meaningful legislation on trade and investment.

Repeal of Items 807 and 806.30 of the tariff code was urged again on Congress to close loopholes in the trade and tax structures.

The federation renewed its request that the Executive Branch of government press for the establishment of world fair labor standards.

Biemiller concluded that "no single action or one-shot panacea can meet the complex issues of world trade, foreign investments of U.S. companies and the operations of U.S.-based multi-national corporations. A battery of realistic policies and measures must be adopted to meet the needs of the American people in world economic relations in the 1970s."

Employer Bid Rejected:

Court Backs Board On Unfair Practices

The Supreme Court upheld the right of the National Labor Relations Board to proceed against an unfair employer even after a union has lost a second or third representation election.

The justices rejected the claim of the Raytheon Co. that an NLRB order against it for unfair pre-election practices should not be enforced by the courts because employes at the company's electronics plant in Mountain View, Calif., voted for no union after the order was issued.

The union involved was the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. It lost an election held Feb. 4, 1965, and charged Raytheon with committing unfair practices. The NLRB found management guilty of coercively questioning an employe about the union and other forbidden conduct. It ordered a new election and mandated the company to stop its unlawful practices.

Raytheon refused to obey the board's order and the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the company. It said the case was moot, or legally dead, because the union lost a third election in 1968, after two others had been set aside.

The third election was held while the NLRB's original enforcement case was still in the courts. The union chose to wait for the courts to rule on the original charge rather than ask that the election be set aside.

The issue, the high court ruled in an opinion written by Justice Thurgood Marshall, was not whether the union made the wrong move in filing charges but whether the appeals court ever held a hearing on the merits of the NLRB's petition for enforcement of its original order against Raytheon.

Marshall found that no such hearing was ever held, and the other justices agreed that the case should be returned to the San Francisco court for a hearing on the merits.

The labor law, Marshall wrote, is not "designed merely to protect a particular election or organizing campaign. It is designed to protect employes in the exercise of their organizational rights, and that protection cannot be affected merely because a particular labor organization has chosen an immediate election rerun rather than awaiting enforcement of the board order."

The opinion was read by Justice Potter Stewart in the absence of Marshall, reported ill with pneumonia in Bethesda, Md., Naval Hospital.

The decision cited a 1950 Supreme Court ruling in NLRB v. Mexia Textile Mills: "A board order imposes a continuing obligation; and the board is entitled to have the resumption of the unfair practice barred by an enforcement decree. . . . The Act does not require the board to play hide-and-seek with those guilty of unfair labor practices."

In another case, the justices let stand a ruling that a major manufacturer of glass containers violated the 1963 Equal Pay Act. The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Philadelphia, had ruled that the Wheaton Glass Co. of Millville, was guilty of illegal discrimination based on sex in paying male workers 10 percent more than women for essentially the same work.

The court also dismissed a petition by the Bishop Processing Co. of Bishop, Md., for review of a lower court order under the Clean Air Act of 1963. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered Bishop to shut down its rendering plant because it was polluting the air of Bishop and Selbyville, Del.

WIDE-RANGING PROGRAMS promoted by the labor movement are enumerated by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he addresses the National Conference on Community Services in Washington. More than 500 participants attended the four days of meetings and workshops.

Unions Asked to Take on Role Of 'Watchdog' Over Welfare

The trade union movement—traditionally the "peoples' lobby"—was urged to become the business agent for the poor and powerless, including families on welfare.

The appeal was made by New York City's human resources administrator, Mitchell I. Ginsburg, at the concluding sessions of the 15th annual AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

Earlier, the director of Georgia's family and children services department, William Burson, had criticized the "social myopia" of "middle-class America."

He said the "tragic shame of our time" is that the nation has the material wealth and ability to overcome its social problems, but allows poverty and its byproducts to fester.

Ginsberg told the 500 participants, including nearly 200 full-time community service staff experts, that the present welfare system is riddled with "clearcut inequities and unfairness."

He called on union members and community services staffers to take on "the watchdog role on the welfare system."

Ginsberg said the Administration's welfare bill, with certain changes, will be an improvement over the present system. But he stressed that after it is enacted "the key is going to be what happens locally as a result of these changes."

Another type of help—described as no less vital—was discussed by Junius L. Allison, director of National Legal Aid.

Legal services to the poor have been made possible through the Office of Economic Opportunity program, Allison noted. But the legal aid program remains subject to harassment.

He asked labor to help provide "leadership, inspiration, muscle and commitment" to the program.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) said that reforms are needed in auto insurance, car design and oil monopoly which "could cut the consumer's cost of owning a car by one-fifth each year."

On car design alone, he said, the cost of several hundred dollars in repairs for a parking lot collision could be eliminated on the drawing boards in Detroit.

Asking for support for a campaign to persuade the Dept. of Transportation to test cars and report on how well various models withstand collisions at different speeds, Hart said that with such information consumers "would be delighted to reward the manufacturer whose repairability record excells."

Air Line Union Reaches Settlement with National

The Air Line Employes and National Airlines agreed on terms for settling a strike by 3,600 employes and sent it to secret-ballot referendum of ALEA members at National.

The settlement calls for wage increases of 11 percent per year in each of three years; a full union shop, and improved sick leave, uniform allowances, pension benefits, vacations and other improvements amounting to a 50 percent increase overall in present contract benefits.

ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert called the agreement "the best in the airline industry" for clerical, office and service employes.

The union represents nearly half of National's employes. The line's station and ramp agents, reservation agents and clerical personnel have been on strike since Jan. 31. National said it hopes to resume service before May 30, when results of the ratification vote are expected to be announced.

The agreement to settle the 110-day strike was reached May 18 after more than 90 hours of intensive negotiations aided by the Dept. of Labor.

The settlement parallels one achieved two weeks ago by the Machinists with National. Both strikes had the full support of the AFL-CIO.

Distillery Workers Vote Funds for Organizing

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A thorough overhaul of the constitution aimed at streamlining operations, especially those centering on collective bargaining and organizing, was overwhelmingly approved by the Distillery Workers' Union at its 15th biennial convention.

As part of the constitutional changes, the 250 delegates voted to increase per capita payments by 20 cents monthly, to adjust the strike fund to provide for a $500,000 maximum and a $400,000 minimum, and to elevate the minimum dues of local unions from $4 to $6 monthly.

Funds derived from the per capita increase will be allocated to an intensive organizational drive. Principal targets will be Stitzel-Weller and other non-union firms in the Kentucky-Tennessee area, the wine fields of New York and Ohio, distilleries in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, and white collar employes in the main offices of the major distillers.

A comprehensive report on their stewardship by Pres. Mort Brandenburg and Sec.-Treas. George J. Oneto, together with a program of action to meet the challenges of the 1970s, was unanimously approved by the delegates.

Special stress was placed on the legislative problems confronting the alcoholic beverage industry, including tariffs and trade, the threat of increased excise taxes on both the federal and state levels, and the prospect of even more drastic legislation that could cause the deterioration of the market for wines and liquor.

National COPE Dir. Al Barkan made an appeal for support of COPE activities. It proved so effective that half of the union's quota of voluntary COPE contribution was met by the convention delegates themselves. He also commended the DWU for having successfully met its COPE quota for 11 out of the past 12 years.

The next regular convention, at which officers will be elected for a four-year term, will be held in Montreal in May 1972. Southern California was selected as the site for the 1974 convention.

Ford Grant Aids Bargaining Service

A new City-County Labor-Management Relations Service set up to train public employers in collective bargaining procedures and relations with unions has been given a $445,000 grant from the Ford Foundation.

The grant was made to the League of Cities-Conference of Mayors, which, together with the National Association of Counties, will sponsor the new service. Director of the program is Sam Zagoria, formerly a member of the National Labor Relations Board.

'We've Got to Get These to Them'

New England Bell Unit Picks IBEW

Boston — The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers won its first unit of New England Bell Telephone Co. employes when mail ballots among 2,350 accounting employes gave the IBEW a majority. The vote, in a rerun election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, was IBEW 894, an unaffiliated union 677 and no union 77.

The first election was set aside and a new one ordered. Two more elections are pending among units of traffic and plant employes. IBEW won first place in both but objections by other unions and the company delayed new election dates.

The Concept of Bargaining

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING, as it has grown and evolved in this country, is the most effective instrument the mind of man has so far devised for reaching mutually agreeable solutions to conflicts of interest of concern to employers and employes.

Collective bargaining, like the idea of democratic government, is based on consent and acceptance. It assumes that two parties to a dispute can reach a reasonable agreement that both parties can live with. It assumes that agreement can be reached by the exercise of reason, by give and take at the bargaining table, instead of by all-or-nothing confrontations in the streets.

Ultimately it assumes that not only a grudging accommodation but harmony is possible.

It is not a perfect instrument. It rests on the somewhat fragile foundation of mutual confidence and good faith among human beings. But like all truly democratic institutions it has the great virtue of strengthening its own foundation as it is used.

THERE ARE NO shortcuts and there are no substitutes for free collective bargaining. And strikes and lockouts are a normal and natural and necessary part of the collective bargaining process. Nobody enjoys a strike. They are painful and expensive, and sensible unions and sensible employers do everything they can to avoid them. The reason we work so hard to upgrade our skills at the bargaining table is to find ways to reach agreement before we come to that last resort.

But it is necessary to be able to excercise that last resort. Unless both sides are aware that serious consequences flow from misjudgments or breaches of faith, bargaining is a charade—an exercise in futility.

The labor movement is convinced that what this country needs is more and better collective bargaining, not less. It is our goal, as it always has been, to extend that right and that principle to every worker in the land.

We are convinced that every worker has a right to join a union and to have a responsible voice in his own destiny. To deprive him of that right is to close the gates of hope for a better future.

We can see no reason whatsoever why farm workers or government workers or any other workers should be singled out to be deprived of the right to meaningful collective bargaining.

I DON'T WANT to leave the impression that I think collective bargaining is a panacea for all our social ills, or that it can cure many of the areas of unrest that disturb us. It can't do that. It won't work for campus revolutionaries or demagogues or for anybody who is more interested in aggravating or perpetuating conflict than resolving it.

It won't work for people who say "take it or leave it" and it won't work for people who submit "non-negotiable demands."

It is a tool for reasonable people who believe in democracy and who respect each other's right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It is a tool for flexible people who respect history, who set reachable goals, who are willing to make and keep firm agreements for specific periods of time and then re-examine their goals, modify their agreement and move forward for another period of time.

Nobody claims that we solved all of yesterday's problems. But we have solved some of them. Today is better than yesterday. And tomorrow must be better than today.

A Word Edgewise:

Cabinet's Decision-Making Role Gets New Airing on Cambodia

By John P. Roche

PRES. NIXON'S DECISION on limited intervention in Cambodia has touched off a familiar Washington sequence. Pick up a newspaper, any newspaper, and you will find an "inside" story of how the President made the decision.

What distinguishes the Republican regime from that of Lyndon Johnson is that Nixon announced an "open administration," with the consequence that everyone above the rank of GS-15 feels free to comment on the wisdom of the President's actions.

So far, by my count, four Cabinet ministers have ventilated their sentiments. Sec. Finch put on the most remarkable performance, suggesting that Vice Pres. Agnew was indirectly involved in the tragedy at Kent State University. (Finch later denied this.)

Whether employed by Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy or Republicans such as Finch, this is a morally reprehensible position. The principle of collective responsibility is the cornerstone of totalitarian systems, highlighted in Stalin's purge trials, and has no place in a society built around the concept of individual guilt or innocence.

Sec. George Romney simply used the Cambodian episode to register his longstanding complaint that the President does not talk to him, and Sec. Hickel put in a plug for more Cabinet meetings. Sec. Rogers, on the other hand, appeared to be indicating to reporters that Nixon listens, but doesn't pay attention. (Rogers did not go on the record, but when one sees a story stating "sources close to the Secretary of State's thinking indicate . . . ," he can suspect an off-the-record background interview.)

By the time energetic reporters got through, you had a rather good idea of what happened. In Washington, when a high official tells a journalist "the President has received bad advice," or "the President has allowed himself to become insulated," the translation runs: "Nobody talked to me;" or, "the President did not follow my advice." The number of people in government who think the Constitution requires the President to consult them is astronomical.

The problem with the American system is that one man, and one man only, is elected by the sovereign people to make executive decisions.

The Cabinet, as Abraham Lincoln told his advisers when they opposed the Emancipation Proclamation, has no standing as a decision-making body. ("One vote for, six against," Lincoln reputedly announced, "the ayes have it.") A shrewd President obviously does a great deal of pulse-feeling, but he has to cut the cord.

On important decisions this is never easy—that's why they end up on the President's desk—and invariably advisers divide into two schools of thought. One group says "yes;" the other "no." It would be nice if the chief executive could split the difference, but a yes/no decision to, say, defend Israel against direct Soviet intervention is not a decision. Worse, it is a non-decision that amounts to taking a dive.

CONFRONTING the issue of Cambodia, Nixon had this kind of choice. The real question was: Will cleaning out the Communist supply depots be worth more to our national interest than the trouble it will create? He could have talked to everybody in the Greater Washington telephone directory without learning more than he already knew, namely that there were two answers, "yes" and "no."

Nixon was elected to make a choice and he made it. One can attack it on the merits if he so chooses, that is, say it was mistaken. Or one can support his actions (as I do).

But under the Constitution no one has the right to impeach his decision because he did not consult Sen. Fulbright, Sec. Finch, Pat Moynihan or the International Security Affairs section of the Pentagon. It is vital to recall that not once in our history has anyone been elected Secretary of State, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or, for that matter, Special Assistant to the President.

Labor Committed to Achieving A Broader National Community

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the recent AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services in Washington.

THIS CONFERENCE on community services comes at a time when the whole concept of the community is being tested as seldom before in our history.

The forces that challenge that concept have been given various labels—polarization, separatism, confrontation, or some other fashionable mouthful of syllables. Whatever the term of your choice, the cement that binds the structure of a mixed community of groups, interests and objectives appears to be crumbling at the seams.

New lines of hostility are being drawn between blacks and whites, young and adult, producers and consumers, insiders and outsiders, vocal militants and silent majorities. And fishing in these hot and turbulent waters can, of course, be found some very calm and cold-eyed opportunists and manipulators.

Other trends of modern life contribute further to those forces and pressures.

They include the fact of urbanization, with its attendant frictions and abrasions, the breakdown of old patterns of living and the flight of the privileged to suburbs and to the private schools.

The period of adolescence is now artificially prolonged by extending the exemption and isolation of the young from the labor force, dumping them by the millions on a university system whose role in the community is, at best, ill-defined.

The family unit, as a system of indoctrination and authority and as the basic element of the community, grows weaker. The mobility of the population has become truly awesome. Estimates indicate that somewhere between a fourth and a fifth of the population moves its domicile every year.

The consequences we see in the atrophy of human roots and human ties, and the weakening of the fabric of community life.

Much of the cultism and the bizarre new patterns of group conformity and behavior that we see today may well be a way of grasping at substitutes, and a search for new structures, new families and new identities to replace the old. They point to a need, if not to a solution.

What does this mean for the trade union movement? We are both black and white, old and young, poor and relatively affluent, producers and consumers. We are all the things that are in contention today. We cannot rush to the barricades of zealotry for any faction, without meeting ourselves coming down the street.

But we are not divided and we are not immobilized. We are united in the conviction that there is, over us all, on any question of justice or equity, what we call a trade union answer.

Even in our most cynical moments, we still uphold an ideal of brotherhood and a sense of belonging to a common cause, beyond ourselves. And, as demonstrated in the General Electric strike, in our support of farm workers, and on many other issues, we live up to that standard.

We are, in short, a human community—perhaps one of the last ones left in reasonably good condition. We are an instrument for the accommodation of reasonable interests and for the forceful and effective expression of those that we represent.

Labor is inclusive in its character. In the organization of working people we do not give psychological tests, nor do we undertake to screen opinions or to detect and reject those tainted with bigotry or illiberal views. We want them all; we want 100 percent of the workers in every shop.

But we do not accept responsibility for, nor do we undertake to represent, the spectrum of prejudices and aberrations that may exist in the membership, from reactionary to radical extremes. We know that their collective will, democratically formed, will express their most practical needs and their best aspirations for labor, for their fellow men and for their country. And that is what the trade union movement does represent, our detractors to the contrary notwithstanding.

Labor, of course, grew out of conflict and the clash of interests and values between worker and employer, and we engage in it today with vigor and enthusiasm. But we know that the final object of every conflict must be an accommodation and a settlement. That end is reached by a well-developed process of collective bargaining—the greatest invention for the resolution of differences in a free society ever devised.

The trade union movement therefore has, I believe, a special responsibility in the circumstances that face us today. It must help to find the path of reconciliation, the way by which order is accommodated to progress.

THAT KIND of a reconciliation, that restoration of order, cannot be achieved by laws, by the courts, or by the National Guard. It must emerge from a recognition of a larger interest, a broader community, in which all have a stake and which is rewarding to all.

We in this federation have an unshakeable faith in the power and the potential of a free and democratic society. We know that it has values far beyond the superficial "efficiency" of any totalitarian order. We are going to continue to defend it, as well, against those near-sighted detractors at home who, pointing to the problems and ignoring the progress, lament that "the system" is failing or at fault.

That is so much nonsense. Nothing is more futile or tiresome than crying about the so-called "system." So long as it remains open to all comers, the system as such is neutral. It will be used and controlled by any element or group that has desire, energy and understanding to know how to use it.

In other words, the people must work at the system if they expect the system to work for them.

When you help to assure that the intended purposes of social legislation are carried out, and translated into genuine practical assistance to a brother or sister unionist, or to anyone else in the community, you are helping to make the system work. There is no better test of citizenship or of community service than that.

Meeting Human Needs:

Key Role of Unionists Stressed In Localizing Service Programs

UNION MEMBERS can and should take a leading role in putting badly-needed programs —intended to meet human needs—into operation at the local level, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis declared on Labor News Conference.

Perlis pointed out that union members "strive hard to elect the right kind of candidates to public office" and to help enact "legislation for the benefit of the people."

He said there is a need for union members to work just as hard to spur adoption and implementation of those programs in their own communities. That, he noted, was the central aim of the recent AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services.

"Perhaps the most crucial welfare problem now facing most of the people in this country" is the need for more adequate and readily available medical care, he said. Local union members also will be helping to educate their fellow citizens to the need for "real overhaul of our medical delivery system."

Perlis said there is a broad and growing public demand for a national health insurance program. "We have tried for many years, through voluntary health schemes, to meet the needs of the people, but obviously, they are not being met," he asserted.

Washington Window

By Press Associates Inc.

ON MAY 22, the Civil Service Retirement Act was 50 years old and the number of retired government workers on its rolls total almost a million.

Eighteen employe organizations, about a dozen unions and retirement groups will sponsor a banquet May 26 to observe the day.

The history of the act is instructive. With today's social security system, private pension plans and above all, union negotiated pension programs, it is difficult to realize the tremendous advances that have been made in the treatment of elderly workers.

Before 1920, when the act was passed by Congress and signed by Pres. Woodrow Wilson, there simply was no provision for workers who grew gray in government service. Sponsors of the act urged its enactment on the grounds of adding to the efficiency of government. As one of them put it:

"It would seem to be high time to recognize the fact that the executive departments have a pension roll whether they like it or not, and that it is the most expensive, cumbersome, and in many ways inhuman sort of pension system. . . . Aged and decrepit employes are retained on the payroll at a salary which is considerably higher, in most cases, than would provide an adequate pension. These people are not discharged, can not and will not be discharged by the heads of departments for humane reasons. . . ."

This may have been an unduly pragmatic approach to the problem, but it is clear that even the government bureaucracy of the day could not find it in its heart to turn faithful servants out to starve at the end of long service.

In any event, the system got off the ground somewhat gingerly and even primitively by modern standards. The first average annual annuity was $568 with a maximum of $720 after 30 years service. Today the average age of employes added to the rolls annually is 60 and their annuity average about $3,800. For retirees with 30 or more years of service now going on the rolls, the average annuity is about $6,000 a year. Between 50,000 and 55,000 employes now retire each year.

IN THE COURSE of the past half century, considerable improvements have been enacted by Congress. Some of these were: protection for survivors of the retired; retirement at 55 years of age after 30 years service, at age 60 with 20 years service and at age 62 with five or more years of service; disability retirement after five years service; death benefits to a spouse and children; benefits based on the "high three" consecutive salary years as compared with the original "high ten."

For the first eight years of its existence, the government made no contributions to the fund. This was partially corrected after 1929 when appropriations to the fund were made by Congress, but there was still much unfunded liability. Since then the government has made further contributions and now chips in 7 percent of salary, equaling that of the employe and placing the fund on a sound basis.

Government unions are calling for further improvements to keep up with pension developments in the nation. Their program includes: retirement after 30 years of service regardless of age; a 5 percent increase in survivors' benefits to 60 percent; retirement payments based on total earnings rather than base pay; improvement of the benefits formula by computing them at 2 percent on the average of the highest three years, instead of the present formula which starts at 1.5 percent; an increased minimum for disability retirement, and continued opposition to consolidation of the federal retirement system with that of social security.

There are now some 3 million federal employes who, more and more, are winning collective bargaining rights similar to those in private employment. Clearly, the terms of their retirement pensions will become subjects for discussion, if not full bargaining, with the agencies for which they work.

IMPLEMENTING programs locally is as important as enacting them, and union members should take leading roles in both efforts, AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, center, declared on Labor News Conference. The AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual Radio. Questioning Perlis were Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Don Finley of United Press International.

NEWSLETTERS covering local community services activities were presented International Labor Press Association awards for outstanding work during the AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services. The first place award went to the Louisville, Ky., Newsletter, edited by Charles Clark, left, and an honorable mention went to the San Francisco Labor's Community Report, edited by Frank White, right. Susan Ellis, center, of the federation's public relations staff, was one of the judges in the ILPA awards contest.

Peace Corps Recruiting Skilled Trade Unionists

The Peace Corps is on a talent search for skilled union craftsmen to serve a two-year hitch overseas teaching their trade to workers of underdeveloped countries.

The recruiting drive, which has full backing of the AFL-CIO, is aimed primarily at enrolling craftsmen from the building trades.

Many volunteers will be able to take along their families and all living and traveling expenses will be paid by the Peace Corps.

Peace Corps Dir. Joseph H. Blatchford said that openings high on the recruitment list are for a wide range of the skilled trades: operating engineers, carpenters, electricians, masons, welders, heavy equipment mechanics, machinists, tool and die makers, cabinet makers, plumbers and experienced teachers.

Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters was recently appointed by Pres. Nixon to represent labor on the National Advisory Board of the Peace Corps.

Raftery will work with Board Chairman Neal Armstrong, the former astronaut, to coordinate the labor movement's participation in the recruiting drive.

Blatchford explained that the Peace Corps is appealing mainly to the "idealism" of the skilled workers. For these workers "the experience . . . should be richly rewarding," he added.

Their assignment will be "to teach skills to others, to be one link in a growing chain of human development," Blatchford declared.

A worker assigned to a non-English speaking country would have 12 weeks of concentrated language training before embarking.

In some cases, a Peace Corpsman may take his family along. If he has children, provisions will be made for their schooling. However, the Peace Corps permits no more than four children on a tour.

Blatchford, who is currently making the rounds of union conventions to press the recruiting campaign, said the quota this year is 500 skilled craftsmen. He is not only optimistic about reaching that quota, but expects to raise the number in future years.

The number of countries which have requested the services of the skilled workers is also growing, Blatchford reported. These countries are in South America, Africa and Asia. He specifically mentioned Bolivia, India, and Micronesia.

The campaign is being handled by the Skilled Trades Desk of the Peace Corps in Washington. A number of unions are also expected to help step up the drive within their own ranks. Raftery, an AFL-CIO vice president, will coordinate the efforts with the unions.

Shapp Wins Pennsylvania Primary Race

Harrisburg, Pa. — Philadelphia businessman Milton J. Shapp secured a second bid to run for the governorship of Pennsylvania when he won the Democratic nomination by edging out State Auditor Robert P. Casey for the second time in four years.

Shapp will face Republican Lt. Gov. Raymond J. Broderick in November. Broderick was unopposed in his bid to succeed Gov. Raymond P. Shafer who could not seek a second term under the old constitution. A new state constitution will allow governors to seek more than one term in the future.

Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), GOP Senate leader, was unopposed in the primary. The Democratic nomination was won by State Sen. William G. Sesler of Erie who defeated two other candidates, including Norval D. Reece who pitched his campaign on the peace issue and party reform.

Sesler was a running mate of Casey and State Senate Minority Leader Ernest P. Kline, who won the bid for lieutenant governor.

4,500 Firms Lost To Mergers in '69

Conglomerate takeovers continued to dominate the merger activity of American industry last year as a record 4,500 firms disappeared through acquisitions, the Federal Trade Commission reports.

Widely diversified corporations accounted for 80 percent of the takeovers and 72 percent of the assets of all large mining and manufacturing firms acquired in 1969.

The FTC annual report showed 43 acquisitions by the nation's 200 largest firms in 1969, compared with a record 89 in 1968 and 71 in 1967.

Government Policies Assailed:

Canadian Labor Congress Focuses on Social Problems

Edmonton—The Canadian Labor Congress biennial convention opened with a plea that organized labor renew its efforts to combat the country's social problems.

It came from CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald who cited specifically poverty, social security, pollution, consumer protection and the human rights of minority groups.

The five-day convention drew 1,450 delegates representing local unions as well as national and international organizations.

The federal government's anti-inflation policies came in for strong criticism. MacDonald said it is the first time in the history of Canada that "a government has by its own admission deliberately set out to create unemployment."

The government's tight fiscal and monetary policies have run into a storm of protest from academics as well as labor leaders. Unemployment was 6.6 per cent in April—or 5.6 per cent at the seasonally adjusted rate.

And just two days before the CLC convention opened, reports came from Paris that Canadian policies drew strong criticism at the two-day annual review of the Canadian economy by the 22-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development.

OECD experts pointed out that Canadian production was further below capacity than U.S. output, and Canadian unemployment was higher.

The Federal Prices & Incomes Commission also drew a strong blast, both from MacDonald and from T. C. (Tommy) Douglas, leader of the labor-backed New Democratic Party.

The commission, appointed last year by the federal government ostensibily to investigate the causes of inflation, has been asking labor and industry to agree to a program of voluntary price and wage restraints. Labor has constantly refused.

MacDonald described the commission as a "government errand boy," and said its chairman, Dr. John Young, was "going about the country berating labor for its unwillingness to be the whipping boy of the economy."

MacDonald added: "Organized workers are not going to be the scapegoats for a government that does not know how to solve the problems for which it accepted a mandate. We shall not accept guidelines, not only because they are unfair and unworkable, but because they pose a threat to the very system of collective bargaining itself."

Douglas described the commission as a "patsy and a front man for the government." Its chairman "is being used as a public relations man and as a critic of organized labor."

He said the commission is expecting workers to sign legally binding contracts restricting the price of their wages while leaving business tycoons free to accept or reject voluntary restraints.

"We are not prepared to have the industrial and financial tycoons of this country put the working man in chains while they continue to pick his pocket," Douglas declared.

At a press conference at which he outlined labor's new social action emphasis, MacDonald said CLC member unions would be asked to put up funds for an expanded social role.

He suggested the organization of associations for the unemployed and for tenants and called for the development of consumer co-operative.

He predicted changes in the structure of organized labor to meet new conditions created by the appearance of multi-national corporations:

"Perhaps the time has arrived when the trade unions of the free world must develop institutional patterns that will enable them to confront the multi-national corporation on its own level so that the great economic strength which such corporations can muster will not be met by an internationally-fragmented labor force."

Delegates were quick to respond to MacDonald's plea for more interest in social problems. On the convention's first day they adopted a strong policy statement on water pollution declaring that Canada—in its race for industrial progress and economic growth—has paid scant attention to the "ruthless" spoilage of nature.

It calls for stiffer anti-pollution legislation and urges unions to counteract "political buck-passing by federal, provincial and municipal authorities."

The convention also adopted a resolution on human rights which, among other things, proposes that experienced workers adopt a "buddy system" to help people from minority groups working for the same employer.

A resolution on women's rights, says governments should legislate for and unions bargain for maternity leave, day care centers and equal pay for equal work. It also reaffirms the CLC stand that legal abortions should be granted "on the request of the person involved."

The delegates also adopted a policy statement calling for immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cambodia, Laos and Viet Nam and urging the Canadian government to offer Canada's armed forces to the UN as part of a proposed independent force to keep peace in the area.

IUE's Jennings, GE's Chief Bargainer Stay Poles Apart on Strike's Impact

New York—Paul Jennings and Virgil Day sat on opposite sides of the bargaining table during the 102-day General Electric strike earlier this year. They sat side-by-side on the speakers' platform during the second annual Collective Bargaining Forum here.

But it wasn't quite the millenium. They remained poles apart in their evaluation of the strike and in their concept of the labor relations challenge of the new decade.

Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, said the lesson of the GE strike is that collective bargaining must be a two-way process, that workers will no longer sit still for the unilateral "take-it-or-leave-it" concept of Boulwarism.

The GE strike, he said, demonstrated the ability of autonomous international unions to work together and overcome the divide-and-conquer strategy the company has depended on in the past to force inferior settlements.

The entire labor movement rallied behind the strike, Jennings said, because they realized that it was the basic principle of collective bargaining, more than just wages, that was at stake.

Turning to Day, GE's vice president for industrial relations, Jennings said the future of union-management relations at GE will be shaped between now and 1973, when the current contract expires.

"We have until then," he said, "to look at the roots and issues of the strike with the goal of developing a healthy relationship."

If such a relationsehip isn't developed, Jennings warned, then 1973 will see only "a repetition of what has happened in the past."

When it was Day's turn at the microphone, he declined to debate the sophisticated union-weakening tactics initiated by his predecessor at GE, Lemuel Boulware.

"In my opinion," Day said blandly, "Boulwarism never existed."

With that out of the way, the GE executive warned that the 1970s could be "a decade of disaster for the American worker—in part self-inflicted with the aquiescence and misleadership of those officials who seem to be overly responsive to the membership and their very real fears of inflation."

With the economy weakening and a "pinch" on profits, unions should lower their wage demands, Day suggested.

Management should show "tougher backbone" at the bargaining table. And there is need, Day claimed, for "labor law reform" to restore "management rights."

Day called on corporate management to get more involved in politics.

He complained that "labor's legislative program is an adjunct of its economic program. Its occupational safety bill would aid strikes . . . by permitting federally ordered shutdowns. Raising the minimum wage affects negotiated rates. Pension changes and higher social security taxes impose costs without bargaining."

And "ironically," the GE executive complained, labor's political power "seems all the stronger under a Republican regime than under a Democrat."

His evidence? The settlement of the postal dispute was announced from the AFL-CIO headquarters. "The entire Administration was outmaneuvered by the labor establishment" . . . and the stage was set "for broad-scale capture of all federal employes by AFL-CIO unions."

There was one area of agreement, however, between GE's Virgil Day and the IUE's Paul Jennings.

Both had high praise for Dir. Curtis Counts of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service for his "imaginative" and successful efforts to bring both sides to an agreement.

Role of Bargaining Affirmed at Forum

members' welfare, and their leaders' jobs."

Another statement by the NAM spokesman, however, symbolized the common framework which brought together some 500 union and management officials, mediators, university professors and other labor relations experts.

"Collective bargaining is a very resilient instrument," Lumb said. "It has already met a host of new challenges as they have arisen—supplementary unemployment benefits, automation funds and the like—and I am confident it is equal to future problems."

Meany concurred in the sentiment and said because it has worked so well collective bargaining rights should be extended "to every worker in the land," including government employes and farm workers.

"I think it is wrong for Congress to sit back and watch the farm workers wage their uphill battle for simple equity, unprotected by law," Meany said.

"I think it is wrong that Congress and state legislatures and city councils and school boards try to legislate their employes into voiceless, powerless second-class citizenship."

The forum was sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, set up with union, management and public participation. Kirkland is president of the institute and Deputy Postmaster Gen. E. T. Klassen, former president of the American Can Co., is board chairman. Theodore W. Kheel, one of the nation's top arbitrators, is adviser to the institute.

At several of the many panel sessions, participants raised the question of whether some of the techniques of collective bargaining could be applied to social, political and community disputes as an alternative to tactics of confrontation.

Bayard Rustin, the civil rights leader, said community disputes are not exactly comparable to labor-management issues but the concept is "worth exploring." He said the A. Philip Randolph Foundation, of which he is director, plans to examine the possibilities.

Meany told the forum that collective bargaining "won't work for campus revolutionaries . . . or for anyone who is more interested in aggravating or perpetuating conflict, than resolving it."

Neither, he said, will it work for people who say "take it or leave it" or who submit "non-negotiable demands."

But collective bargaining is a tool, he stressed, "for reasonable people who believe in democracy . . . who are willing to make and keep firm agreements for specific periods of time and then re-examine their goals, modify their agreement and move forward for another period of time."

With some management dissent as to the public employe sector, there appeared to be a general agreement among conference participants with the assertion by Kheel that "collective bargaining cannot take place without the possibility of a strike."

The New York mediator said the strike is "not just a right of labor" but "essential to the collective bargaining process."

Despite "remarkable strides," collective bargaining in the public sector "is still in a primitive state," Kirkland noted, and there is "no more important a task" than achieving the maturity of bargaining that has been reached in private industry.

"Legal bans against strikes, with their injunctions and penalties," Kirkland said, "will sooner or later find mediators and management searching desperately for someone with whom to bargain an end to the eventual uprising of workers whose leaders are enjoined or in jail—and the first item in question will be the amnesty arrangement."

Top elected officials of a number of unions were among the speakers and panel chairmen, including these union presidents and AFL-CIO Executive Council members: John H. Lyons, Iron Workers; Joseph A. Beirne, Communications Workers; I. W. Abel, Steelworkers; Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Jerry Wurf, State, County & Municipal Employes. Other panelists included union staff experts and attorneys.

Romney's Candle Sheds Little Light

New York—George Romney lit a sacrificial candle at the Collective Bargaining Forum here and invited his audience of business executives, union officials, lawyers and arbitrators to follow his example. There were no immediate takers.

The Secretary of Housing & Urban Development indicated that the Administration isn't doing enough, in his opinion, to combat inflation. "I believe we need to light candles of leadership, example and sacrifice," Romney said.

"As my personal contribution to the battle against cost-push inflation," he announced, "I am returning to the Treasury a portion of my salary . . . amounting to a 25 percent cut in pay." He invited his audience to "join me," declaring that "your example, your sacrifice, could have a tangible effect in slowing the wage-cost-price spiral."

Meany Lauds Long Service Of McCormack

The AFL-CIO paid warm tribute to House Speaker John W. McCormack for his "years of distinguished service to the nation" and "warm friendship for organized labor" as the veteran Democratic leader prepared for retirement at the end of the current congressional session.

McCormack announced he will not seek another term this November from the district in Boston which he has represented in the House for 42 years. The 78-year-old speaker will have served more consecutive years in that post on May 29 than any other speaker in the history of the country.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired McCormack that "America owes you a hearty vote of appreciation and America's workers are proud to extend their deep-felt thanks."

McCormack said he favors House Majority Leader Carl Albert, 62, of Oklahoma, for the speaker's post. Other key Democratic House leaders also indicated support for Albert who is widely regarded as the front-runner if the Democrats retain control of the House in the November elections. A contest, however, was shaping up for the majority leader's post and possibly for the third leadership spot of House whip.

UNION AND MANAGEMENT participants in the Collective Bargaining Forum sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations listen to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland during a three-day program in New York. Kirkland is president of the institute.

Full Negotiating Rights Hold Key To Governments' Labor Relations

New York—Public employers and administrators of non-profit institutions were put on notice here that they face a choice between full collective bargaining or head-on confrontation with their workers.

The dramatic surge of union membership and militancy among public employes was reflected in the heavy attention given this segment of the economy during the three-day Collective Bargaining Forum.

Repressive, restrictive legislation hasn't worked and won't work, Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes warned.

It only breeds "militancy and confrontation," Wurf said. "Public workers in America have learned that if they are organized strongly enough, and if they push hard enough, they can cope with the unreasonableness to which they are subjected."

While firmly opposing either a legal ban on strikes or compulsory arbitration, Wurf suggested that "voluntary agreement to arbitrate . . . when used sparingly after all other remedies have been exhausted . . . may prove to be a useful procedure in resolving the tougher impasses."

He invited the leading associations of city, county and state governments to join with the union in an impartial study of public employment impasse procedures. "While we demand the right to strike," Wurf said, "it is our last and most undesirable resort."

James C. Gildea, who served as chief negotiator for seven postal unions in the historic negotiations earlier this spring, said the "most significant long-term result" is achievement of "that first-class citizenship postal workers have been denied for so long."

Improvements Predicted

Gildea, the executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, predicted that the postal breakthrough will lead to comparable collective bargaining for all federal employes.

"It is the beginning of the end of paternalism for public workers everywhere," he declared.

The postal negotiations were marked by the "absolutely essential ingredient" of all successful bargaining, Gildea stressed—mutual respect and good faith efforts to reach agreement.

He said the negotiations were helped also by a public information policy of joint statements only, and no "leaks" or "public posturing" to interfere with the bargaining process.

The federal government's example was cited at another panel discussion as a model that should be followed by non-profit institutions, such as hospitals, colleges and nursing homes.

Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, said labor relations in this big area of employment are still largely governed by "the law of the jungle."

With few exceptions, these institutions are exempt from a legal requirement to recognize and bargain with unions representing their workers.

And too many institutions, he said, despite "pious pronouncements" fight organization of their workers in ways that would be illegal for a private employer.

Many of the longest and most bitter strikes, Donahue said, are fought over the issue of union recognition.

There is clear need for coverage of these employers under federal labor law and for the National Labor Relations Board to assert its jurisdiction in areas where it has that option, he declared.

Without waiting for the compulsion of law, Donahue said, nonprofit institutions should follow the example of the federal government in demonstrating an affirmative willingness for their employes to organize and bargain collectively.

On the same theme, Jack Golodner said the generally low level of pay and benefits in non-profit institutions "makes collective bargaining imperative."

Golodner, who is executive secretary of the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes, noted that two out of three American workers are employed in service-producing fields rather than in production of tangible goods. Too many of them, he said, remain "beyond the pale of modern labor relations law."

House Unit Votes Down Federal Mortgage Bank

The House Banking Committee has turned down a labor-supported mortgage credit bill that would have established a National Development Bank to make mortgage and construction money available for non-luxury housing at a reasonable interest rate.

Before the committee voted 21-15 against the bill, the AFL-CIO had praised the concept of a "bank of last resort" as both economically sound and socially desirable.

It would have loaned money to help finance low- and moderate-income housing at an interest rate not exceeding 6.5 percent. Fourteen Republicans were joined by seven Democrats in the vote to reject the plan.

The money would have come from an initial Treasury appropriation plus a small portion of pension funds, bank reserves and assets of tax-exempt foundations.

This compulsory investment of up to 2.5 percent of funds with assets of more than $4 million would have been guaranteed by the government and would have paid interest rates comparable to bonds issued by other federal agencies.

Supporters are expected to try to revive the bill at a later date.

The legislation is based on a finding by Congress "that inflation and high interest, tight money conditions are making it impossible to meet the national housing goals for low- and moderate-income families."

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.), termed the proposed development bank "a far superior concept than any other currently before Congress."

Many union-management administered pension funds already have investments in low- and moderate-income housing, Biemiller noted, and would not be required to make further investments.

As for the argument that lesser earnings on corporate pension funds would be unfair, Biemiller noted that most such funds return fixed benefits to the workers, with the added profit going to reduce the company's payment.

Thus, he said, "if the corporation earns 12 percent by lending money to build textile mills in Taiwan or gambling casinos in the Bahamas, the worker does not receive the added interest rate in a larger pension."

The House bill, he stressed, would guarantee that "at least a token sum—2.5 percent—would go into a direct benefit to working Americans and their families in the form of much-needed housing."

And "it would also provide employment for many idle American construction workers."

New Reports Show:

Economic Downturn Deepens Recession

The nation's economy continued on a downward course in mid-May and high government officials conceded that unemployment could well continue to rise in coming months.

New reports and indicators all pointed to an increasingly severe recession with the slowdown in business activity knocking out $3 billion from corporate income taxes and producing deficits in federal government budgets for the current fiscal year and the new one starting July 1. The Nixon Administration had earlier predicted surpluses in each year.

The Wall Street Journal reported in a lead article that "the business slowdown is turning out to be considerably more severe than most economists had anticipated."

The paper had earlier noted that industrial production had "resumed its long decline" in April after rising a bit in March; that a surge in new social security checks saved a drop in personal income for the first time in five years; that overall inflation in the first quarter of the year "was much worse than reported earlier, while real output fell twice as fast as estimated originally" for the period.

Arthur F. Burns, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and an architect of Administration economic policy before he was named to the FRB, told a Senate committee that unemployment "could rise a little in the months immediately ahead." While predicting an economic recovery before the year is over, Burns added that he would not wait until unemployment "rises much more" above the 4.8 percent rate registered in April before Congress creates standby public hiring programs.

Burns a few days later told an American Bankers Association conference that the time might be at hand to try and establish some form of wage-price guidelines—known to economists as an incomes policy—to augment an admittedly faltering Administration attack on inflation.

Burns, long identified as opposed to such guidelines, said such a program used temporarily could play a "useful—albeit a very modest—role" in restraining price increases in a sluggish economy. He said such a policy should stop "well short" of wage and price controls.

Pres. Nixon disclosed the impact of the recession on corporate income taxes in issuing a report on likely budget deficits. He coupled it with a request to Congress for a 2.3 cents-a-gallon levy on leaded gasoline, both as an anti-pollution device and a method of raising $1.6 billion in revenue for the new fiscal year. Lead additives in gasoline have been indicted as major contributors to air pollution, and the proposed tax was described as a method of setting an incentive for the rapid development of low or lead-free gasoline.

In February 1970, the Administration forecast budget surpluses of $1.5 billion for the current fiscal year and $1.3 billion for next year. Revised estimates showed these would now become deficits of $1.8 billion and $1.3 billion.

The President ruled out any additional taxes this year but left the door open to a possible request for higher taxes in his budget next January.

His estimate of a $1.3 billion deficit for the fiscal year starting July 1, 1970, was based on congressional approval of higher postal rates, the new tax on leaded gasoline, a speed-up in estate and gift tax collections, and reduced spending on education and agricultural programs as well as a lid on general appropriations.

The stock market greeted the announcement of anticipated budget deficits by renewing its decline after a brief, sharp reversal running through several days.

Fund Hike Backed For Arts Program

Congress was urged to approve the increased appropriations for the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities as recommended in Pres. Nixon's budget for fiscal 1971.

In letters to both the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller noted that in the few years of its existence, the foundation has achieved an outstanding record of working to preserve the country's cultural heritage "while making it possible for more Americans to enjoy its richness and contribute to it."

LABOR HISTORIAN Philip Taft, left, presents to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany the 60-volume set of books he and editor-author Leon Stein of the Ladies' Garment Workers created, "American Labor: from Conspiracy to Collective Bargaining." Meany gave the set to the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. Listening to Taft's comments on the books are Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director of the center, and Walter G. Davis, right, AFL-CIO director of education.

5 Percent Social Security Boost, Added Gains Approved by House

leaving the other features of the bill intact.

Despite opposition from Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), it was adopted by a 233-144 vote.

The final version of the bill was then approved and sent to the Senate by a 343-32 vote.

To finance the higher benefits, the wage base on which the social security tax is paid equally by workers and employers would be increased from the first $7,800 of income under the present law, to the first $9,000, starting Jan. 1, 1971.

The tax rate is already scheduled to go up, under present law, to 5.2 percent each for workers and employers, in 1971, to reach a top of 5.9 percent in 1987. The figure includes both the basic old age, survivors and disability insurance plus the amount earmarked for the Medicare program.

Under the House bill, the tax rate would move slightly above the presently-scheduled increases in 1975 and by 1987 would total 6.5 percent.

Another section of the House bill gives the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare some additional powers to curb price-gouging by doctors or hospitals.

Also, in what was viewed by the AFL-CIO as a major step forward, it permits persons eligible for Medicare and the supplementary voluntary health insurance, to choose to have their care provided by a prepaid group health plan.

In such cases, the government would pay up to 95 percent of the current per capita cost of the Medicare program towards the cost of the prepaid group program.

Another desired change makes it possible for persons not covered by social security, but who may be covered by other retirement systems, to "buy" Medicare coverage either individually or as a group.

A teacher's retirement fund, for example, could elect to use part of its assets to purchase Medicare coverage for its members over 65. The current cost would be $27 a month, a figure that would rise over the years, however, as hospital costs go up.

Among the many changes made by the House in the basic social security program, these are the ones affecting the largest number of people:

- Under present law, working women who retire at age 62 have an advantage over men who retire at the same age. The chief difference is that average earnings for men are computed up to age 65, for women only to age 62. The House bill would apply to men the same rules now applied to women. The change would provide an additional $925 million a year in benefits; an estimated 10.2 million persons now on the rolls would receive increases, and an additional 60,000 workers and dependents would be added to the rolls.

- Present law sets a widow's benefit applied for at age 62 or later at 82.5 percent of the primary insurance amount of the wage earner. The House bill would set the benefit at 100 percent of the primary insurance amount if first applied for at age 65, with a lesser increase if applied for between 62 and 65. It would result in $700 million in additional benefits the first year for some 3.3 million widows and dependent widowers.

- The amount a beneficiary under 72 may earn in a year without a reduction in social security benefits would be increased from the present level of $1,680 to $2,000. Thereafter, as under present law, benefits would be reduced $1 for each $2 of earnings for the next $1,200, and thereafter reduced dollar-for-dollar.

The added benefits of $475 million would go to some 900,000 persons who would receive higher social security payments and to an estimated 100,000 persons not now eligible who would receive some benefits under the new legislation.

- Some 60,000 disabled workers would benefit from a liberalization of present law as it applies to persons who receive both social security disability benefits and workmen's compensation.

Now, social security disability benefits must be reduced when the combined payments exceed 80 percent of a worker's average earnings before disablement. The House bill would not reduce social security benefits until combined payments exceed 100 percent of earnings before the disability.

In one area, however, the House bill moves a step backwards. It repeals a provision in the present law requiring states to establish comprehensive Medicaid programs for the poor and low-income groups by 1977. Only 26 states now cover the medically-needy under the combined state-federal program.

The AFL-CIO has urged an expansion of health services, not a cutback, through a national health insurance program spelled out in legislation introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.).

Consumer Prices Continue Surge, Buying Power Takes New Dive

property taxes and mortgage interest.

The overall cost of home ownership is up 10.9 percent in the past year, ranking behind the 12 percent increase in the cost of public transportation as the year's biggest increases, Popkin pointed out.

Prices in the grocery store showed no increase in April and some items, such as eggs and pork, actually dropped from the previous month. Popkin credited the stability in the "food at home" prices with decreasing the entire index by one-tenth of 1 percent, but noted that the same could be said of other groupings on the index.

While "food at home" prices fell, restaurant prices increased sharply enough to show a slight rise in the food category overall.

Increases in auto insurance premiums and parking fees were instrumental in increasing transportation services significantly, the bureau said. Gasoline prices rose 3.4 percent and used cars, after several months of decline, cost 3 percent more in April.

Medical care services rose seven-tenths of 1 percent in April, but that was less than the drastic one-month rise of a full 1 percent in March. Medical care services now have climbed 2.4 percent in the last three months and 6 percent in the past year.

On a seasonally-adjusted basis, the BLS pegged the April increase at five-tenths of 1 percent instead of six-tenths. On that basis, the CPI increase was four-tenths of 1 percent for March and five-tenths in February.

The increase in consumer prices as well as a slight reduction in the workweek accounted for the reduction in weekly earnings in April. Gross weekly earnings of production and nonsupervisory workers remained virtually unchanged in April, at $117.98, a slight gain which was more than offset by increases in consumer prices.

Spendable earnings—weekly pay after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—averaged $103.44 in April for a worker with three dependents. That is an increase of only 5 cents per week over the previous month and $5.62, or 5.7 percent, more than a year ago.

"Real" spendable earnings—expressed in 1957-59 dollars, averaged $77.19, a decisive drop of 43 cents from March and 20 cents below April 1969.

A seasonal increase in the construction workweek in April kept the gross weekly earnings from being even lower. All major industries with the exception of construction showed declines in real gross earnings from the previous month.

Demand Builds for Action To Halt Economic Slump

House Votes Plan to Spur U.S. Shipping

The House has voted near-unanimous approval of a 10-year program aimed at building at least 300 modern merchant ships in U.S. yards and sending them to sea flying the American flag and manned by American seamen.

The Administration's bill — with the need to strengthen it in one area—had labor's strong support.

Its passage by a 307-1 vote in the House was hailed by Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. as evidence of a firm commitment by Congress to "long overdue . . . expansion of American-flag shipping and shipbuilding."

He termed it "an important first step" towards "revitalization of our merchant fleet."

The bill now goes to the Senate, where the AFL-CIO, affiliated unions and the federation's Metal Trades Dept. will seek to improve a section in the House-passed bill that would weaken existing law.

The Administration's original legislative proposal had been for complete repeal of the "buy American" provision of the 1936 Merchant Marine Act, which required all components of ships built with U.S. subsidies to be American-made.

The House Merchant Marine Committee modified this to require that "major components of the hull and superstructure" be of domestic origin, but allowing imports of all other components, including such major items as generators.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate's Merchant Marine subcommittee that the federation "firmly supports" the goal of the House-passed bill which "will make great strides" towards reviving the U.S. merchant fleet. But he said any change in the "buy American" provision of the law would be "counter-productive."

An AFL-CIO convention resolution, Biemiller noted, specifically opposed any weakening of the requirement that American merchant ships "be built in the United States by American workers with American-made products."

Metal Trades Pres. Maywood Boggs strongly urged that the House loophole be closed, terming it "a bread-and-butter matter" to union members.

Boggs cited increased unemployment, the "drying-up of industrial capacity" and the drain on

Four Unions Urge Curbs On Imports

Four unions representing textile workers and both the men's and women's apparel industries, joined in urging Congress to regulate imports of textiles and clothing from low-wage nations.

Appearing as a panel before the House Ways & Means Committee were:

- William Pollock, president of the Textile Workers Union of America.
- George Baldanzi, president of the United Textile Workers.
- Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, representing ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg.
- Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

"We cannot compete with wages of 8 cents an hour in South Korea, or even of 36 cents an hour in Japan," Potofsky told the committee. "We cannot compete, and we don't want to compete, with wages such as these."

The Clothing Workers believe, he stressed, in "orderly" international trade, "without inequities or harmful effects on any of the countries involved."

Teper told the committee that the volume of apparel imports into the United States jumped 661 percent between 1956 and 1969, at a heavy cost in U.S. jobs.

Baldanzi said the average textile worker in the United States now earns only about half the amount the Labor Dept. has said is needed

'Open Wider!'

White House Draws Fire On Policies

The Nixon Administration's economic policies came under sharp new attack as the nation continued in the grip of a recession and evidence mounted of a continuing downward movement.

The rising unemployment, unchecked inflation and the plunging and erratic stock market all brought new demands for changes in policy to shore up the economy.

Top Democratic congressional leaders said the Administration is responsible for "an economic crisis of major magnitude" and that its use of "archaic economic policies" had brought on the "worst inflation in 20 years."

House Speaker John W. McCormack, Majority Leader Carl Albert and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield called on the President to summon a nationwide conference on inflation and unemployment and to adopt stand-by wage and price controls. They called also for use of wage and price guidelines as one step to slow living costs.

The latest furor over the economic situation came when the Administration asked Congress to increase the ceiling on the national debt by $18 billion so the government can borrow enough funds to meet its current deficit—brought on by a drop in the anticipated annual rate of corporate profits and a drop in corporate income taxes.

The Administration's bid was approved by the House Ways & Means Committee along with a report that the anticipated budget deficit would likely increase both for fiscal 1970 and 1971. It touched off a sharp decline in the stock market with the key Dow-Jones index reaching the lowest point since November 1962.

Labor's Skills on Display:

New Orleans Hails Union Label Show

By Eugene A. Kelly

New Orleans—Citizens of the Deep South got their first look at the kaleidoscopic variety of products produced by union employes of fair employers, and seemed to like what they saw at the 1970 Union-Industries Show.

The 25th show in the series that started in 1938 revealed an overflowing cornucopia of union label products and services for an audience that seemed sure to break last year's attendance mark of 200,000 at Denver.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland set the tone when he said before cutting the symbolic opening-day ribbon:

"For a long time this show has been the major showcase for the success of the American collective bargaining system."

"We in labor," Kirkland said, "are proud of this show and everything it stands for. We are proud of our products and of our employers and of the union labels, and shop cards and buttons that guarantee quality."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summed it up also in a message read to an opening-day audience of exhibitors, Delta area union members and leaders of the New Orleans business and political community.

"The amazing skills and outstanding products on display here will give an insight into America's awesome industrial power," Meany said.

That power, he emphasized, "rests securely on the 150,000 labor agreements through which nearly 14 million trade unionists and many thousands of employers have achieved mutual respect, cooperation and a degree of teamwork unmatched anywhere else in the world."

Each show, the federation leader wrote, surpasses the one before "as a showcase of American craftsmanship and imagination and of the tangible fruits of cooperation between free labor and free management."

Pres. Richard M. Nixon sent a message saying "you are an inspiration to all our society of what can be achieved when all segments join in a common effort."

Nixon said "I salute the 1970

New York Printers Win Key Contracts

New York—The Typographical Union won contract settlements totaling nearly 42 percent in improved benefits over a three-year period from the New York Times and the Daily News, then sought the same terms from the New York Post and the Long Island Press.

The proposed settlement headed off a shutdown at the Times, whose first rejected offer to the ITU's "Big Six" local was below the rise in the cost of living since the previous contract was negotiated.

The new Times contract, if ratified by 900 ITU members in its final form, will give the printers a 15 percent pay increase this year, an additional 11 percent next year and 11 percent more the third year. Compounding brings the offer to 41.69 percent by the final year, according to the Times.

Local 6 Pres. Bertram Powers called the agreement "the best we ever negotiated." A spokesman for the Times was quoted as saying he was "delighted a settlement had been achieved."

When a similar settlement was reached the following day with the Daily News, the newspaper's president, W. T. James, charged that it was "excessive."

The two dailies are expected to make the same wage offer to nine other unions representing employes. But the Newspaper Guild, which bargains individually with each paper, said other issues beside wages remain to be settled at the Times, News and Post.

Other unions involved are the Mailers, Newspaper Deliverers,

Senate Unit Approves Postal Reorganization

The Senate Post Office Committee put its stamp of approval on an amended version of the postal reorganization, pay and collective bargaining agreement negotiated in April by unions and the Administration.

Despite some changes, its labor relations provisions were substantially closer to the negotiated agreement than a bill approved two weeks earlier by the House Post Office Committee.

The full House and Senate still have to act on the legislation, and the committee bills will be subject to further amendment from the floor.

The Senate bill follows the agreement by specifying that wages and other conditions of employment in the new United States Postal Service will be negotiated in nationwide bargaining.

Until some other union can win a national election, the 700,000 postal workers will be represented by the seven postal crafts that won exclusive national recognition eight years ago in the biggest union representation election ever held in the United States.

The Senate did, however, add a

Oregon Blocks Bid to Lower Voting Age

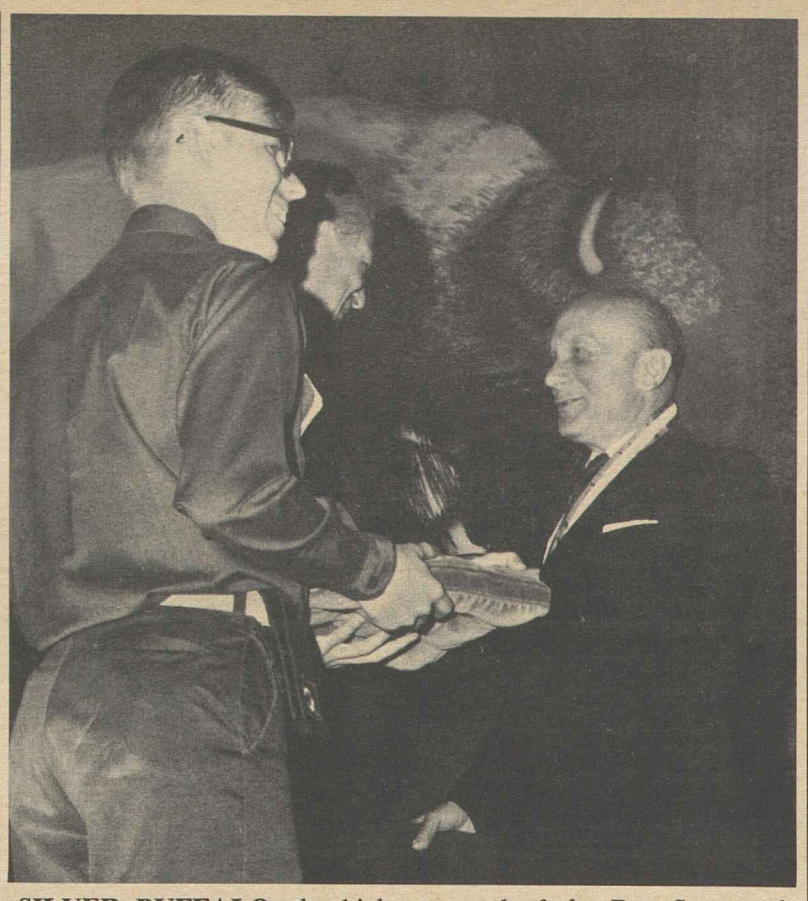
A voter "backlash" to campus demonstrations was widely credited in Oregon as a major factor in the defeat of a proposal to lower the voting age to 19.



Although supported by most candidates for public office and by the State AFL-CIO, the lower voting age was rejected by a big margin in May 26 balloting.

Oregon voters approved a bond issue for sewage treatment plants but turned down bonds for public building construction. In the city of Eugene, voters directed a four-year delay in spending bond money voted two years ago for construction of a nuclear reactor electric power plant. The campaign for delay was based on the argument that more information is needed about radiation safety hazards.

In the state's primary elections, incumbent congressmen of both parties won easy re-election. Republican Gov. Tom McCall will face Democratic State Treas. Robert W. Straub in November, in a rematch of the 1966 gubernatorial contest.

Across the country, in Kentucky, incumbent congressmen also breezed to victory in their party primaries. Democrat Carl D. Perkins, chairman of the House Labor Committee, had no primary opposition in his bid for a 12th term and will face a little-known Republican, Herbert E. Myers, in November.

In the most hotly-contested primary, Romano J. Mazoli, a critic of U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia, won the Democratic nomination in Louisville and will face incumbent Republican William O. Cowger.

Action Urged to Stem Deepening Recession

came a report from the Labor Dept. that the number of major labor areas with substantial or persistent unemployment had increased to 11 in April 1970, compared to eight the previous month and six a year ago.

Wholesale prices which had held steady in April for the first time in a year and one-half, moved up again in May.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of eight leading indicators dropped again, reaching the lowest level since November 1968.

Interest rates on short-term government bills and notes moved upwards again after dropping slightly in the past few months.

Meanwhile, key spokesmen for the Administration on economic policy defended their position in a number of speeches and interviews, maintaining in general that the policies were working, would take more time and produce some "pain" before the inflationary trends were stopped.

The President held a White House dinner to discuss the financial and other problems with 40 of the nation's top business and financial leaders.

Besides the debt limit bill which was headed for House action, a House Government Operations subcommittee approved a measure to give the President's Council of Economic Advisers authority to set up wage-price guidelines. The Administration is opposed to the measure.

David Rockefeller, chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank, called on the President to make a series of television talks to the nation on the need for "responsible" wage and price behavior.

Other business leaders talked in terms of direct wage and price controls while the view that guidelines, or an "incomes" policy ought to be tried came from the 22-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development.

National Health Plan Gains Added Sponsors

A labor-backed National Health Insurance bill has been reintroduced in the House with the names of 20 other congressmen who are joining Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) as co-sponsors.

Several other House members earlier introduced identical bills.

The new push for national health insurance came amid mounting congressional concern over soaring costs of Medicare and Medicaid programs—and a warning that hospital charges could rise to a staggering $1,000-a-day by the end of the decade in some areas.

One of the goals of the Griffiths bill is to hold down health care costs while making efficient health services available nationwide to all Americans.

"The longer we put off a comprehensive national health program with comprehensive financing," Mrs. Griffiths said, "the more it will cost when we finally implement it. In the meantime, Americans will continue to pay more and more for less than adequate care."

Under the labor-backed bill, the federal government would negotiate a contract with groups of doctors, hospitals and laboratories to provide health care for people living in their area for a negotiated price. The medical professions, in effect, would be paid a reasonable fee to keep people well, with their profits going up if they were successful and down if inefficiencies pushed up costs.

Joining Mrs. Griffiths in reintroducing the bill as H.R. 17806 were the following Democratic congressmen: Jonathan B. Bingham, Thaddeus J. Dulski and James H. Scheuer of New York; George E. Brown, Jr., Phillip Burton, James C. Corman, George P. Miller, John E. Moss and John V. Tunney of California; Charles C. Diggs, Jr., James G. O'Hara and John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan; Richard Bolling and Leonor K. Sullivan of Missouri; Abner J. Mikva, Illinois; Joseph E. Karth, Minnesota; Edith Green, Oregon; Samuel J. Friedel, Maryland; John H. Dent, Pennsylvania, and Ken Hechler, West Virginia.

Earlier, companion bills had been introduced by Jacob H. Gilbert and Joseph P. Addabbo, both of New York.

Social Security Actuary Quits

Robert J. Myers, chief actuary of the Social Security Administration, has resigned after charging that the Nixon Administration's tougher policies on social security are being ignored by agency higher-ups.

Myers had made his charges in an article in Reader's Digest magazine and resigned when he said Administration officials refused to heed them.

In his letter of resignation, Myers further charged that social security officials will not follow the Nixon policy. "Rather, they will exert their efforts to expand the social security program as much as possible."

He has consistently taken a conservative approach to social security and has opposed labor-supported efforts to expand benefits.

Actors Re-Elect Frederick O'Neal

New York — Pres. Frederick O'Neal of Actors' Equity and five other incumbent officers were re-elected for three-year terms in a membership referendum. One new vice president was elected—Nancy Lynch, representing the chorus.

Nine incumbents and six new members were chosen as union councilors. New councilors are Herb Davis, Salem Ludwig, Alan Manson, Michael Prince, Zale Kessler and Ronnie Britton.

O'Neal has been Equity president since 1964. He is also an AFL-CIO vice president.

Pizer Retires as President:

Furniture Workers Elect Fred Fulford

New York—The Furniture Workers elected two new top officers at its convention here as Pres. Morris Pizer became president emeritus and called for "intensive, well-directed organizational efforts" to offset the impact of mergers and the growth of conglomerates, automation and imported furniture.

The 16th convention gave Pizer a unanimous rising vote as president emeritus after 24 years in the top post.

The 200 delegates representing 50,000 members elected Fred Fulford as their new president, and chose Dir. W. Carl Scarbrough of the union's southern region as secretary-treasurer replacing Fulford.

Fulford, like Pizer, was a founding member of the union and had served in the secretary-treasurer's post for 20 years. Both men stressed the importance of launching a coordinated organizing drive in cooperation with other unions, particularly in the Southeast.

Support for that concept came from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, who recalled that cordination among 13 striking unions "defeated a mighty giant—the General Electric Co."

Boulwarism was "buried by 150,000 trade unionists in 34 states who refused to be shaken by any weapon" that GE could use against them, Kirkland told the delegates. He added: "The strikers made victory possible. What made it certain was the total, unified support" of other union members.

There are no limits, Kirkland said, to labor's ability to take on any kind of a struggle "when the cause is just and the issues are understood."

He pointed out that the increasing strength of labor has been demonstrated, by farm workers and government workers — the Farm Workers Organizing Committee by winning contracts and postal workers by "becoming the first federal employes in history to sit down with a member of the President's Cabinet" to negotiate a contract covering wages and conditions.

Kirkland reminded the delegates of the importance of getting members and their friends to register and vote.

COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan stressed the same point, charging the Nixon Administration with forcing workers to "bear the burden of the fight against inflation," and calling on the delegates to support candidates who oppose that economic policy.

Dir. William L. Kircher of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization led a discussion about organizing problems. He praised Pizer's dedication, as did Barkan and Pres. I. W. Abel, of the Steelworkers and the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

A banquet honoring Pizer was a convention high point.

The delegates elected the union's first Negro vice president, LeRoy Clark, organizer in the southern region. Another new vice president is Robert Sebera for the Midwest. Fred Stefan for the western region and Frank Marino, eastern, were re-elected.

In a move to give ethnic minorities greater representation, the convention expanded the UFWA executive board by four and elected four Negro members.

Abe Spradling Dies, Headed Transit Union

Cincinnati—Abe L. Spradling, president of the Transit Union from 1946 to 1959 and an AFL-CIO vice president until he retired, died unexpectedly at 84 after a short illness.

Top officers of the union and executive board members attended services in the Hodapp funeral home here. Burial was near his boyhood home in Versailles, Ky.

Spradling became a motorman for the Cincinnati Traction Co. at the age of 17. In 1913 he helped form Division 17 of the former Street Railway union and was its secretary-treasurer for 20 years. He became an international vice president in 1927, an executive board member in 1935, and an assistant to the president at headquarters in 1936.

He succeeded the late Pres. W. D. Mahon in 1946 and retired in 1959. Survivors include a stepson, James Jones, and two grandchildren. His wife Mary died in 1967.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland extended sympathy in a message saying Spradling was a "fine friend and staunch trade unionist. His was a long life of service to his fellow men, his union, the entire labor movement. He served them all with dedication and distinction."

Potofsky Keynotes ACWA Convention:

Clothing Union Cites Gains, Warns of Low-Pay Imports

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City—The 27th biennial convention of the Clothing Workers opened with a report of substantial gains for members in wages, working conditions and living standards, and a deep concern with domestic and foreign issues facing the union, the nation and the clothing industry.

Delegates heard ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky point out the gains in organizing during past two years—almost 17,000 new members were enrolled in the 400,000-member union.

Potofsky noted also that remarkable progress was made in medical and retirement programs, besides the improvements brought about through collective bargaining on wages.

He cited the expanded services offered by the ACWA medical centers, the opening of new day care centers for children of working mothers and expanding operations in housing programs.

Challenges facing the union, the executive board stressed in its report to the convention, included the continuing threat of imports affecting the jobs of its members.

Further deterioration of job security is resulting from the transformation of the clothing industry through conglomerate takeovers of smaller firms and the exploitation of tariff loopholes by companies setting up border plants in Mexico, the board reported.

Potofsky called for legislation to bring immediate quotas on imports.

"We believe in international trade," he said. "But the old concepts of international trade no longer hold true."

Noting that the imports from low-wage nations are flooding the rich American market, he warned that the "threat must be stopped now, before our industry is overwhelmed and our jobs are lost."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message to the ACWA that the federation "will not stand idly by while American jobs are exported to foreign lands."

Meany said that changes are sorely needed in current trade policies "which have caused job losses in your industry and many others in America."

Meany also cited the domestic problems facing the nation as "inflation continues unabated and unemployment grows—both facts are solid evidence that the Administration's economic policies are bankrupt and must be replaced."

Potofsky tied the domestic problems — inflation, unemployment, housing and growing dissent — to the Administration's Viet Nam policies.

Funds currently spent for the maintenance of the war are draining the resources needed for vital social programs in the United States, he declared.

"The President recently vetoed a measure of Congress providing $1.5 billion more for education on the ground that it is inflationary," he stressed. "Yet at the same time we are spending more than $2.5 billion a month on the war."

He called for an immediate disengagement from the U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia so that emphasis can be shifted to meeting the nation's domestic needs.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, in an address to the delegates, declared that the Administration's decision to enter Cambodia was made on the basis that it would result in bringing a quicker peace to Southeast Asia. He predicted that the results would become evident within three months.

On domestic problems, Shultz said that although inflation is not yet beaten, "there is some degree of confidence" that it is beginning to slow down.

All spoke against the Administration's Viet Nam policies.

Williams also called for effective action by labor in the fall election campaigns to insure that control of Congress will not be lost to the Republicans. He warned that a Republican Congress would "rubber-stamp" the Administration's "ineffective economic policies and the back-pedaling on human rights."

Turning to trade union issues, the delegates called for a major overhaul of the Fair Labor Standards Act. They adopted a resolution urging Congress to extend FLSA coverage to all wage and salary workers and to raise the federal minimum wage to $2.50 an hour. The resolution also proposed the reduction of the workweek to 35 hours with double pay for overtime work.

Other convention resolutions called for:

- Adoption of a federal minimum standard for states to follow on workmen's compensation benefits and extension of coverage to all workers.
- Improvements in federal health care programs through enactment of the labor-supported national health insurance plan for all citizens, improved training of health personnel, more financial aid for hospital construction, and safeguards for Medicare and Medicaid to check rising costs and profiteering.
- Denial of government contracts to companies that persist in violating the National Labor Relations Act and the FLSA.
- Wide-ranging federal programs of planning and financing urban development projects to meet the crisis of housing shortages, crowded and inadequate schools and the general deterioration of many urban facilities and services.

CLOTHING WORKERS Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky greets Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) at the opening session of the ACWA 27th biennial convention in Atlantic City. Williams called for labor support of congressional candidates in the fall election who will work for effective economic and human rights legislation.

Woodcock Is Auto Workers' New President

Detroit—Leonard Woodcock was elected president of the Auto Workers to succeed the late Walter P. Reuther and vowed to win contracts this year from the automobile and farm implement industries of which Reuther "would have been proud."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a message of congratulations and good wishes: "We recognize the heavy burden you face" in this year's auto negotiations and pledged the federation's full support in "these crucial bargaining sessions."

Woodcock, 59, was chosen by the union's executive board to fill the nearly two years remaining in Reuther's term of office. Reuther was killed May 9 in a plane crash which also took the lives of his wife May and four others.

Woodcock was Reuther's first administrative assistant and had been a UAW vice president and head of its General Motors department for 15 years.

Woodcock was born in Providence, R.I., received his early education in British schools when his parents moved overseas, and came to Detroit when he was 15. He attended Wayne State University and the Walsh Institute of Accountancy. In 1933 he got a job as a machine assembler at Detroit Gear & Machine, owned by Borg-Warner Corp., where he joined an AFL federal labor union which later became part of the UAW.

He served two years as education director for the Wayne County Industrial Union Council, and from 1940 to 1944 he was a UAW staff representative in western Michigan. He left the staff in the latter year for a job at Continental Motors Corp. in Muskegon, Mich., but returned to the UAW on Reuther's election as president.

Administration Policies Seen Fueling Inflation

St. Louis—U.S. Sen. Stuart Symington (D-Mo.), charged that the government is cutting its own throat by allowing unemployment to climb in its program to control inflation.

Symington spoke at a banquet closing the four-day convention of the United Shoe Workers here.

The convention re-elected USW Pres. George O. Fecteau and Sec.-Treas. Angelo G. Georgian. This is the first year that officers have been elected by convention delegates. In previous years a referendum of the total membership was required.

Departing from his prepared remarks, Symington charged that the administration's failure to curb interest rates has contributed heavily to inflation.

"Just this week the United States offered $3.6 billion in bonds for sale but couldn't find a buyer because the interest rates were too low. As a result the Federal Reserve Bank bought the issue.

"It is a most serious thing for the United States to buy its own securities, thus creating new money and adding new fuel to the inflationary fire."

The 250 delegates at the dinner applauded vigorously when Symington demanded that Administration leaders "stop worrying about the war and start worrying about what's going on here in the United States."

"It is time to get our economy moving again," the senator said. "I feel very strongly about this. What we need now from this Administration is action, not more rhetoric."

Symington endorsed the "crawling peg" quota system as a way to ease the crisis caused by the rising tide of shoe imports.

Under that system, proposed recently by Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.), a reasonable base number of imports is set and in the future the amount of imports allowed into this country would increase at a constant percentage as the level of domestic consumption increased.

Imports would therefore be permitted a share of the market, but would not drive domestic producers out of business, Symington explained.

"It is time for the United States to take a more firm and logical position with respect to its trade policies," he declared.

"We can no longer afford to agree to unilateral policies which not only curtail our exports to other countries but enable those countries to take over our domestic markets."

The senator had high praise for the labor movement, recalling the good relations he had had with labor when he was president of a St. Louis electrical equipment firm and in the various administrative posts he held in the federal government.

"Our nation today enjoys the highest standard of living in the world," he said. "The reason is collective bargaining."

Earlier, during a business session, convention delegates took issue with a recent government commission recommendation that negotiators have the full power to negotiate and sign contracts without a vote of the membership.

In a resolution, the delegates declared that "we, in accordance with the national wage policy, strongly oppose any move by any local union or union official to change the democratic procedures requiring approval of the rank and file before any contracts are accepted."

Court to Hear Union's Appeal Of Damage Suit

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear a union's appeal from an Alabama jury's verdict ordering the Boilermakers to pay $152,000 in damages to a man who was expelled by secret ballot vote of the membership after having tried to beat up his local's business agent.

Five years after the episode, the ousted member sued for both actual and punitive damages, but not for reinstatement to the union. The verdict against the union was upheld by the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

In accepting the case for review, the Supreme Court limited its consideration to two points:

- Whether, in a Landrum-Griffin Act proceeding, a federal court may substitute its own findings and interpretation of a union's constitution and by-laws for those of the union, and
- Whether the National Labor Relations Act, rather than the Landrum-Griffin Act, should be the governing law, since the plaintiff did not seek reinstatement of membership but claimed damages because of the union's alleged failure to refer the expelled member for employment.

Schnitzler Appointed To Civil Defense Panel

Former AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has been appointed by Pres. Nixon to serve on the National Civil Defense Advisory Council until Jan. 12, 1972.

The council usually meets annually for a one-day session in Washington to study the President's national civil defense program.

Graduation Gift

AS THE COUNTRY enters the time of college and high school commencement there is a palpable uneasiness, a growing concern and anxiety, not only about the mood of the campuses but of the future of a democratic nation.

The joy of celebration and achievement is being engulfed by this concern and anxiety so that the moment of graduating a new generation of leaders from our schools is muffled.

The dangers to American democracy that could flow from the events of the past month were touched on in a thoughtful editorial in the Wall Street Journal which commented that "the effective threat to American democracy will come from the political right. But . . . this is not because right-wing militants are more sinister than left-wing ones, but merely because of the historical truth that any people will pick repression over anarchy. If the American people come to believe these are their only choices, they too will support repression."

The Journal goes on to appeal to the center "to dampen the excessive judgments that are now appearing on both flanks," and warns that there is no longer any reason "to take for granted that everyone understands that the 175 years of American democracy are mankind's most splendid achievement of self-government, and that accordingly destroying it would be mankind's most unspeakable desecration."

If this is an accurate assessment of the temper of our times then the urgency of stemming the anti-democratic forces on the extreme right and the extreme left is not yet sufficiently understood in the nation at large.

There is no evidence, either, that there is a real understanding of the dangers to democracy on the campuses at this moment of graduation and commencement. There is a good deal of analysis of what's wrong in America—too much of it clouded by a wild sort of rhetoric—and not much in the way of program that demonstrates an understanding of the "splendid achievement of self-government" through the effective use of civil liberties.

ONE OF THE MANY THINGS a free and democratic society can give a new generation of leaders as they emerge from the colleges and universities is the priceless freedom that allows a man to voice his dissent as loudly and clearly and effectively as his abilities and resources will permit, but to voice it rationally and peacefully, neither to incite nor practice violence or coercion.

This precious right of peaceful dissent must be affirmed and reaffirmed in the country at this moment of graduation and commencement. And with the right to say nay and to oppose goes the responsibility to allow a free flow of ideas that will compete in a democratic marketplace so that the best will emerge to serve the nation as it moves to solve its problems.

We cannot allow the choice to become, as the Journal editorial fears, either anarchy or repression. We must put an end to violent, destructive protest and to the violence of mindless, brutal counteraction.

If the Class of 1970 will put to use the heritage of freedom and peaceful dissent to promote change and progress, then perhaps the next class will graduate in a less troubled atmosphere than at the moment clouds the nation's future.

'Revolutionaries' Taken Aback When Words Spark Action

By John P. Roche

EVERYONE, Sigmund Freud suggested, is born with the illusion of immortality. Thus it is characteristic of children to ignore danger. Injury and possibly death are abstractions that have no place in their universe. Our daughter, for example, is extremely perceptive, but she still rides her bike down heavily traveled roads as though it were an armored personnel carrier.

Obviously no one wants children brooding over the risks in the world, but, alas, at a certain point reality must intrude. My generation learned the hard way: "Good God! They're shooting at me! Real bullets. . . ." There is little to be said for this form of shock therapy, but there are times that we seem far too over-protective.

A substantial number of Americans, notably in the upper income brackets, have now reached their twenties, even thirties, under the illusion that violence is a game.

Take the stunned reaction of the "radicals" in New York City to the Revolt of the Hard Hats. For several years these militants have been engaged in ferocious rhetoric, demanding instant revolution, howling "off the pigs" (i.e., kill the cops), burning American flags, draft cards, etc. The nuts among them have taken to playing with explosives, but most of the group is not in fact violent. They talk a rough revolution, but are really engaged in a psychodrama.

Indeed, this is the paradox. Words are considered as wholly distinct from actions.

As one youngster, who had been belted by a "hard hat" for yelling an obscene phrase, put it: "But they were just words!" (The poet Allen Ginsberg had a similar encounter with a journalist a while back. The poet, who one might imagine would take words seriously, was totally baffled when the newspaperman hauled off.)

Now, as I have pointed out here before, with the exception of the intellectuals, Americans tend to take words seriously. If somebody is running around from mass meeting to mass meeting saying "off the pigs," the police—quite understandably—take the safety catch off their guns. If a mob of students announces that it is about to overthrow the government of the United States and, for openers, burns an ROTC building, the nervous "kids" (for they, too, are young) in the National Guard disobey orders and pump a round into the chamber.

THIS IS NOT a justification of anything. Yet if one is going to understand what is happening, he must get a sense of the human dimension, of how individuals react to the climate of violence. They get scared and enraged. Bombs have a particular menace, that of impersonal destruction.

Since the "revolutionaries" have been telling all and sundry that the road to victory is "in the streets," it is hardly startling that the longshoremen, the construction workers, and their friends picked up the challenge. After all, the extremists named the game and the weapons.

Now, of course, there is a new appreciation of the value of the "pigs," whose role is to rescue the revolutionaries from the masses. The game of violence suddenly loses its charm when one is clobbered by a proletarian who has spent his life heaving hundred-pound crates around.

To put it another way, amateurs at violence have succeeded in energizing the professionals. Under the delusion that violence is an abstract exercise, young militants have generated a reaction in a sector of American society capable of hard, direct action. (Have they never read about a teamsters', or a longshoremen's, or a construction union's strike tactics?) With all due respect to the First Amendment, what we need now is a moratorium on violence in word and deed. To ignore the existence of "fighting words" is to hide one's eyes from a central reality of American life.

Apathy or Concern of Voters Seen as Key to '70 Elections

THE YEAR 1970 could prove distinctive in American politics as the year in which limits on television campaign spending were discussed and voted on and the last year in which 18-year-olds did not vote.

The Senate has passed a bill which would place limits on the amount that can be spent on television campaign advertising for federal office, but the chances are uncertain whether the bill will become law by the time this fall's campaigns heat up.

The bill to enfranchise 18-year-olds is already in conference committee and it is highly likely that some 10 million new voters from their ranks will be eligible to vote in 1972. A court test of the bill's constitutionality will follow its passage; but it could be cleared before 1972. Also, some form of Electoral College reform can be expected before the next presidential election in 1972.

With or without campaign spending limits, television plays an ever increasing role in American politics. Well-run, well-financed TV campaigns win elections, as this year's early primaries prove again. And television also plays an important role in shaping the issues of those elections.

The issues fluctuated in early 1970. For several months, the war in Southeast Asia was defused politically, only to re-emerge with the lines of disagreement as sharply drawn as ever. So too have other issues varied. Pollution, voting rights, taxes, schools and Supreme Court nominations have crossed the scene, fading in one area, dominating in another.

But throughout early 1970, concern over the U.S. economic condition has remained constant. The cost of living touches everyone, and to the extent that the 1970 elections will be focused on national rather than regional issues, economic concerns are critical enough to become dominant.

For 12 years, the Senate has been the bastion of liberalism. The House has also enjoyed progressive majorities during much of the 1960s, but it has been the Senate which has repeatedly charted the programs; voted the funds; blocked regressive action and generally maintained what U.S. momentum there was for social goals.

Those 12 years of Senate liberalism date from 1958, to the last off-year elections under President Eisenhower, when a "class" of 12 liberals among the 15 Democrats elected that year transformed the Senate into the progressive force that spearheaded the social gains of the Kennedy and Johnson years.

Those 12 were re-elected in 1964 in the wake of Lyndon Johnson's overwhelming presidential victory, giving rise to Republican claims that they are all relatively flukish—in 12 years, the GOP has not had a clear shot at them, or didn't have a clear shot until now. Ten of those 12 are running for re-election this year, and the Republican Party is gearing up for that first "clear shot."

The Senate which was so altered in 1958 was then running at the end of a 12-year cycle. That one started in 1946, when a class of conservatives was elected.

Thus 1970, as the end of the second 12-year cycle could be forecast as the logical time of a swing to conservatism, especially since it is the first time the class of '58 runs "on its own." However, one political observer, David Broder of the Washington Post, sees the 1970 elections in terms of the 12-year cycle, but points out that both the '46 and the '58 groups won their races over the determined opposition of the President. Harry Truman was unable to stem the 1946 tide and Eisenhower, with Richard Nixon as his chief political operative, failed to halt the '58 switch.

In early 1970 the overall picture was that of a well-financed, smoothly-run Republican Party attempting to apply the clincher against a woefully under-financed Democratic Party.

And the GOP's indisputable edge in financing loomed larger in view of the soaring campaign costs of the 1960s, which seemed to hang a "only the wealthy need apply" tag on U.S. political office. Increased campaign costs reached their zenith in 1968 when an estimated $300 million was spent on various elections, some $59 million on television alone.

THE DEMOCRATS ARE NOT totally pessimistic about their chances in 1970. The party has little money, but then rarely can it match the GOP. The Republicans can turn the power of the White House into any given race, but then history dictates that "off-year" elections go against the White House. (The Democrats lost 47 House seats in 1966 and the average loss for the party in power has been around 40 in recent times.)

Labor's contribution in 1970, as in any year, will be in what COPE dollars it can collect, what voters it can register and what volunteers it can muster for the hard, day-to-day work of a campaign. Last year was the first non-election year in history in which labor conducted voter registration drives.

In its massive 1968 effort, labor registered 4.5 million voters, Theodore White estimates in "The Making of the President 1968." Labor also operated a data processing program in 1968 in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Texas, California, Colorado, Oklahoma, Maryland and some Washington, D.C., suburbs to help voter registration campaigns.

The potential—in terms of unregistered voters—is virtually limitless. Even with the excitement of a presidential year, some 47 million Americans did not vote in 1968. That's 16 million more than voted for either Nixon or Humphrey.

And the trend seems to be that it will get worse. A recent survey estimates that 20 years from now —even with 18-year-olds voting—the United States will have 70 or 90 million Americans NOT voting. That's more people than there are in Britain, Italy or France.

AMA Acknowledges Trend:

Public, Medical Support Grows For National Health Insurance

EVEN THE American Medical Association is waking up to the gravity of the nation's "health care crisis," AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman said.

The AMA's newspaper recently acknowledged the trend toward "some kind of universal insurance system," Seidman noted. He said a growing number of doctors now realize that "Medicare has not been a disaster" and that "national health insurance might not be either."

Seidman said that with "renewed and much greater interest in national health insurance than at any time in the recent past," it is likely to be a major issue in the coming Congressional elections.

"The question is no longer whether we are going to have national health insurance," but when and what kind of program it will be, he asserted. Seidman appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Seidman said the National Health Insurance bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) "sets out the principles" that the AFL-CIO believes must be embodied in such a program. He noted that with a few minor exceptions, the Griffiths bill would immediately establish a comprehensive system ranging from diagnosis and preventive care to out-patient treatment, nursing home and rehabilitative care, and in-hospital treatment, when necessary.

SUCH A SYSTEM would allow more efficient use of existing health care resources and make it possible to provide "a much greater degree of medical care" without being "pressed for a tremendous expansion of health manpower or health facilities," he said. "The most expensive kind of medical care," hospital treatment, demonstrates how inefficient use of existing resources pushes medical costs up and puts unnecessary pressures on facilities, Seidman said.

Washington Window

By Press Associates Inc.

FOR SOME YEARS the seniority system in Congress—particularly as it relates to committee chairmanships—has come under sharp attack from members and others who feel that it has served to block progressive legislation.

The announcement by Speaker John W. McCormack that he is stepping down seems certain to intensify the issue.

There is often widespread confusion and little understanding of the historical background of the seniority issue and there is little agreement among those who would depose the system as to just what should replace it.

We are indebted to a special report, issued recently by the Democratic Study Group of the House, for a balanced presentation of the background, an analysis of the system, arguments for and against it, and proposed alternatives and modifications.

Many observers point to the famous 1910 revolt of the House against the omnipotent powers of Speaker Joe Cannon as providing the origins of the seniority system. Speakers, prior to 1910, named the chairmen of the committees and their members for both the majority and the minority.

But as the DSG study notes, speakers followed seniority in naming committee chairmen more often than not prior to 1910, in about 60 percent of the appointments. Between 1910 and World War II seniority was followed in about 88 percent of the appointments. It was after World War II that "the rule of seniority" became virtually absolute.

Under the present system, Democratic chairmen and committee assignments are determined by the Committee on Committees which consists of Democratic members of the Ways & Means Committee.

Republicans have their own Committee on Committees which is made up of one member from each state that has Republican representation in the House. Each member casts a weighted vote equal to the number of GOP representatives from his state.

The Committee on Committees has followed the custom of naming the top seniority members of the party to the chairmanships. Technically, the Democratic Caucus has the right to approve or reject.

In practice, though, the caucus has had no opportunity to alter the selections. In fact, the Committee on Committees of both parties have reported directly to the full House where they have received pro forma approval.

In 1965 the Democratic Caucus met this problem by instructing the Committee on Committees to strip seniority from Representatives John Bell Williams (D-Miss.) and Albert W. Watson (D-S.C.) for not supporting the Democratic presidential candidate in 1964.

In 1965 the DSG succeeded in having the caucus review of recommendations reinstated. And in 1969 Rep. John R. Rarick (D-La.) was stripped of his seniority for opposing the Democratic presidential candidate in 1968.

Basically, though, this does not satisfy those who seek reform of the whole system. They charge that the present system permits old men as chairmen to obstruct, distort and emasculate party programs. And, they say, because conservative Southerners, usually far more anti-liberal than the rest of the party, have the most seniority, they dominate the chairmanships.

SUPPORTERS OF the seniority system say there are no workable alternatives, that it assures capable and experienced leadership.

Opponents of the system counter this with the charge that a small handful of powerful chairmen have been able to dictatorially prevent Congress from responding to national needs demanded by the people. And the people have no power to do anything about it.

The proposals for changing the present system are varied. Some would discard seniority entirely; others would modify it.

One group would spell out the power of the caucus more clearly. If the senior member of the committee is rejected then the next most senior member would be considered until there is a chairman acceptable to the majority.

There are other proposals mentioned. One would set an age limit for the chairman. Another would set a limit as to the number of years a chairman could serve. Still another plan would rotate the chairmanship.

EVEN THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION sees "some kind of universal health insurance" ahead, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alex Uhl, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

A HARD HAT, traditionally worn by construction workers, is presented to Pres. Nixon by Peter J. Brennan, president of the Building & Construction Trades Council of Greater New York. A group of 22 New York area union leaders, led by Brennan and Pres. Thomas Gleason of the Longshoremen, met with the President at the White House to express support of his Indochina policy. The group had helped organize a rally of about 100,000 people in support of the Administration's Cambodian decision.

ILO Names C. W. Jenks New Director General

Geneva—C. Wilfred Jenks, a Briton with nearly 40 years of experience with the International Labor Organization, has been elected to head the agency for five years.

On June 1, the 61-year-old Jenks will receive three golden keys when he takes over from David A. Morse, a former U. S. Under Secretary of Labor, who resigned after 21 years as ILO director general.

The three keys to the ILO headquarters building here symbolize the organization's "tripartite" structure that gives workers and employers an equal voice with governments.

In his acceptance speech before a special session of the Governing Body of the 121-nation ILO, Jenks pledged his support for this "unique partnership" that, he said, has helped make the United Nations specialized agency a "bulwark of fundamental human rights."

Principal deputy director general under Morse for the last three years, Jenks was elected to the top post by the 48 worker, government and employer members of the Governing Body, or executive council.

Jenks won out by 25 votes to 23 for Francis Blanchard, a 53-year-old Frenchman who has been with the ILO since 1951. He is now a deputy director general.

Rudolph Faupl, the U.S. worker delegate, said he is certain the new director general would continue the efforts of his predecessor in furthering the ILO goal of "improving the condition of men and women workers everywhere."

Faupl, Machinists international representative, assured Jenks that he would receive a "full measure of support and cooperation of the workers group" in the pursuit of this ILO objective.

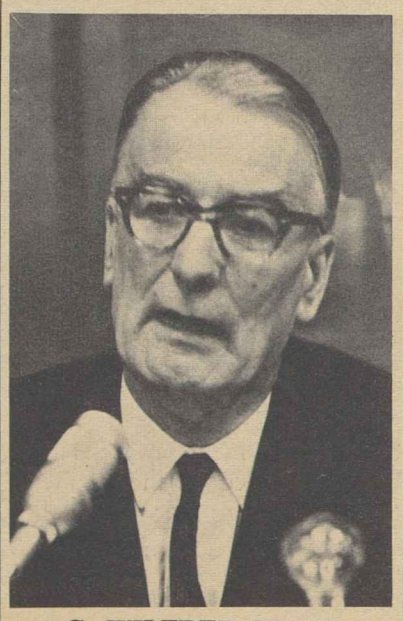
Faupl was chosen by the worker delegates and their substitutes as their chairman and spokesman for the special session in succession to Jean Moeri, a Swiss trade union leader who died last month after heading the ILO workers' group since 1960.

Faupl will head the U.S. worker delegation to the annual conference of the ILO, which opens here June 2.

Members of the delegation include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Pres. Floyd Smith of the Machinists, Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Pres. Harry D. Sayre of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman and West Virginia AFL-CIO Pres. Miles Stanley.

At the outset of its special election, the Governing Body paid a moving tribute to Moeri because, as Chairman Hector Gros Espiell of Uruguay put it, of his "unwavering concern with freedom and human dignity."

Faupl told the executive group that the "death of this great fighter for human rights is a grievous loss indeed."



The election of a new director general was the only business on the agenda of the Governing Body's three-day session.

In welcoming the choice of Jenks, Morse said that the entire ILO staff would be particularly pleased because it proved that a staff member could start at the bottom of the ladder and work his way to the top rung.

A lawyer, Jenks entered the ILO as a legal adviser at one grade above the lowest rank for professional staff because of his legal training. He is the author of many published works on law, including "The International Protection of Trade Union Freedoms."

When addressing the Governing Body, Jenks said that "economic progress leaves man a slave" without freedom from forced labor and from discrimination and without the freedom of association that the ILO upholds.

"The ILO is, and must always remain," he said, "a citadel of human freedom in the broader sense, and above all of the fullness of personal freedom without which professed devotion to the freedom and dignity of all mankind is idle words."

Union Standards Urged:

'Positive' Nationalism Stirs Canadian Labor Congress

Edmonton, Alta.—"Positive" rather than "negative" Canadian nationalism prevailed at the Canadian Labor Congress convention here.

CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald drew a distinction between the two at a press conference on the eve of the big convention, which drew 1,573 delegates.

He noted a strong spirit of nationalism is sweeping Canada and said this could be a source of strength for the labor movement. But it could be detrimental if it caused divisions within the ranks of organized labor.

Later in the convention, delegates adopted a motion calling for minimum standards of self-government for Canadian sections of international unions. About 75 percent of the 1,650,000 members of CLC affiliates are in international unions.

The self-government resolution includes in the standards election of Canadian officers by Canadians, determination of Canadian policies by elected Canadian officers or members, and authority for Canadian elected representatives to speak for their union in this country.

It calls on the CLC to "do all in its power to assist the affiliated unions in the attainment of these objectives."

Congress conventions are unique among national labor organizations, with representation from locals. As usual, there was much debate, with delegates taking full advantage of the five minutes allotted each speaker.

On the convention's final day, all 10 principal officers were re-elected for two-year terms, including MacDonald.

Delegates rejected a bid by the United Fishermen & Allied Workers Union to enter the congress. They voted overwhelmingly for a committee proposal that the CLC pursue its efforts to try to get the Fishermen to merge with an existing union—the Canadian Food & Allied Workers.

In other business, delegates adopted policy statements on several topics including human rights, international affairs, inflation, taxation, poverty, unemployment, and Medicare.

The resolutions on the economy fully endorsed leadership criticism of the federal government's tight monetary and fiscal policies and of the Federal Prices & Incomes Commission which has been promoting voluntary wage-and-price guidelines.

Canada now has a government medical insurance program operating in every province but one. However, the Medicare statement said medical insurance is not enough. "The congress cannot consider that the real goals of Medicare have been accomplished until every Canadian has available to him all the health services he requires, in whatever form he requires them whenever he requires them, without any economic deterrents to separate him from these services."

The convention rejected a proposal for a separate committee to look after the interests of women workers. Floor speakers agreed that women are exploited in the labor market, but it was felt that their rights could best be defended through the existing human rights committee. One woman delegate served notice that women members "are going to be heard from in every committee of the congress."

Several resolutions called for organizing the unorganized and for more mergers among unions.

MacDonald was one of several speakers who mentioned the problems posed by multi-national conglomerates and the possible need for new union structures to cope with them.

"We have the right to demand that the multi-national corporation should exercise social responsibility to the country which is its host," MacDonald said in his presidential address.

"It must not only conform to our laws but behave in the interests of Canada generally rather than treat it as merely some kind of economic colony for the corporate parent. . . ."

He added: "The multi-national corporation raises new problems in collective bargaining as well. Since it operates in more than one country at a time, it can exercise choices and make decisions as to the deployment of production, the determination of wage levels and other conditions of employment. It can very well use the employes of its plant in Canada, for example, to act as strikebreakers against a strike of its employes in a plant in another country.

"I submit to you that the time has arrived when the trade unions of the free world must develop institutional patterns that will enable them to confront the multi-national corporation on its own level so that the great economic strength which such a corporation can muster will not be met by an internationally fragmented labor force.

"I am talking here of international trade unionism in a different context than that in which it is usually employed, although I think that the role of the international trade union in the more conventional sense cannot be set aside."

He added: "It would be tragic indeed if the strong spirit of nationalism which is sweeping Canada at present were to be used to isolate the organized workers of Canada from their fellow trade unionists not only in the United States but other countries as well."

Top officers re-elected, in addition to MacDonald, were Sec.-Treas. William Dodge, Executive Vice Presidents Joe Morris and Jean Beaudry, and Vice Presidents Stanley A. Little, Dennis McDermott, William Mahoney, William Ladyman, Y. C. W. McGregor, and L. H. Lorrain.

Don't Let Differences Divide Us, Grospiron Tells CLC Delegates

Edmonton, Alta.—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. F. Grospiron warned Canadian workers that differences of opinion between the United States and Canada must not be allowed to interfere with cooperation between unionists in the two countries.

Grospiron said he knew of no case in which international unionism has worked to the disadvantage of Canadian workers.

He made the statements in an address as the AFL-CIO's fraternal delegate to the Canadian Labor Congress biennial convention here.

As he spoke, the delegates had before them a recommendation from a CLC committee that they adopt a resolution calling for a "firm policy supporting minimum standards of self-government" of the Canadian sections of international unions. It was adopted later in the convention. (Story, this page.)

Grospiron, who is president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, told delegates he would be "less than candid" if he did not acknowledge "the tensions developing between the union members of our two countries based on nationalism."

As president of a union with members in both countries, he said he respected "the legitimate positions of Canadian unionists in affairs peculiar to their country," and added:

"I believe it absolutely essential that we do not permit international unionism to be a vehicle that imposes U.S. viewpoints on foreign affairs upon the membership in Canada.

"On the other hand, I would urge Canadian unionists not to permit legitimate differences of opinion on foreign affairs or on national policies to interfere with that broad and basic area of cooperation that we must preserve.

"As wage earning men and women we are chained together. We work for the same companies in most cases. Wages and working conditions in one country are affected by those in the other. A raise in pay in Canada benefits working people in the United States and vice versa."

Grospiron added: "I suppose there may be cases in which international unionism has worked to the disadvantage of Canadian workers, but no such case has ever come to my attention."

He reviewed some AFL-CIO achievements since its last convention in October 1969, including its role in having federal tax legislation revamped to provide some relief for the poor and for workers.

He also cited the campaign for national health insurance and expressed confidence that it would be achieved "in the next few years."

He reported that "some progress" has been made towards "reaching a new understanding" with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions from which the AFL-CIO has withdrawn its membership.

"I hope that in the near future this matter will be resolved. It is essential that this happen, for organized labor throughout the free world must be brought together in understanding and mutual assistance."

Grospiron praised the CLC on its achievements including national health insurance and a portable pension plan, and for establishing the New Democratic Party—"and in doggedly supporting that party as it attempts to represent the interest of working people in the broadest sense of those interests."

concession to postal organizations that have local but not national recognition by allowing them to retain dues checkoff privileges.

The House committee bill would permit fragmentation of bargaining units and would also substitute an area prevailing wage policy for national bargaining over salaries.

Both bills take a neutral position on the union shop, allowing workers the same right as private industry employes to negotiate union security where it is not barred by state "right-to-work" laws.

However, open shop supporters in the House have served notice that they will try to amend the bill to prohibit a union shop. They have labeled their amendment the "right to refrain" from joining a union. The House and Senate bills both allow exemption from a union shop for persons with religious convictions against unions — provided those claiming exemption pay to the government an amount equal to union dues.

Both the House and Senate bills grant the negotiated 8 percent raise for postal workers, on top of the overall 6 percent raise recently enacted for all federal employes. The House version, however, would make the raise retroactive to Apr. 18, while the Senate measure would be effective when the bill becomes law.

Included in both versions is the union-management agreement that the length of service required to move from the starting salary to the top of the pay grade will be reduced from 21 years to eight years.

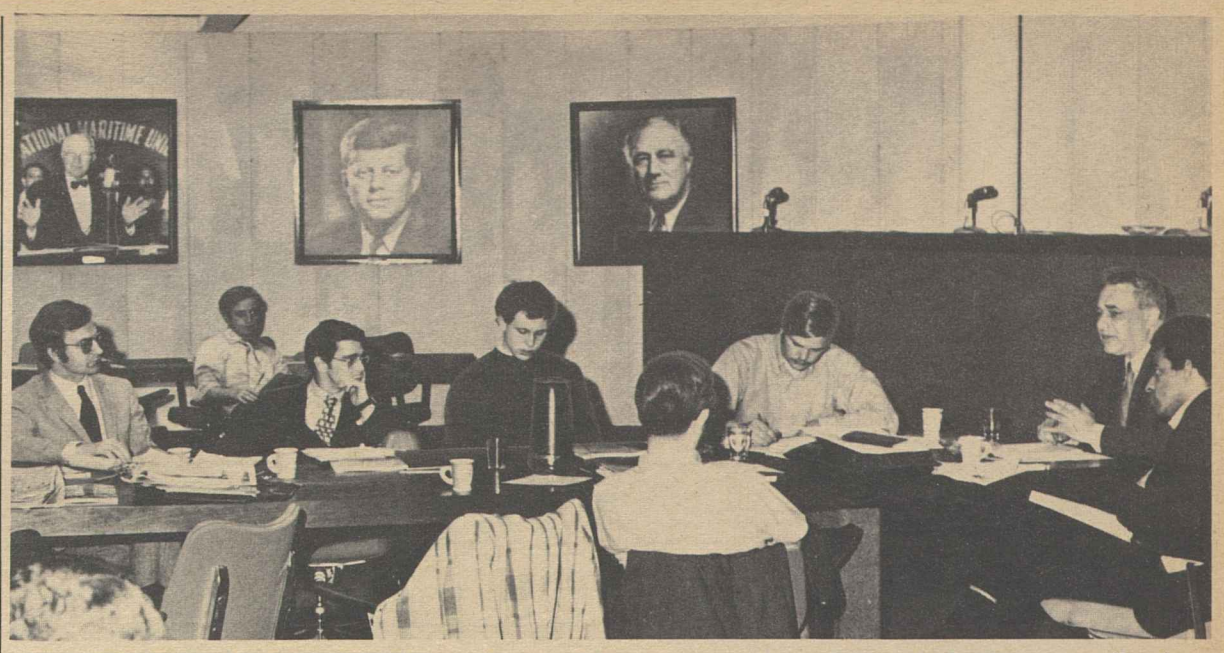
On details of the postal reorganization, both bills would take the Postmaster General out of the Cabinet and the Post Office Dept. out of politics.

A board or commission appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate would appoint the Postmaster General and his principal deputy. The Senate bill would also establish an independent five-member Postal Rate Commission to recommend rate changes to the Board of Governors. Under the House bill, Congress would have the final say on postal rates.

In other congressional developments:

- The House voted 335-1 to add to its ethics code a requirement that congressmen disclose publicly the sources of honorariums totaling $300 or more during the year and the names of creditors to whom unsecured debts of at least $10,000 are owed for 90 days or more.

Details of the amounts of the honorariums — fees received for speeches or articles—and the loans will not have to be made public. They will be filed in sealed envelopes which can be opened only by vote of the House Committee on Official Standards, usually referred to as the "ethics committee."



- Despite substantial opposition, the House approved a $290 million appropriation for continued development of a supersonic passenger plane. The money was part of a $7 billion appropriation bill for the Dept. of Transportation.

- A House Judiciary subcommittee approved a bill waiving the antitrust laws so that newspapers that aren't making money can combine operations with competitors. A similar bill, opposed by labor, has passed the Senate. The House panel added a requirement that editorial operations may not be "amalgamated" and specified that editorial policies of the two papers must be "independently determined."

- The House gave unanimous approval to legislation aimed at curbing tax evasion and business frauds through the use of secret Swiss bank accounts. The bill would require banks to microfilm checks and other records of financial transactions above $500 under U.S. Treasury supervision.

- A House Education & Labor subcommittee voted for a labor-supported bill to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "cease and desist" enforcement powers to stop job discrimination. The bill also would bring school and college teachers under coverage for the first time.

- The Senate continued to debate a resolution mandating U.S. withdrawal from Cambodia by the June 30th date set by Pres. Nixon, but failed to agree on when to come to a showdown vote. Efforts continued, without success, to work out language acceptable to both supporters and opponents of presidential powers in this area.

ELECTION YEAR ACTIVITIES are discussed by representatives of Frontlash '70, a coordinating body of 17 young people's organizations, at a planning conference at the headquarters of the National Maritime Union in New York. Addressing the group is AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, second from the right.

Histadrut Unites Jews and Arabs Despite Warfare in Middle East

While fighting flares in the Middle East, inside Israel, Jew and Arab work in the fraternity of the same trade union federation with the same wages and benefits, Max Steinbock writes in the May issue of the American Federationist magazine.

Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, is undoubtedly the greatest single factor that has brought together Arabs and Jews, Steinbock reports.

Nearly 400,000 non-Jews live in Israel, along with 2.5 million Jews.

"Broadly speaking," Steinbock says, "there are no legal restrictions on Israeli Arabs. They can work, live and travel as they choose, under the same rules and earning the same wages as their Jewish fellow citizens."

Sixty percent of the Arab and Druze workers are members of Histadrut. Although this is somewhat less than the 80 percent of the Jewish workers, it is "still a very nice percentage compared to Europe or even the United States," the article quotes Jacob Cohen, the head of Histadrut's Arab Dept.

Steinbock, who is editor of the RWDSU Record, the publication of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store union, listed these factors affecting the Arab workers:

- They receive the same pay as Jews for equal work—which makes their income three to four times as high as that of their fellow Arabs across the border.
- They enjoy full equity under Israel's social and labor laws—which guarantee the right to strike as well as such benefits as dis ability pay, social security, compensation and others.
- They hold full membership ir Histadrut that puts them on a par with the Jewish worker. This makes available to them a wide range of cooperative services most notably Kupat Holim, Histadrut's huge medical program that serves most of Israel's population.
- They are subject to the same laws as the Jews, requiring children to attend school through the 9th grade or until age 16.

"One byproduct of Histadrut's activities among Arabs has been social acceptance for the idea that young women can work for a living at jobs other than nursing and teaching," Steinbock observes.

One of the most dramatic examples of Histadrut's efforts on behalf of Arabs occurred in 1968, shortly after the Six-Day War that brought East Jerusalem under Israeli rule.

A brief strike by Arab workers at an Arab-owned hotel was won under the leadership of Histadrut, the article notes. A month later, Histadrut struck an Arab bus company to win wages equal to those of Jewish drivers in West Jerusalem.

"These strikes brought Arab workers into Histadrut's ranks by the hundreds. Today, 5,000 Arabs are members of Histadrut in East Jerusalem — far more than ever belonged to the company-union-type organizations which were the only ones permitted when Jordan ruled East Jerusalem."

There are 900,000 inhabitants in occupied territories under Israeli Army Administration. Many of these people also work for Israeli industry.

"With a labor shortage in Israel today," Steinbock reports, "some 20,000 Arab workers are brought in daily from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank to work in Israeli industry and agriculture. They receive the same wages and fringe benefits as Jewish and Arab Israelis —some three to four times as much as they get from their own Arab employers."

2 Pattern Settlements Negotiated by Bakers

Two regional settlements worked out by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers—one in the East Central states worth about 90 cents an hour and another on the West Coast valued at $35 a week—are expected to set the pattern for coming contract negotiations that will benefit about 40,000 members.

Both pacts are for two years.

The union's East-Central States Conference negotiated a settlement with ITT Continental Baking Co. at its Paterson, N.J., plant and B&C's Local 50. The Pacific States Conference agreement involved ITT Continenal Baking, Interstate and American Bakeries under contracts with Locals 31 and 37.

The 90-cent increase in the eastern regional pact breaks down this way:

- A 40-cent boost was effective May 3. It may be applied to wages alone or partly to fringes, which can be designated by the locals involved.
- A second increase of 9 cents an hour will go into effect next Jan. 1. This also may be applied in any area or combination of areas, including vacation improvements.
- An additional 35 cents will be added to wages May 2, 1971 and 6 cents more will be added on Jan. 1, 1972.

Both the eastern and West Coast pacts call for four weeks of paid vacation after 15 years service and five weeks after 26 years.

The $35-a-week in the western pact breaks down this way:

- An initial wage increase of $14 a week is already in effect.
- A second increase of $10.50 a week will go into effect next May.
- Welfare coverage was increased with an additional management payment of $1.50 a week as of next Aug. 1 and another $1.50 a year later.
- Pension benefits will be increased by an added $50 a month in each contract year through increased employer contributions of $2.40 a week starting next Sept. 1 and another $2.40 a week beginning Jan. 1, 1972.

B&C representatives on the eastern regional bargaining conference whose areas will be affected by the pattern pact came from Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Hampshire, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Rhode Island and New Jersey.

The states that will be affected by the West Coast pattern negotiations include Washington, Oregon and California.

NBC Offer Put to Vote Of Broadcast Employes

Wage increases of $55 to $60 a week over a three-year term will go to top categories of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians under an improved contract offer from the National Broadcasting Co.

The NBC proposal, which includes lower increases for other classifications, has been submitted to a vote of the 1,300 NBC members, with ballots to be counted in mid-June. An earlier company proposal was rejected by a margin of more than 2 to 1.

Union negotiators headed by Network Coordinator Edward Lynch voted unanimously to recommend acceptance of the second offer. They made no recommendation on the April offer.

NABET said each unit will vote separately on the three-year package. Where members reject it, negotiators will seek better terms from management for that unit. Major NBC stations are in New York, Washington, Chicago, Cleveland, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

The new proposal calls for successive yearly raises of $20, $15 and $20 a week. These would increase wages from $260 now to $315 by April 1, 1972, for Group 2 engineers. Group 6 engineers will go from $290 to $312.50 now and to $350 a week by the third year.

Raises totaling $55 a week have been offered traffic and communications workers with four or more years of seniority. Other scales are due to go to staging services, building maintenance employes, stage managers, staff artists, film editors, newswriters, music clearance employes and other NABET members.

NABET represents technicians and allied workers with the network. NBC made its improved offer after a strike deadline was extended at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

EDWARD B. MILLER, Chicago management lawyer, has been confirmed by the Senate for a 5-year term as a National Labor Relations Board member. Pres. Nixon is expected to name him as NLRB chairman after he is sworn in.

New Orleans Hails Union Label Show

show as an example of the constructive cooperation that is so desperately needed at all levels of our society if we are to succeed in improving the quality of life for all Americans."

This year's edition of the show, produced by the AFL-CIO's Union Label & Service Trades Dept., had a near-record total of 438 exhibits in the new Rivergate exhibition hall alongside the Mississippi River.

The exhibitors included 27 companies from small to large, 61 unions, the AFL-CIO and its Auxiliaries and departments, the Boy Scouts of America, Office of Civil Defense, Civil Service Commission, Office of Economic Opportunity, U.S. Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Peace Corps, International Labor Organization, Marine Corps, Navy Dept. and many others.

The Farm Workers were here with a report of the first table grape growers whose union label products will soon be ripe.

The Machinists had possibly the tallest exhibit in the show with a model of the Saturn V space rocket.

The Lithographers & Photoengravers had the heaviest entry, a 215,000-pound Miller color press. and small equipment on which members turned out souvenir posters, booklets and placards.

Some displays featured movies, color panels and recordings with the latest professional polish. Several "live" offerings still drew the crowds —the Barbers cut hair in a four-chair barber shop complete with a manicurist and a hair dryer; the United Textile Workers put on a crowd-pleasing fashion show; the Printing Pressmen ran off the Declaration of Independence and slick-paper mementoes on an old flat-bed press and a modern offset press.

The strongest crowd-puller, as always, was the $100,000 in free radios, television sets and other gifts that were given away in hourly drawings during the six days the show was open.

The Tobacco Workers had a display of union-made cigarettes and a sign saying "Dump your non-union Winstons, Camels and Salems here. They will be replaced by union brands."

The Theatrical Stage Employes had a little theater where union projectionists showed "The Sights and Sounds of New Orleans."

New this year was a special color movie produced for the Louisiana AFL-CIO and the Greater New Orleans AFL-CIO and shown in the AFL-CIO theater.

Called "Miracle of Plaquemines," it told how "thousands of union volunteers, with the cooperation of the American Red Cross, spent 20 weekends last fall and winter rebuilding homes in Plaquemines Parish" destroyed by Hurricane Camille.

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, new to the show, presented a graphic display of the work of union members in refineries and other workplaces of the industry.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, who is president of the federation's Union Label department and of the Theatrical Stage Employes, presided at a pre-show luncheon. Among those he introduced were Archbishop Philip M. Hannan of the Catholic archdiocese, Mayor Moon Landrieu, State Sen. Adrian Duplantier, Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the sponsoring department, Pres. Victor Bussie of the state labor federation, former AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, and a number of exhibitors.

Printers Win Key Contracts In New York

Photoengravers, Stereotypers, Pressmen, Machinists, Electricians and Paper Handlers, with pay scales ranging from $160 a week to $220. The Guild's top minimum for journeyman reporters at the Times is $255.25.

The printers' new contract will raise day-shift wages from $184.43 a week to $261.32 in three steps of $27.66, $23.33 and $25.90. Night shift and "lobster" shift workers will go to a top of $273.55 and $285.78, respectively.

Mediator Theodore W. Kheel and two colleagues announced the Times pact. Powers gave these other details:

- Pension and welfare fund contributions will remain at 9.304 percent of total weekly earnings.
- Wages will be raised when living costs rise by more than 6 percent in a year running from May to May.
- The day-shift work week is reduced from 35 to 34.5 hours, and other improvements are provided in vacation, insurance, and welfare fund clauses.

The Times announced that the news stand price of its daily paper would rise to 15 cents on June 1. The Sunday Times will continue to be sold for 60 cents in the metropolitan area and on Long Island, but beyond that radius the price will rise to 75 cents as of June 7. Beyond a 200-mile radius the price will stay at 75 cents.

Advertising rate increases averaging 14 cents a line will "become effective for most categories" of ads Aug. 1, Publisher Arthur Ochs Sulzberger announced.

Sulzberger called the size of the settlement an "unhappy record" in New York newspaper history. Part of the responsibility "lies in the runaway course of the general inflationary spiral," he declared. He said not enough has been learned about how to solve management and employe problems, and asserted that "newspaper survival depends on increasing efficiency. . . ."

House Approves 10-Year Program To Modernize U.S. Merchant Fleet

the nation's "already unfavorable balance of payments" in calling for retention of the present law.

On the basic shipbuilding and ship subsidy program, however, there was general elation that action had finally been begun to modernize the U.S. merchant fleet and curb the takeover of U.S. shipping by runaway operators flying "flags of convenience" to escape U.S. laws and standards.

The House bill, steered to passage by Chairman Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.) and other members of the Merchant Marine Committee, includes these major provisions:

Ship Construction—The measure calls for building at least 300 new American-flag vessels in U.S. yards over the next 10 years. It would pave the way for block-building of U.S. cargo ships as a way of reducing construction costs and bringing them more nearly into line with foreign shipbuilding.

Tax-Deferred Funds—The bill extends to presently unsubsidized operators the right to create capital reserve funds for new ship construction—a privilege previously reserved exclusively for the 14 subsidized berth-line operators, whose ships follow scheduled trade routes.

The Administration proposal would have permitted these tax-deferred construction reserve funds only in the foreign trade, but the House committee broadened this provision to include the Great Lakes and fishing fleets, and ships engaged in the noncontiguous trades, as well.

Construction Subsidies—For the first time since 1936, the bill extends to all ship operators the right to qualify for construction differential subsidies. Again, this right had been limited in the past to the 14 subsidized operators.

Operating Subsidies—As in the case of construction subsidies, the measure extends operating differential assistance beyond the liner trade, including bulk carriers under this phase of the program for the first time.

Garmatz told the House that the combination of construction and operating subsidy aid for the bulk trades would encourage American ship operators to "build and operate U.S. ships to give us a bulk carrying capability."

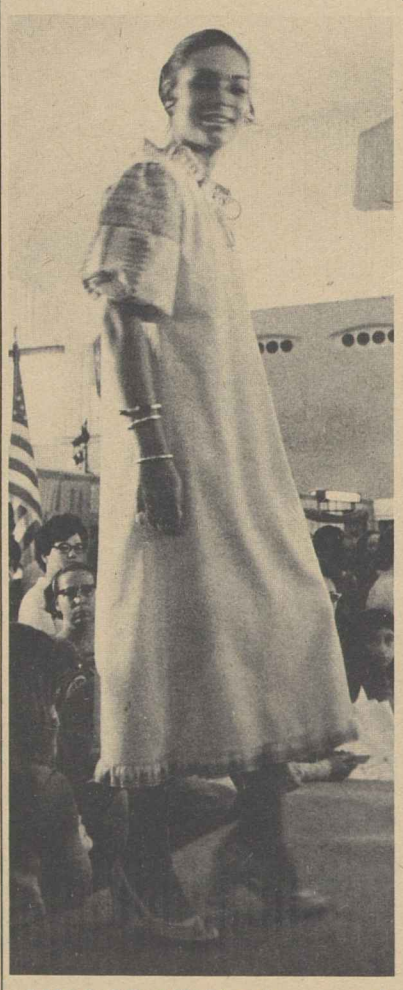
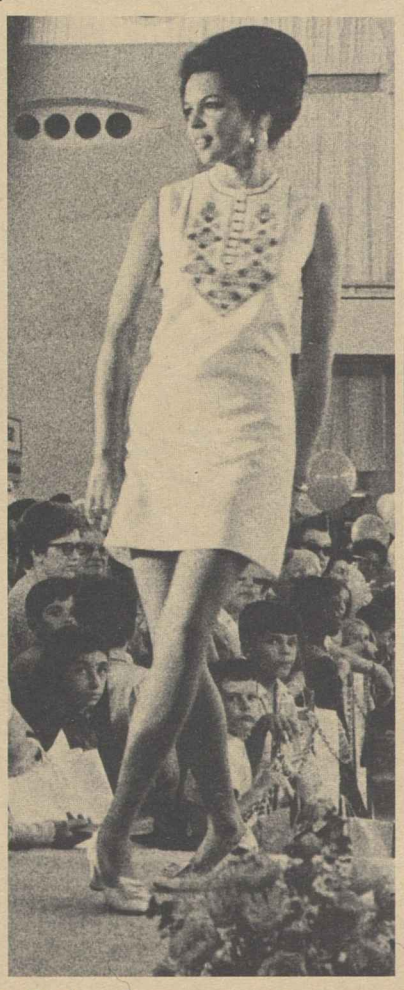
At the same time, the bill introduces a wage index concept which, Garmatz said, would encourage responsible collective bargaining and would lead to "a general lessening of dependence on operating subsidy for our liners to meet foreign competition."

The Merchant Marine Committee had modified the Nixon proposals on the wage index to give organized labor a chance to participate in the decision-making process involved in the setting of manning scales for subsidized vessels.

Foreign-Flag Phaseout—The bill provides an orderly method by which presently unsubsidized companies could qualify for benefits under the program while disposing of their foreign-flag holdings over a 20-year period.



Under this provision, an operator with both American-flag and foreign-flag holdings would have to agree to a "freeze" of his foreign holdings at their Apr. 15, 1970, level, and to divest himself gradually of these foreign holdings within 20 years.



Commenting on this provision in the course of the floor debate, Garmatz declared:

"This has the potential of reducing, if not eliminating, the so-called 'runaway' fleet, about which our seafaring unions and others have complained so bitterly over the years.

"To the extent operators with foreign-flag ships are induced by this program to build their ships in U.S. yards and operate them under our flag, we will have strengthened our commerce and provided for our national security. Further, we will have created more jobs than are presently available for our seafaring personnel."

for a modest but adequate standard of living in urban areas.

With living costs continuing to rise, textile workers are in an "intolerable" bind and "one essential answer to this problem is the regulation and control of low-wage imports."

Pollock said efforts to reach voluntary agreements with various trading countries for limitations on imports have failed, thus bringing about the need for legislation authorizing quotas.

In most textile communities, there are no other opportunities for employment if a mill shuts down, Pollock noted. "Last year, 32 textile mills were liquidated," he told the committee, "wiping out more than 8,000 jobs. In the first four months of this year, nine additional plants have been closed, wiping out more than 1,500 jobs."

Labor Cites Urgent Need For Housing

America urgently needs new housing programs and new sources of mortgage money, not merely a "tidying up" of existing laws and programs, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Nat Goldfinger, the federation's research director, charged that an Administration bill being considered by a House Banking subcommittee merely "gives the appearance of action without the substance."

It is a housekeeping bill, designed to consolidate a number of existing programs, he noted.

But it won't build additional housing for low and moderate income families, and that's what is desperately needed, Goldfinger testified at the House hearings. He was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison.

Speaking, he said, "for 13.5 million Americans with a deep personal stake in America's housing programs, both as a means of shelter and a means of employment," Goldfinger called on Congress to insist that the Administration act.

"The President has the power, given him last year by Congress, to establish discretionary credit controls," Goldfinger noted.

"He is empowered to channel available credit at low interest rates to where it is needed" and "curb inflationary expansion of credit for purposes that are less important to society."

Goldfinger then told the House panel:

"Because the President has failed to act, we now urge Congress to direct the President to take the necessary steps to implement these discretionary controls and help meet this critical housing need."

He warned that the goals of the 1968 Housing Act "will not be met" through existing programs and noted that the current rate of new housing starts will result in little more than half the number of housing units that were built in 1950, "a far less affluent time."

Instead of mere recodification of existing law, Goldfinger urged, "the Administration should give priority attention to new emergency programs and new long-range programs that will produce the millions of housing units so badly needed."

He asked: "Where do we go in the next 10 years if we are now—in this time of relative prosperity and affluence—not meeting our needs?"

Banks and other money-lending institutions, Goldfinger noted, out of greed for greater profits have opposed legislation to increase mortgage funds, including a proposal for a bank of last resort financed by a portion of the reserves of tax-exempt pension and foundation funds. They have also fought a proposal to release $3 billion in

Overturns 8-Year-Old Decision

By Eugene A. Kelly

The Supreme Court has weakened union protection against antistrike injunctions, reversing an eight-year-old rule on the supremacy of the historic Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932.

The justices by a 5-2 vote decided the court was wrong in its 1962 Sinclair Refining Co. ruling that Congress had not intended to impair Norris-LaGuardia's prohibition against injunctions when it enacted the Taft-Hartley Law.

On a set of facts similar to those in the earlier case, the court has now decided that federal judges may enjoin unions that strike instead of taking the arbitration route provided by their contract.

The decision was hailed by management spokesmen. Executive Dir. William E. Dunn of the Associated General Contractors said in a statement that it is "the most significant ruling in the field of labor law in the last 20 years."

AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel J. Albert Woll said the decision raises an issue of vital importance to labor. It could have "most serious consequences," he said, if federal courts issue blanket injunctions in all cases involving no-strike agreements regardless of the circumstances.

The court overruled the Sinclair decision and reversed the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at San Francisco in a case involving Retail Clerks Local 770 and the Boys Markets, Inc., in Cudahy, Calif. The high court ordered the appeals court to enforce a 1969 District Court decision forbidding the union to picket a store where non-union members were performing work claimed by union members as their own under contract.

First Crop of Union Grapes Goes to Market

Coachella, Calif.—All the hopes of the United Farm Workers for a better future went to market with a shipment of table grapes bearing the union label.

The grapes, the first of the season, left here for consumer markets in the East.

Dir. Cesar Chavez and the staff of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee cheered when word came from New York that the long-awaited crop of union-harvested and union-cultivated grapes had gone on sale.

The problem now will be to prevent unscrupulous merchants from substituting non-union grapes for those in boxes bearing the Aztec

Abel Asks 'Fair Shake':

1-Way Trade Policy Linked to Job Loss

World trade must become a two-way street to halt the sacrifice of American jobs, labor witnesses urged as House hearings continued in a search for a trade policy for the 1970s.

I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., testified on behalf of affiliated unions whose members "are living in a nightmare of an increasing flood of imports that is washing out factories and jobs."

He stressed that labor is not trying to build a new wall of high protective tariffs to isolate the U.S. economy.

"What we want," Abel said, "is a fair shake."

Old labels of "free trade" and "protectionism" have become obsolete, Abel said. "They have been outdated in this new world of managed national economies, international technocracy, multi-national corporations and record U.S. investments overseas."

The "runaway shop" now sets up across national boundaries, he noted, and American capital and technology seek bigger profits in the low-wage areas of the world.

"Patriotism or concern for American workers seldom interferes with the chance to make a few bucks," Abel observed. His testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee was presented by the IUD's administrative director, Jacob Clayman.

The argument that consumers, at least, benefit by lower prices of imported goods was punctured both in the IUD statement and in joint testimony by the presidents of two AFL-CIO unions of shoe workers.

In most cases, Abel noted, products manufactured in whole or part in low-wage areas are sold in this country at U.S. prices. To expect lower costs to be passed on to consumers, he suggested, would be

ILGWU Cloak Contract Posts Gains for 42,000

New York—Wage increases totaling 21.3 percent over a three-year period and several innovative fringe benefits mark the new agreement negotiated by the Ladies' Garment Workers for 42,000 coat and suit workers in the New York metropolitan area.

The new terms were reached after several weeks of bargaining with three employer associations. They were approved by cloak union executive board members and other delegates at a meeting here.

ILGWU Vice Pres. Henoch Mendelsund, who is general manager of the New York Cloak Joint Board, congratulated industry leaders for "recognizing the needs of their workers" in the face of current economic difficulties in the trade.

Pay increases under the new agreement will be 10 percent as of June 1, an additional 5 percent a year later and another 5 percent

Texas Unionists Win School Bias Lawsuit

Corpus Christi, Tex.—Backed by their union, 32 parents have won a major court case challenging segregation and discrimination against Mexican-American and Negro students in the Corpus Christi school system.

Federal District Judge Wooodrow Seals ordered the school system to break up its gerrymandered boundary lines which had shunted nearly all of the city's Spanish-speaking and Negro communities into one school district, leaving the adjoining district almost exclusively "Anglo."

The parents who brought the suit are all members of Steelworker locals at the American Smelting & Refining Co. and Reynolds Metals Co. plants.

To finance the court challenge, they turned to their union for help—and got it. USWA District Dir. James E. Ward went to bat for them, and Pres. I. W. Abel and the USWA executive board approved the assistance.

"We simply provided service on behalf of our members," Ward said. "It is good for the kids, good for the community and good for our union."

Judge Seals described the suit as

Clothing Union Acts To Block Job Loss

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City—The Clothing Workers passed a series of proposals pegged at safeguarding wages and jobs of members threatened by technological changes in the industry, foreign imports and deteriorating national economic conditions.

Delegates to the 27th biennial ACWA convention reaffirmed their backing of the union's executive board on its policy that technological changes may be introduced in shops only after agreement with the union. The board will allow changes only if earnings and job security of members are not adversely affected.

The convention also called on Congress to enact legislation to limit imports on all types of textiles and apparel without closing the door to them completely.

The bill, introduced by Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), would permit changes in the levels of imports as changes occur in the level of domestic consumption of textiles.

By covering all types of fiber, it would plug serious loopholes in the Long-Term Cotton Agreement, the convention declared in a resolution.

If efforts to regulate the flow of textile and apparel imports fail, the resolution called on the union's leadership to take any steps necessary "including a halt of the cutting of Japanese cloth."

Citing growing unemployment and unchecked inflation, the convention expressed serious concern for the state of the country's economy.

"Our nation has been brought to the brink of economic disaster by the policies of the Nixon Administration," the delegates declared in a statement. It attributed much of the domestic economic problem to government spending for the war effort in Southeast Asia and called for a shift in priorities to meet domestic needs.

Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Me.) also lashed out at Administration policies.

"Those economic policies, coupled with the rhetoric of fear, have divided our nation and weakened confidence in our democratic institutions at a time when we can least afford, it," Muskie said.

He told the convention that America has reached a point in history "where the restoration of domestic tranquility takes precedence over every other issue."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, alerted delegates to the importance of the 1970 elections which he said "will determine the direction of this country for a hundred years."

Rustin warned that control of Congress could be lost to the Administration "if those of us in minority groups and the trade union movement do not put up a triple effort this time."

Former Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark called for a continuing shift in energies by the nation to improve human conditions in health, education, better jobs and decent housing.

"Human dignity is the central issue of our times," Clark declared. "It is in these areas that we can control turbulence and reduce crime in America. . . . Poverty is the mother of crime."

The convention voted to expand the ACWA executive board from 23 vice presidents to 24. All 22 incumbent members were renominated. One seat is vacant.

Renominated without opposition were ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum. A referendum will be held later this year for the election of officers and board members.

Among the 41 resolutions adopted at the convention, the ACWA called for:

- Repeal of a section of the Tariff Act which reduces duty on U.S. products "assembled" abroad, especially those at Mexican border plants, and immediate efforts to improve wages and working conditions on the Mexican side of the border.
- Additional federal legislation for the protection of consumers against faulty and hazardous products and fraudulent sales practices.
- Full organizing and bargaining rights for farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act.
- Fuller protection for women workers against discrimination.
- Appropriation of federal funds for the expansion of day care facilities for children of working mothers.

on June 1, 1972. Since each raise is figured cumulatively, the total will reach 21.3 percent for piece workers.

The increase for time-work craftsmen will range from 57.1 cents an hour for floor and auxiliary helpers to $1 an hour for cutters, both based on a 35-hour workweek.

For the lowest-earning craft, the increase will average 25 percent over the contract term, the union said.

The settlement also provides substantial increases in all minimums and averages, especially for the lower-paid classifications, the union said. Higher overtime premiums also are provided for piece workers.

Mendelsund stressed the winning of major improvements in the cloakworkers' already extensive health and welfare benefits. Employer contributions will rise to 15 percent of payroll by next Jan. 1 to pay for these benefits, he said. They include:

- A dental care program, said by the ILGWU to be the first ever won by any group of garment workers in the United States.
- Scholarship opportunities for workers, either for upgrading within the trade or for general education at accredited institutions of higher learning.
- Pre-retirement programs, prepared by a professional agency, to help workers 55 or older prepare for retirement.
- Arrangements with established agencies to set up a rehabilitation program for workers suffering from drug addiction.

Also new is the extension of major medical benefits to the children of members to the age of 18.

The present length-of-service benefit, won three years ago for workers with three years of service at one firm, will be transformed into a third week's vacation payment to all workers employed for one year in the industry, regardless of length of employment at any one shop. The payment will be computed at the rate of 2 percent of the worker's earnings for the preceding year.

Other changes include a new semi-annual "work bonus" paid on June 15 and Dec. 15 each year, in amounts depending on earnings; a ninth paid holiday, and employer payment of disability insurance, formerly paid out of union health-and-welfare funds.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg called the agreement a significant advance in the union's efforts to lift workers' wages and benefits while bolstering industry stability.

Employer parties to the pact are the New York Coat & Suit Association, the Infants & Children's Coat Association and the American Cloak & Suit Manufacturers' Association. They account for about 70 percent of U.S. women's coat and suit production valued at more than $600 million annually, the ILGWU reported.

High Jobless Area Listing Grows to 16

Unemployment is having an increasing impact on major job centers in the United States. Of 150 such areas, 16 now have "substantial" unemployment of 6 percent or more, the highest level since April 1966.

Five areas were added to the list during May on the heels of three added in April and two in February.

Newcomers to the "substantial" unemployment classification during May were Waterbury, Conn.; Baton Rouge, La.; Fall River, Mass.; the Huntington, W. Va., and Ashland, Ky., area, and Wichita, Kansas.

The rise in joblessness also is reflected in a steady increase in the number of workers who are exhausting their unemployment benefit rights. While new claims for benefits declined moderately during late May, benefit exhaustions mounted in the eight large states which provide such reports weekly.

There were 13,293 workers who exhausted their rights in these states alone, 1,287 more than the number reported for the preceding week. Totals for each state were: California 4,379; New York 2,101; Michigan 1,807; Illinois 1,326; New Jersey 1,088; Indiana 1,074; Massachusetts 860, and Pennsylvania 658.

In Michigan alone, the state Employment Security Commission reported, 21,060 workers had exhausted benefits during the first four months of this year. This compares with some 40,000 for the entire year of 1969.

eagle symbol of the farm workers' union.

The first shipment from California was displayed with appropriate ceremony at the headquarters of the New York Union Label & Service Trades.

Pres. Samuel J. Talarico of the state label trades department, Pres. Charles J. Garrahan of the New York City organization and Harry Avrutin, secretary-treasurer of both groups, said they would do their best to get the message to 2 million trade unionists in the state that union grapes are for sale.

Arrival of the grapes does not end the boycott of non-union grapes, they stressed. The boycott will continue, they said, until all grape producers permit their workers to vote and their union to negotiate fair contracts where it has been chosen as bargaining agent.

The state label trades department said it will deploy a voluntary "union defense corps" to see that the crates in which the UFWOC union label has been branded are not filled with "scab" grapes once they have been emptied of union label grapes.

The grape harvest culminated a five-year struggle by farm workers to win recognition from table grape growers, whose workers are not protected by federal labor law.

The union broke through to contracts with a dozen wine grape growers, and this year won its first pacts with California table grape ranchers who had been refusing to bargain. Seven ranchers now have signed contracts.

The growers represent less than 10 percent of the industry but others are waiting, UFWOC says, to see how the wind is blowing—and how union grapes are selling.

Keene Larson, one of the Coachella Valley growers who has signed an agreement with UFWOC, said the demand for union label grapes "seems to be very healthy" in areas like New York and Boston—and "that hasn't been apparent for the last two years."

The battle of the farm workers has been strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, its unions and other sectors of the labor movement. Chavez has told audiences repeatedly that his members can win through only as a union supported by other unions.

Struck City Loses State Convention

Rapid City, S.D.—The 50th annual convention of the South Dakota Federation of Labor has been canceled as a measure of support for 30 striking members of the Fire Fighters. The conclave, scheduled for June 5-6, will be rescheduled later, State AFL-CIO Pres. Clifford Shrader said.

Members of IAFF Local 1040 walked out when Rapid City officials refused to negotiate wages and conditions. When the city secured a no-strike injunction, union members resigned.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan said the union is "gratified" with the evidence of labor support. City firemen struck when the city hired strikebreakers to take their jobs, he said.

950 Workers Certified for Tariff Act Aid

About 950 Rubber Workers who lost their jobs at a Woonsocket, R.I., rubber footwear plant because of growing imports have been certified eligible by the Labor Dept. for weekly cash benefits.

The Labor Dept. action follows earlier approval by the U.S. Tariff Commission of adjustment assistance under the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

The workers, members of URW Local 224 at the Uniroyal Rubber Footwear plant, are eligible for a cash readjustment allowance equal to 65 percent of their weekly pay with a maximum payment of $85 a week.

Duration of the payments is normally limited to 52 weeks, the Labor Dept. noted, but up to 26 additional weeks may be allowed for workers to complete approved training courses. An additional 13 weeks may be allowed for those who were over 60 when they were separated from their jobs.

The certification by the Labor Dept. marks the first time that footwear workers were made eligible for the allowances. Four previous certifications were for Steelworkers.

The five certifications add up to a total of about 1,900 workers eligible for the payments, the Labor Dept. noted.

The Uniroyal plant was completely shut down in April.

Overturns Landmark Ruling:

High Court Weakens Ban On Antistrike Injunctions

The court majority said its decision applies only to disputes where a union has bound itself not to strike in disputes over grievances.

In a brief supporting the Retail Clerks the AFL-CIO had asked the justices to uphold the appeals court.

The federation argued that the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction provisions and the federal law governing labor arbitration are "basically consistent."

The premise of both, its brief said, is that judges are unsuited to the task of setting the basic rules governing parties to a labor dispute, and that the public interest is best served by the use of settlement methods other than lawsuits.

When Congress passed the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the brief noted, it expressed "clear disapproval of (the) free-wheeling judicial exercises" of the era ended in 1932. And the federal law of labor arbitration, it added, is "based on the recognition that the courts should not administer collective agreements."

The federation said "Norris-LaGuardia was not simply a repudiation of the substance of the general labor law. . . . It was a condemnation of a particular procedural device—the injunction." In enacting the law, "Congress was intent upon taking the federal courts out of the labor injunction business."

The brief called the temporary restraining order and the preliminary injunction "inherently inappropriate methods for deciding labor disputes."

The majority opinion in the current case, written by Justice William J. Brennan, insisted that "our holding . . . is a narrow one."

"We do not undermine the vitality of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. We deal only with the situation in which a collective bargaining contract contains a mandatory grievance adjustment or arbitration procedure."

Brennan cautioned that the ruling does not mean that an injunction is "appropriate as a matter of course in every case of a strike over an arbitrable grievance."

The Retail Clerks strike involved in the case occurred in 1969. Union members walked out when a supervisor and a non-union crew began to rearrange merchandise in a frozen food case and refused to let the union members restock the case. The employer sued, claiming the labor-management contract forbade strikes over grievances that should be sent to arbitration.

The suit was moved to federal court after the California Superior Court issued a temporary order against picketing. A District Court judge ordered the parties to arbitrate the dispute, as their contract provided, and banned all picketing.

This decision was reversed by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which said it was bound by the Supreme Court's 1962 ruling in the Sinclair case, which stressed the Norris-LaGuardia Act's provision that "no court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or permanent or temporary injunction in any case involving or growing out of a labor dispute" so as to prohibit strikes.

The high court has now concluded that "Sinclair was erroneously decided and that subsequent events have undermined its continuing validity."

Brennan wrote that in the light of recent Supreme Court decisions, "it has become clear that the Sinclair decision does not further, but rather frustrates, realization of an important goal of our national labor policy."

The Sinclair decision, he wrote, "seriously undermined the effectiveness of . . . arbitration . . . as a method peacefully to resolve industrial disputes." He concluded that the Norris-LaGuardia Act does not bar injunctive relief "in the circumstances of the present case."

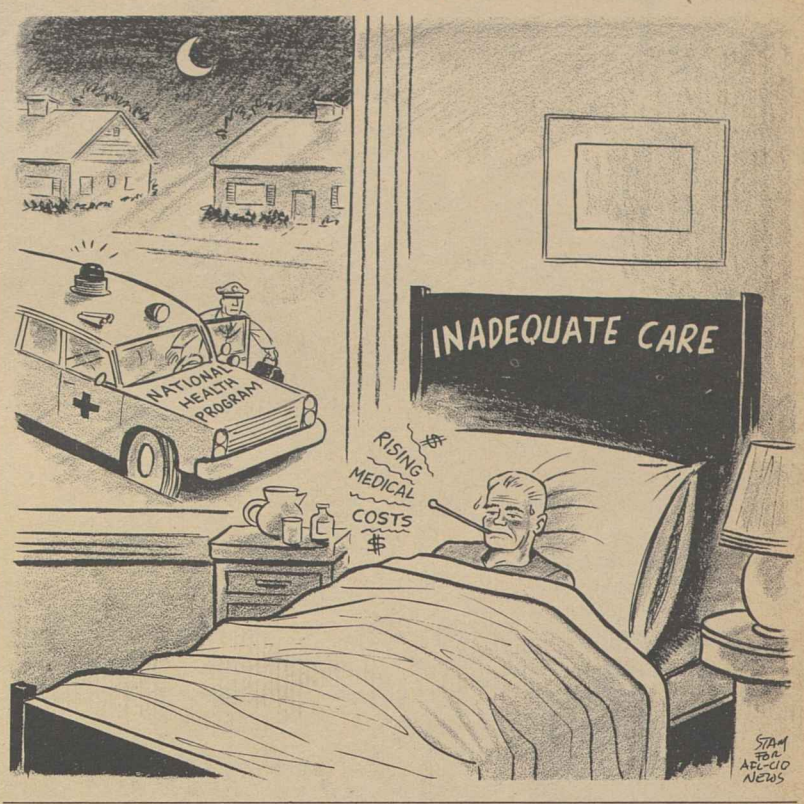
Justices Hugo R. Black and Byron R. White dissented. Justice Thurgood Marshall, who has been ill, did not participate.

Black, whose views agreed with the AFL-CIO's in its brief, said: "I remain of the opinion that Sinclair was correctly decided. . . . Nothing at all has changed except the membership of the court and the personal views of one justice."

Justice Potter Stewart concurred in the majority decision. He had voted the other way in the Sinclair case.



Black noted in his dissent that eight years ago, "after full briefing and argument, relying on the language and history of the (Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin) Acts, the court decided that Congress did not wish this later statute to impair in any way Norris-LaGuardia's explicit prohibition against injunctions in labor disputes."

He continued: "Although Congress has been urged to overrule our holding in Sinclair, it has steadfastly refused to do so. Nothing in the language or history of the two Acts has changed."

Even if the majority is correct in saying that Sinclair misinterpreted the Acts, Black said, "I should be compelled to dissent. I believe that both the making and the changing of laws which affect the substantial rights of the people are primarily for the Congress, not this court."

Black stressed that "the court's function in the application and interpretation of such laws must be carefully limited to avoid encroaching on the power of Congress to determine policies and make laws to carry them out."

Emergency Call

Arizona Delegates Hail Full Health Care Plan

Yuma, Ariz.—Delegates to the Arizona AFL-CIO's 14th state labor convention cheered the announcement of plans for a prepaid comprehensive health care program for all Arizona union members and their families and unanimously approved a resolution calling for a "medical and health bill of rights" for every American.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman told delegates the health care program, still in the planning stages, is scheduled to start in about two years.

Arizona labor, the AFL-CIO building trades and the construction industry have authorized the Group Health Association of America to devise a program which, Seidman said, could in time become "the backbone of a national health insurance plan."

Labor-management discussions on the subject have been under way for about six months. They include plans for construction of a health center offering all medical services short of hospitalization and a contract with a group of physicians who will devote their skills exclusively to the center and its labor participants.

Some 160 delegates from about 150 affiliated unions heard Seidman declare that, "with national health insurance, America could lead the world in health care."

He said "this is a challenge we can and must meet. The AFL-CIO intends to spare no effort to obtain enactment of national health insurance at the earliest possible date."

The convention devoted much of its time to workshops on prepaid group health plans, federal labor policies, and state legislative reapportionment for election purposes.

Afterwards the delegates approved a resolution endorsing the national health insurance bill introduced into Congress by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.). The bill, the resolution stated, "incorporates the fundamental principles of a medical and health Bill of Rights necessary for the establishment of a comprehensive national health program."

The convention also proposed three major changes in the state Workmen's Compensation laws, updated its constitution in line with guidelines formulated by the AFL-CIO, and picked Douglas as the site of its May 1971 convention.

A report by Pres. Horace Bounds, Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock and the executive board spelled out the need for changes in state laws. It asked coverage under the workmen's compensation law for hazards from occupational diseases as well as accidental injuries; urged that agricultural workers also be included, along with industrial and clerical workers; and specified improved ways for workers to appeal decisions by state hearing officers.

Aycock called for a united effort in behalf of sympathetic candidates in state elections in September and November. He said the present employer-controlled legislature has weakened laws protecting workers and has repealed the woman's eight-hour-day law. He cited the anti-labor activities of U.S. Sen. Paul Fannin (R) and called him "an embarrassment to the state of Arizona."

Settlement Hopes Seen In Goodyear Dispute

Akron—The Rubber Workers union is reportedly nearing a settlement of its six-week strike against the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., the union reported as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Settlement of the strike of 23,000 workers at 15 Goodyear plants was expected momentarily on the basis of progress made in talks between management and the URW negotiating committee headed by Pres. Peter Bommarito and Vice Pres. Kenneth Oldham.

Any terms reached in Milwaukee, where the Goodyear bargaining has been taking place, are expected to set a pattern for contracts with the B. F. Goodrich Co. and the General Tire & Rubber Co.

The Goodyear walkout began when contracts expired Apr. 21 at plants in 15 cities. Management had failed to make a meaningful effort to reach agreement in six weeks of across-the-table negotiations, union committeemen reported.

The strike spread May 6 to Goodrich plants with 11,000 workers in eight states. They set up picket lines also while contract talks continued with the two struck members of the rubber industry's Big Four, and two firms whose employes kept working under contract extension—Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and Uniroyal Inc.

The union's contract with General Tire expired May 15 but was extended also. The union reported all the non-struck firms are "standing by" until the industry leaders decide to settle.

The union is asking for a sizable wage increase in keeping with high company profits and steadily rising living costs. Other major issues are pension benefits keyed to the living-cost index, and clear language to protect employes against toxic chemicals and related work hazards.

"a most important case" and he handed down a decision asserting that Mexican-Americans are "an identifiable minority group" and are entitled to the same protection against discrimination and illegal segregation as the Supreme Court has afforded to Negroes.

The local school superintendent had argued that the constitutional requirements of desegregating former dual school systems had been met by "integrating" black and Mexican-American students. The latter, he told the court, were "white" and that was enough to meet the desegregation requirements of the Supreme Court.

Attorneys for the parents contended that boundary lines were drawn on a discriminatory basis, that a new high school was located so as to promote, rather than minimize segregation, and that the school system hires, assigns and promotes teachers and staff on a discriminatory basis.

Among those testifying to the long-standing segregation patterns in the city's schools were Dr. Hector Garcia, local physician who has served on the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and the U.S. delegation to the United Nations; Steelworkers Rep. Paul Montemayor, who as a youngster walked long distances to segregated schools, and Jose Cisneros, father of five and a leader in the Mexican-American community.

In addition to ordering desegregation of the school system, the federal judge acted to establish a local Human Relations Commission to study and promote a unified school system. He asked for nominations of five Negro, five Anglo and five Mexican-American members of the community, from whom he will choose a 12-member commission.

In addition, Judge Seals said, the court will retain jurisdiction of the case until he is satisfied that the illegal dual system will not be reestablished.

IBEW Gives Strike Story On Television

Beaumont, Tex.—Union representatives went on TV here to tell the public why 2,200 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have been on strike for six weeks against the giant Gulf States Utilities.

The strike began, IBEW Local 2286 said, after GSU laid off 16 men in Baton Rouge, La., for refusing to cross an Iron Workers' picket line. Management docked the pay of a steward who tried to settle the dispute. When the firm made no good-faith effort to negotiate, other employes joined the strike.

Within a week, the walkout was system-wide. The strikers stopped work in the utility's office, gas and electrical departments in eastern Texas and southern Louisiana. Members of IBEW Local 390 in Port Arthur, Tex., who work for contractors doing GSU construction work, also went on strike after their contract negotiations broke down in May.

Local television stations invited both sides to discuss their differences. When GSU officials refused to accept, IBEW members were given full time to tell the facts. One was that since 1960 wages have increased about 39 percent for most company workers while GSU net income rose by 117 percent.

The IBEW unseated an entrenched "employes' association" in March 1969 but GSU management refused to recognize it for several months. Formal negotiations began last October and have inched along ever since.

Prompt Action Urged to Solve Housing Crisis

federal reserve funds into the mortgage market.

Instead, the lending institutions have withdrawn funds from the mortgage market and given preference "to such questionable capital outlays as gambling casinos and conglomerate takeovers."

Turning to the Administration bill being considered by the subcommittee, Goldfinger said its good points are marred by provisions that would weaken existing legislation or perpetuate shortcomings.

To consolidate the "very useful" rent supplement program with a separate interest subsidy program, Goldfinger suggested, "is to codify it out of existence."

Likewise, Goldfinger noted, the Administration bill would eliminate or weaken Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage standards in a number of government housing programs.

"This sort of 'recodification' of workers' rights serves to only bring the entire measure under suspicion," he warned.

Stressing the importance of making mortgage money available at reasonable interest rates, Goldfinger noted that the added cost to the homebuyer of raising the FHA and VA interest ceiling by one percentage point came to $5,000 on a $20,000, 30-year mortgage.

That amounts to "more than the entire on-site labor cost, the total wages and fringe benefits of all the workers who built his house."

NASA Lauds Unionists for Space Efforts

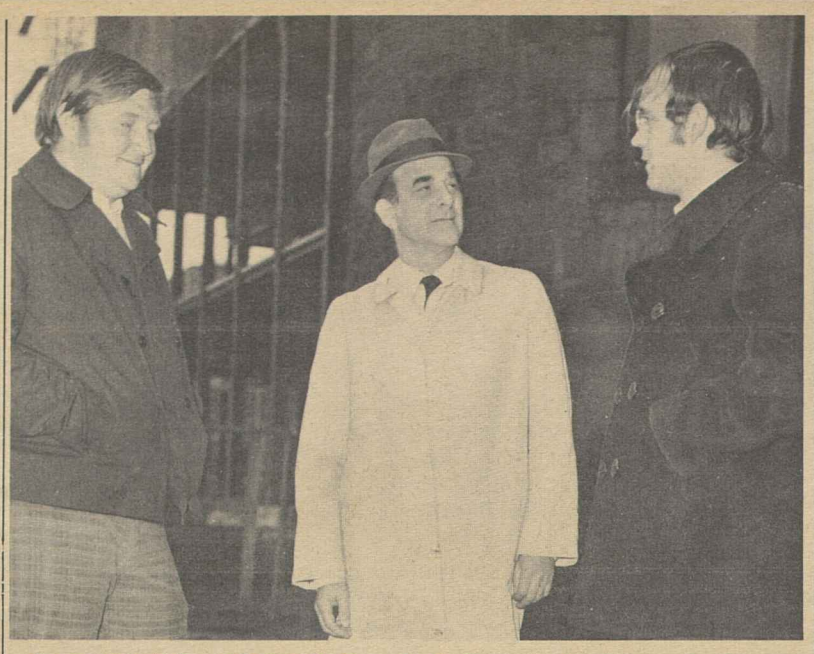
New Orleans—More than 40 union members, their unions and employers were honored by the National Aeronautics & Space Administration at the Union-Industries Show for their contributions to the U.S. Space program.

Machinists Vice Pres. George L. Watkins and three NASA officials presented certificates to Pres. Joseph M. Bertucci of the New Orleans Building & Construction Trades Council, Sec. Peter Babin of the area Metal Trades Council, and union members from the Michoud, La., and Mississippi test facilities.



The unions included: at Michoud, Asbestos Workers Local 53, Boilermakers 37, Bricklayers 1, Carpenters 1846, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers 133, Elevator Constructors 16, Operating Engineers 406, Hotel & Restaurant 166, Iron Workers 58 and 500, Laborers 821, Lathers 62, Lithographers 238, Machinists 37 and 405, Office Employes 403, Painters 1244, Plasterers 93 and 567, Plumbers 60, Roofers 141, Sheet Metal Workers 11.

At Mississippi: Boilermakers Local 12, Mobile, Ala.; Bricklayers 10 and Painters 107, Biloxi; IBEW 903, Carpenters 1518, Laborers 469, IAM 405 and Plumbers 568, all of Gulfport; Operating Engineers 624, Jackson.

Arywitz Heads L.A. United Fund

Los Angeles—Sigmund Arywitz, secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor, has assumed the presidency of the area AID-United Givers charitable fund-raising organization.

Arywitz, who will serve a two-year term until 1972, is the 12th president to head the organization. He was installed at the 19th annual luncheon meeting of the AID-United Givers fund on May 27.

CITIZENS' ADVOCATE Sam J. Nalbone—the first ombudsman for the city of Jamestown, N.Y.—discusses municipal operations with two Jamestown residents. Nalbone is on leave from his post as a district representative for the Machinists.

Union Leader Named 'Ombudsman' for City

Jamestown, N.Y.—That old saying, "you can't fight City Hall" is losing its impact, thanks in part to Sam J. Nalbone, Jamestown's first ombudsman.

Nalbone, who is on leave from his post as business representative of Machinists' District 65, was appointed ombudsman in February by Mayor Stanley Lundine. The Democratic mayor created the position as a "direct link between the people and the government."

Nalbone serves as a one-man governmental troubleshooter and complaint department. He is responsible for investigating residents' complaints on all matters involving the city except those relating to police cases.

The ombudsman office, located in City Hall, is open daily from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., to all citizens who have complaints or inquiries.

"In my judgment," said Nalbone, "there has been a serious deficiency in government's ability to make basic information available and to respond to the complaints of its citizens. We hope the ombudsman position will eliminate this deficiency."

"Not all our calls are complaints," Nalbone reports. "Some are seeking help and others 'understandable' answers to their questions."

The Swedish government officially set up the ombudsman office in 1809, although there had been regional ombudsmen for many years before this. The position proved to be very successful, and it was eventually adopted in other Scandinavian countries as well as in Australia and New Zealand.

Recently the idea has caught on in the United States with several local governments adopting the office of ombudsman. The ombudsman of Nassau County, N.Y., was established in 1966. The State of Hawaii also has an ombudsman, and the City Council of New York City is now giving serious consideration to an ombudsman proposal. But, Jamestown is one of the few cities in the nation to create the position.

Why is the concept of an ombudsman or people's protector gaining such popularity? Why is an ombudsman necessary?

Nalbone explains:

"There are several reasons, I feel, that an ombudsman can more effectively deal with complaints and personal problems.

"First, government programs and administration have grown in both numbers and complexity. Very often people are bewildered by a large and complex government structure.

"Many citizens have scanty knowledge as to who their public officials are, and what exactly are their functions and duties. Very often there is a question as to which department or official can give them help regarding a specific problem.

"Often the length of time involved in bringing a grievance through accepted channels may be too long to be effective in regard to solving a specific problem.

"Many citizens are suspicious of the 'power structure' of government and feel their actions would be futile.

"Therefore, the position of ombudsman is valuable not only to answer specific questions or redress particular grievances, but to give people confidence in their government and to give them the realization that they can indeed effect change. Government must be responsive to the needs of individuals in order for citizens to retain confidence in the democratic process."

In the first full month Nalbone was on the job as ombudsman, he handled 153 complaints or requests for assistance from Jamestown citizens.

EEOC Study Explores Bias In Southwest

Poverty, unemployment and discrimination experienced by many of the 3.5 million Mexican-Americans in the Southwest are explored in a study released by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Although the problems are widespread among these people, they have received scant attention in national affairs, the study concludes in one of its findings. "This comes partly from the one-sided treatment given the Southwest by U.S. historians," it suggests.

The study, titled Spanish Surnamed American Employment in the Southwest, was prepared by Prof. Fred Schmidt of the UCLA Institute of Industrial Relations.

There is evidence of a job caste that walls off white collar jobs for these workers which appears worse than the job discrimination affecting Negroes in other areas, the study reports.

It also notes that employment opportunities for Mexican-Americans appear better with private industry than with government contractors.

50 Cents Over 3 Years:

Per Capita Payment Boosted by RWDSU

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A 50-cent increase in monthly per capita payments was voted by the convention of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, which also heard appeals for increased activity on behalf of labor candidates in the 1970 elections.

The present per capita rate of $1.15 will go up in steps to $1.65 by 1973 as a result of the action by the 750 delegates and alternates to the union's 11th constitutional convention.

The per capita boost is designed to pay for increased services to locals, improvements in the staff pension plan and other administrative expenses, RWDSU Pres. Max Greenberg explained.

The need for vigorous political action by labor in 1970 was emphasized by guest speakers I. W. Abel, president of the Steelworkers, and Al Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Urging all unionists to ignore the differences and work for common goals, Abel said the 1970 congressional elections are especially important in the wake of the narrow 1968 defeat of Hubert Humphrey for the presidency.

Abel said the result of that 1968 loss has been a "high money Administration," which is "insensitive to the interests of labor and indifferent to the needs of American working people."

Barkan stressed the danger of losing Congress to reactionary elements and urged a three-point list of "must" union activities for 1970.

"We must educate the worker to judge the candidate, make sure all trade unionists register to vote and contribute dollars to COPE," Barkan told the convention. "We must accomplish all three or we face grave danger in the months ahead."

The delegates, who represent 175,000 workers in the retail, food processing, nursing home, hospital and other industries, heard a special report on the union's external organizing campaign, which Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps termed successful.

Other area reports were scheduled for later in the week-long convention.

The convention was also scheduled to hear from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress, Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen, Bayard Rustin, executive director of A. Philip Randolph Institute, and William Kircher, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

One-Way Trade Policy Linked to Job Losses

"about as naive as the Chase Manhattan Bank hiring Bonnie and Clyde as bank guards."

Pres. George O. Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers and Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers told the committee that imported shoes are making greater inroads in the American market because they result in greater profits for the stores that carry them, not because they bring any savings to consumers.

An industry spokesman backed up the union leaders on this point, testifying that retailers can make twice the profit on imported shoes that they make on American-made shoes.

Mara and Fecteau said U.S. production of shoes dropped by nearly 20 million between 1960 and 1969, while imports over the same period rose from less than 27 million pairs a year to 195 million pairs—about one-fourth of all U.S. sales.

Nor has the trend been halted, the union witnesses said. Between January 1969 and March 1970—a 15-month period—total employment in the shoe industry dropped 5.6 percent and the number of production workers had declined 6.2 percent.

In testimony already presented to the committee, and in statements scheduled to be given before the hearings are concluded, unions representing workers in other industries have cited comparable statistics.

Abel spoke of some of the factors that have brought about the deterioration of the U.S. trade position.

He spoke of the "dramatic revival of the war-devastated economies, a revival which we helped."

He cited the internationalization of technology "because of improved communications and a sharp rise in U.S. investment in foreign countries—investment not only of money but of American technology."

Through multi-national corporations, most based in the United States, a firm "can produce components in widely separated plants in Korea, Formosa and the U.S., assemble the product in a plant on the Mexican side of the border and sell the goods in the U.S.—perhaps with the U.S. brand name."

And while the United States trade policy leaves the door open to imports from abroad, many of the nations that protest proposals for quotas on U.S. imports have their own heavy restrictions on U.S. goods coming into their countries.

"We still believe in a healthy expansion of trade with other nations," Abel said, but it must be "a two-way street." Expanded trade should result in expanded employment—"here at home and in the nations we trade with."

In the legislative and trade policy areas, Abel suggested:

- Assurance that domestic industries hardest hit by imports will at least hold their own and share in the total economy's growth.
- Limitation and taxation of the export of capital to finance American-owned manufacturing facilities abroad.
- Truth-in-import labeling legislation to identify the origin of all imported products.
- An "international crash program" of international fair labor standards to raise substandard wages to acceptable minimums.
- More effective adjustment assistance for all workers displaced by a rise in imports.
- Establishment of a cabinet-level Dept. of Foreign Trade which would be concerned not just with business interests but with "the American worker, his job, his livelihood, his security."

Union Label Show A New Orleans 'Hit'

The mood was festive and the atmosphere like "old home week" for the crowds of sightseers who visited the Union-Industries Show in New Orleans on its first trip to the Deep South.

Public response to the six-day visit was so encouraging that the show's sponsors, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., decided to hold the 1971 show—the 26th—in Atlanta, Ga.

Attendance in New Orleans exceeded 219,000, Department Dir. Joseph Lewis said. He wasn't guessing, because, while attendance was free, all those admitted had to drop a ticket at the door.

Every hour on the hour, someone drew a ticket and received a gift. Radios, television sets and other mementoes of the show were given by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Retail Clerks and other exhibitors.

The Export of U.S. Jobs

THE UNITED STATES position in world trade deteriorated in the 1960s, with adverse impacts on American workers, communities and industries. The deterioration continues in the 1970s, with further displacement of U.S. production and loss of American jobs.

The basic causes are major changes in world economic relationships during the past 25 years, which accelerated in the 1960s. Among these changes are the spread of government-managed national economies, the internationalization of technology, the skyrocketing rise of investments of U.S. companies in foreign subsidiaries and the mushrooming growth of U.S.-based multi-national corporations.

U.S. government policies and doctrines, which were developed to meet world economic conditions of the 1930s and 1940s, are utterly unrealistic today. Moreover they contribute to undermining the U.S. economic position in the world. Their continuation in the 1970s spells further losses for U.S. production and employment.

Solutions cannot await additional long-range studies. Action must start now. Workers, whose jobs are at stake—from a rising tide of imports, frequently produced with modern technology at wages 50 to 90 percent below U.S. levels—must not be told to wait another year or two or three for the findings of yet another study, while the displacement of U.S. production and export of American jobs accelerates.

Changes in world economic relationships have made two old concepts—"free trade" and "protectionism"—outdated and increasingly irrelevant. U.S. government policy must face up squarely to the increasing export of American technology and jobs by U.S. companies for their own private advantage. U.S. government policy must also face up to the reality that foreign governments directly and indirectly bar imports from the United States, while they spur exports to the huge American market.

A THOROUGH REVISION of U.S. government posture and policies, in the related areas of international trade and investment, is required. The AFL-CIO urges this committee to initiate the legislation needed to enable America to meet the economic realities of the world of the 1970s—for the orderly expansion of world trade, on a reciprocal basis, and the improvement of the U.S. trade position in the interest of the American people.

U.S. government measures are required:

- To stop helping and subsidizing U.S. companies in setting up and operating foreign subsidiaries—to repeal Section 807 and similar provisions of the Tariff Code, for example, and to repeal the tax provision which permits the deferral of U.S. taxes on the income of U.S. companies from their foreign subsidiaries.
- To supervise and curb the substantial outflows of American companies for investment in foreign operations.
- To develop regulations covering U.S.-based multi-national companies.
- To press, in appropriate international agencies, for the establishment of international fair labor standards in world trade.
- As a stop-gap in the face of growing unresolved problems, to regulate the flow of imports into the United States of a variety of goods and product-lines, in which sharply rising imports are displacing significant percentages of U.S. production and employment in such markets.

Ivy Leaguer Peels Back Cover On Radicals in Student Revolt

By John P. Roche

SOME YEARS AGO the New Leader, that remarkable and too often overlooked magazine of opinion, had an article on young radicals that was extremely impressive. The author was a senior in high school on Long Island who was entering Harvard in the fall. There was general agreement that he was a wunderkind and the hope was expressed that Harvard would not do him too much damage.

The last sentiment was, of course, the bias of City College graduates, who always looked on the Ivy League universities as essentially rest homes. But nobody could fault Steven Kelman's timing. Whatever Harvard may have been like in the past, the years 1966-70 brought incredible changes and Steve was right there in the middle of the scene keeping tabs on radical activities, watching the nuts ripen, and working in behalf of democratic socialism.

Kelman's observations can be found in "Push Comes to Shove: The Escalation of Student Protest" (Houghton Mifflin), which is the sharpest chronicle of student unrest that has yet appeared from the student side. Kelman begins the story with his arrival in Cambridge four years ago and takes it through the seizure of Massachusetts Hall and the police bust last year.

For many readers, his perspective will be both perplexing and intriguing. While his critique of his fellow students of the SDS persuasion makes Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew sound gentle and compassionate, Kelman attacks from the left, that is, from the tradition of responsible radicalism. The gist of his indictment of the extremists is not that they are radicals threatening the status quo, but the contrary: they are psychotics who destroy the credibility of authentic radicalism.

Kelman, in other words, believes that the United States is anything but utopia. He is dedicated to achieving basic structural changes in our society, and is totally committed to democracy as the nonviolent route to his objectives.

Above all, he cherishes reason. One gets a real sense of pathos in reading his accounts of patient efforts to communicate rationally with his extremist peers.

This is important stuff for faculties and administrations that are confronted by extremist demands. When the howl goes up for "student power," most administrations are shocked. American colleges are the freest institutions on this planet, so the consensus of decent academic folk is that there is a "failure in communication" with the students. Rarely is this the case.

ON THE CONTRARY, student extremists are determined not to communicate in any real situation of give-and-take: their objective is to demolish, not to improve.

My heart goes out to Kelman because I know from my own experience about 30 years ago what a blow it is to learn that most radical intellectuals despise people, that they resent the privileges of the rich far more than the degradations of the poor, that a significant percentage of them would set up a police state in 10 minutes if they had the power. (And that they would shoot me and probably find a job for George Wallace!) After a while, one builds up his defenses, though initial exposure to these harsh realities is sickening—if one cares.

Kelman has come out at the other end of this dark tunnel. He understands that to be without illusions is quite different from being disillusioned.

His book should be required reading for those concerned with the "student revolution," particularly for the apologists who, every time a bomb goes off or a building gets burned down, announce piously, "They are trying to tell us something."

Labor's Program Offers Hope For Closing 'Generation Gap'

THE ENORMOUS technological and social changes of the past 10 or 15 years have indeed produced a generation gap affecting all classes of youth. Young Americans have grown up in a radically altered physical environment—highways, suburbs, slums that weren't there before. The physical changes have produced cultural change: modern youth music presupposes advances in electronics. There is a new political psychology as well, for post-Depression youth really cannot imagine a total economic collapse.

But the gap between the generations must not blind us to the equally wide gaps within the generations. Youth are not a homogeneous class—they are not a class at all. Nor have the rapid changes of recent years affected all youth in the same way. For our purposes, youth can be divided into four categories.

First are the elite, the sons and daughters of educated, permissive and liberal upper or upper-middle class parents. They concentrate in liberal arts and today find themselves confronted by a confusing welter of life choices. The old patrician professions are disintegrating and the academic disciplines are proliferating as narrow specialization is more and more demanded.

The reaction of this elite is a status rebellion that calls for a return to social and economic simplicity. It is impatient with the complexities of the democratic process and is at home only with the "higher morality" of its own conscience. It fears the anonymity, the impersonality of mass higher education. It is the major source of both the New Left and much of the New Politics.

Next are the young bound for white collar jobs—school teachers, government employes, administrators, etc. Their roots are largely in the middle and lower-middle class. They manifest some of the elitism of the group (jealously guarding their "professionalism"), but are also moved by the economic concerns of working class youth. Because their number is growing rapidly, absolutely and relatively, they will have an enormous impact on the labor force. They are joining unions and displaying surprising militancy.

Then there are the blue collar working class youth. About 25 percent of the trade union membership is under 30. They are squeezed by inflation, hard put to get a home because of high interest and mortgage rates, and vulnerable to rising unemployment rates.

Feeling left behind other elements of society, young workers are among the most restive sections of the work force. Their militance stems largely from their having entered the labor market in the '60s when unemployment was relatively low; thus they may be less afraid to speak out than older workers who know what it means to be laid off and out of work.

Finally, there are the lumpen proletarian youth —slum kids who have largely been excluded from the work experience, who therefore lack work habits and discipline, and whose backgrounds are marked by social disorganization. Typically, they lack the social cohesion and work habits of earlier groups of lower class immigrants who were absorbed into economic life. Moreover, our technology has wiped out many of the unskilled jobs which served the earlier groups as a first rung on the economic ladder.

These youth present a profound challenge to labor and management alike. While I have no prescriptions to offer, I am convinced that the longer these young people are outside the labor force, the worse off society will be. It is equally clear that only under conditions of full employment can these youth be absorbed into economic life.

IN SHORT, there is as big a gap between the elite college student and the young blue collar worker as between those under 30 and those over that line. It is worth revealing that many of the National Guardsmen at Kent State were the same ages as the students who were shot.

But granting that there is a generation gap, what can the labor movement do about it? Lecturing the young workers on the great dynamism or on the victories of the past won't help. After all, we should be glad that young workers take past gains for granted. That's what gains are for —to be enjoyed. Preoccupation with the past is a sign of a stagnant, conservative mentality.

The valuable lessons and rich heritage of the past can be made vivid and meaningful through today's struggles over today's issues in today's world. Between labor's battles of yesterday and its struggles of today there is a straight and unbroken line of consistent human values. The past, it is often said, illuminates the present.

Every lasting movement or institution renews itself through and in each succeeding generation's attempt to grapple with the problems of a changed society. Labor's program today stands out as a great source of hope in a society torn by the crisis of inequality. Getting young workers onto the front lines of that fight is the surest way to close the gap.

'Bankrupt' Economic Policies Threaten Deepening Recession

THE ADMINISTRATION'S "experiment in classical economic theory" has thrown the national economy into a recession that shows few signs of easing under present policies, organized labor's top economist charged.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger said that Pres. Nixon's "utterly bankrupt" anti-inflation program "has led us down the garden path to the worst of all possibilities."

"We have the worst inflation in 20 years . . . the sharpest increase in unemployment in 10 years . . . and interest rates higher than at any time in the past 100 years," he declared. He pointed out that at the same time production continues to fall off, workweek cutbacks shrink paychecks, and the steady "upward movement of price levels eats away the buying power of working people."

The result, he warned, is a "spreading loss of confidence in the Administration's economic policies." Goldfinger appeared on Labor News Conference, broacast Tuesdays at 9:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The labor economist said that aside from the Federal Reserve Board's recent reduction of margin requirements "to stimulate speculation in the stock market," there is "no evidence whatsoever that the Administration is taking hold of the situation." He said the real need is for "proper allocation of resources . . . increased production . . . and increased employment," not "increased speculation in the stock market."

"WE HAVE TO GET at some of the urgent social needs in this country, such as rebuilding the cities and residential construction," he stressed, but the home building industry "has been clobbered" during the last 18 months by the Administration's policies of tight money and very high interest rates.

Goldfinger said the President should use the power Congress gave him four months ago to "set selective credit controls to curb the specific causes of credit inflation." He said there is an urgent need to "rebalance the whole credit structure . . . to prohibit the banks from rationing credit into places where it is not needed, such as gambling casinos and foreign business operations of U.S. companies."

Reporters questioning Goldfinger were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE MAJOR social problems of the Eisenhower Administration in the late Fifties was the number of long-term unemployed who exhausted their jobless benefits and were forced back on welfare or living off their relatives.

Although the unemployment situation today has not yet reached the proportions of that time, there are enough indications of growing joblessness that may bring the problem to the fore within the next few months.

Are we ready to meet such a crisis should it arise?

In 1958 some 500,000 workers found themselves not only without work but without unemployment benefits. After considerable debate, Congress extended benefits temporarily for a maximum of 13 weeks—that is 50 percent of the duration of ordinary benefits as provided for in state legislation.

The solution was far from perfect. State standards were inadequate to begin with—some states provided only nine regular weeks of benefits and only 4.5 weeks of extended benefits, for a total of 13.5 weeks—and that was the end. Other states never even bothered to extend benefits.

As unemployment dropped, the demand for reform dropped and it was not until 1961 that unemployment again reached crisis levels. Again stopgap legislation was adopted to meet the emergency, but lapsed when employment rose during the 1960s.

The need for some kind of permanent legislation to go into effect when a period of lengthy unemployment exhausts regular benefits still remained. Congress in 1966 took the matter up again. But the bill died in conference.

Now we have the beginning of a period when a considerable number of workers are exhausting their benefits. Each month, the U.S. Dept. of Labor reports on the number of workers who have exhausted their benefits under state systems of covered unemployment. The long term unemployment of workers who are not covered under the system is not even known since the states do not report it.

So far the number of reported exhaustions is not overwhelmingly large, but it is growing. In April, for example, eight large states noted that 12,112 workers had exhausted their benefits, an increase of 530 over the previous week. Over the nation, workers out of jobs for 15 weeks or longer reached the highest level in four years.

WITH THESE warning signs apparent, Congress has still to act decisively on a permanent program for meeting the problem of benefit exhaustions.

It has enacted legislation that takes a step in the right direction, but one that will need much improvement should unemployment continue its upward climb and duration. The current bill sets up a permanent federal-state program that would go into effect in 1972 —earlier if a state asks for it. It provides for the usual 50 percent extension of benefit duration and it would be triggered when covered unemployment reaches 4.5 percent.

While this program obviously is an improvement over sporadic temporary programs after the situation gets out of hand, it has a number of shortcomings. From organized labor's viewpoint, varying state standards are unsatisfactory. They may be as low as 10 weeks as compared with 26 weeks in other states. Labor has called for the 26-weeks standard on a federal basis.

And why postpone full operation of the new law to 1972?

It is true that states will have the right to come into the system earlier should unemployment get out of hand within their boundaries. But past history has shown that some states—notably those with low standards to begin with—may well be reluctant to move earlier than they have to.

Finally, the "trigger" figure of 4.5 percent unemployment is not quite as low as it may sound. "Covered" employment is smaller than overall employment and economists estimate that a 4.5 percent "covered" rate actually would mean a 5.5 percent general rate. During April the national unemployment rate was 4.8 percent which means that the "trigger" 4.5 percent—actually 5.5 percent—has not yet been reached. However, it would appear to be on its way.

The current bill has not completed its congressional voyage. A conference report is pending in both the House and Senate.

PRES. NIXON should use the power Congress gave him four months ago to "set selective credit controls to curb the specific causes of credit inflation," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him on the interview program, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network, were Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

Merchandisers Use Gimmicks To Cash In on Youth Rebellion

By Sidney Margolius

THE CURRENT BIG CROP of teenage children, one-fourth of our population, now has over $22 billion from jobs and allowances to spend, the Rand Youth Service estimates.

As a result, teenagers have become the target of some very high pressure merchandising that is doing damage to families even beyond the waste of money. From rock records and concerts to pimple cures, and including "muscle" cars, expensive engagement and even "pre-engagement" rings, horoscopes, dandruff lotions and other commercial phenomena, teenagers have become one of the most exploited groups in our population.

The greatest irony is the way "the business establishment" is cashing in on the anti-establishment kids. The advertising agencies, manufacturers and radio and TV stations have seized upon the restlessness of today's teenagers to sell and sell hard.

The merchandisers don't need to fight the youth rebellion. They take it over. Want to be a hippie? There now are hippie clothing shops in most towns. They'll sell you fringed leather vests for $15, maxi coats for $60, "love beads" for $5. Want peace? VO-5 offers its new "Peacemaker Shampoo," complete with peace symbol. Want to be "in" with your generation? There are huge rock music festivals like the Woodstock festival in every region now, complete with fatalities, and in every city, nightly rock concerts, often at $5 a ticket.

The festivals represent a revealing alliance between large corporations and investment firms who finance them, and some of the hardest-rock and most lewd groups like the Rolling Stones. This British group can ring up a million dollars just in advance sales on a record. They can also draw a million dollars in teenage money to a concert with tickets as high as $8.

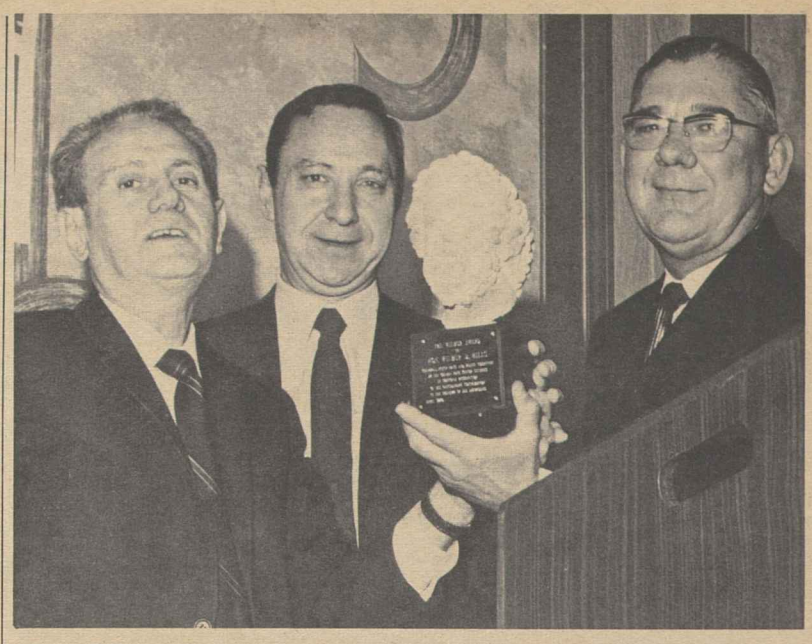
Not even subteens are safe from the commercialism of the new "youth culture" industry. The fashion, record and even cosmetics manufacturers are driving hard to capture the dollars of the 9- to 13-year-olds. This age group has become one of the three main divisions of the rock record market—so-called "bubblegum rock."

Rock records don't come cheap. An album by a popular hardrock group like the Jefferson Airplane lists for $5. Such expenditures are a frequent cause of family disputes today.

Who is going to counter the commercial exploitation of young people? It may not be the teachers to any decisive extent. They tend to rely on industry-provided classroom materials for teaching consumer education and related subjects. More than one out of five large corporations now supplies teaching aids to schools, such as discussion kits, films and booklets. Some corporations even provide speakers and prizes. At least one has given teachers travel awards; another, scholarships to workshops.

Teachers often are naive about such materials and even when not, are uncertain where to turn for guidance. In one recent teacher training course in which I participated, 11 of 14 other speakers were from industry or commercial magazines.

THE BASIC WAY to teach children a sense of values is to include them in family money discussions. They learn that family money must cover a number of needs, including their own.



Also teach them to be skilled shoppers. Youngsters usually are interested in learning how. It is especially useful to show them how to read the labels of toiletries, and to show them that the ingredients in the low-cost private brands of toiletries are much the same as those in TV-advertised expensive brands.

In anti-acne preparations, one of the most frequent teenage purchases, show that the basic ingredients of most of the preparations are the same. These usually are a combination of sulphur and resorcinol (or salicylic acid), sometimes with hexachlorophene (to kill bacteria).

In the final analysis, and even though these are outside influences to contend with, your children ultimately are going to follow your example—mainly, whether you plan purchases or buy impulsively; buy the most-advertised name or compare ingredients and values.

Finally, don't take horoscopes seriously. Fortune cookies are more reliable. One I recently got in a Chinese restaurant said: "Beware of a schemer with a smile."

Joint Attack Urged:

Drug Abuse Warning Sounded to Industry

LABOR'S TOP COMMUNITY SERVICE spokesman told a conference of corporation executives in Philadelphia that drug abuse in industry must be attacked just as alcoholism has been—by joint union-management committees.

Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities, was the sole speaker from labor among delegates to the first national conference on drug abuse in industry.

Citing a recent study by labor's community service representatives in 20 cities across the nation, Perlis said that while there is yet no "major drug abuse among union workers," almost all users are young, most of them under age 20, and bring the habit with them "from school, from the street, from home."

Therefore, "it is not unrealistic to expect the spread of drug abuse in industry if it is not checked in our cities and schools" for "here, in the final analysis, is where workers come from."

He called for a three-point program to detect, treat and rehabilitate addicts, and said, "The involvement of workers through their unions is a must if the program is to succeed."

The groundwork would be laid by:

- Training union counsellors who could function—like shop stewards, on company time—to refer workers with health and welfare problems including drug addiction, to available community resources.
- Negotiating extended health insurance programs for the complete medical and hospital coverage of the sick, including addicts.
- Promotion by unions and management of public and voluntary community facilities, such as treatment centers, half-way houses and other rehabilitation programs.

Labor has already taken some steps in the right direction, Perlis said. The labor press has given the drug problem wide coverage and AFL-CIO community service staff and volunteers have helped educate and inform both the community and their unions.

A potent vehicle for solution of the drug problem can be the union contract, Perlis pointed out, through provision for "union-management committees, union counsellors functioning on company time, as well as health care and hiring and firing" procedures.

An Extra Hour of Sleep Daily Could Ease World's Problems

By Jane Goodsell

THE OTHER MORNING I was lying in bed at 7:15 a.m. thinking deep, philosophic thoughts as I am wont to do for 10 minutes or so each morn after the alarm goes off. For some reason (metabolic rate? blood-flow gravity? oxygen supply?) my mind is at its keenest and most penetrating then. I feel eminently qualified to grapple with the problems of the universe. I also feel perfectly justified in taking my time about getting up.

Why should I rush, knowing as I do that I'll lapse into my usual state of befuddlement the minute I'm on my feet? Once up, I not only can't concentrate on cosmic problems, I have trouble remembering where we keep the toothpaste.

But to get back to the other morning when my idea for saving the world came to me. Like most brilliant inspirations (the theory of evolution and the law of gravity, for example), it now seems so obvious that it's hard to imagine why somebody else didn't think of it sooner.

Consider how much better off the world would be if everybody in it got even one extra hour of sleep every day. Surely, there is no easier way to alleviate violence, pollution, traffic, noise, overpopulation and all those other problems. People who are sound asleep are making a real, albeit negative, contribution to a better world.

They aren't polluting the atmosphere or burning college administration offices or clogging up the highways. They aren't adding to the population or provoking somebody else to mayhem or murder. They aren't writing letters to burden the postal system, nor littering the highways. They aren't creating bombs or noise or trouble. In short, they aren't doing any of the things which make the world an increasingly difficult place to live in. A person, however disruptive or troublesome or aggressive he may be when awake, is harmless as a baby sound asleep.

A SNOOZING HOUSEWIFE is helping society by the simple virtue of not doing anything. She isn't spraying her roses with pesticides, nor clogging the streams with detergents, nor adding to the inflationary spiral by reckless spending.

Not only would my proposal alleviate the world's major problems, it would automatically ensure a better-rested and, therefore, happier, healthier, less irritable citizenry. Which is certainly all to the good.

If you agree (and why wouldn't you?) write your congressman today. Come to think of it, an afternoon nap would likely do him a world of good, and it wouldn't do the world a speck of harm.

I never thought that I'd be sitting at the Captain's table.

Basic Reform Asked In Social Security

The Senate's Special Committee on Aging has called for "major reform" in the social security system "in order that older Americans today and in the future may share in the economic abundance they have created."

It urged Congress to give "serious consideration" to financing part of the costs of future social security improvements through general revenues — supplementing the present payroll tax paid equally by employers and workers.

The AFL-CIO and the National Council of Senior Citizens have urged such a three-way division of costs as the most equitable means of funding needed improvements.

The committee's report, although just published, was written before the House passage on May 21 of a 5 percent across-the-board increase in social security benefits, coupled with additional increases for about half the people on the benefit rolls.

The House also attached to the bill an automatic cost-of-living escalator for the future. The House bill is now before the Senate Finance Committee, which has legislative jurisdiction over social security.

The clear implication of the Committee on Aging report, however, was that the House bill—while moving in the right direction—falls short of the long-range goal of assuring an adequate income to retired workers and to those who will retire in the future.

Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr., said in a Senate speech that Americans of all ages should be concerned about the rising gap between retirement income and the income of those who receive regular earnings.

Despite improvements, he said, about 7 million of the 20 million Americans 65 or over live in poverty or near-poverty.

The Williams Committee, in what was termed an interim report of a study to be concluded this year, called for exploration of "methods whereby retirement benefits can be adjusted to reflect productivity, not just rising prices."

This, the committee majority noted, would enable retired workers to share in advances in living standards after they have left the active work force.

Williams also expressed concern that "a psychology of retrenchment is taking hold in programs meant to serve the elderly."

The committee report criticized cutbacks made last year in appropriations for programs for the aging, terming the reduction "a serious turn of events, which could possibly nullify to a substantial degree the accomplishments made under the Older Americans Act during its first four years."

On medical care programs, the committee urged the Administration to submit legislation to include under Medicare the cost of "those drugs that are important for treatment of chronic diseases that commonly affect the elderly."

It said problems of financing Medicaid programs should be met through reforms to eliminate any abuses, rather than by "highly damaging cutbacks."

A separate statement by the committee's nine Republicans acknowledged the income problems of the elderly and the need for social security improvements, but stressed that all this will "take time."

The GOP members strongly endorsed automatic cost-of-living increases in social security benefits. And eight of the nine Republicans joined in adding:

"While living-cost increases are important in modernization of social security, they are not a substitute for increasing the overall adequacy of the system in its design to provide income for older Americans. There is also need for across-the-board increases."

The dissenting member, Sen. Jack Miller (R-Ia.), said a cost-of-living escalator should be sufficient, without any further across-the-board benefit increase.

The GOP members also commented favorably on various proposals for a guaranteed minimum income for all older Americans, "outside the welfare pattern."

Slaiman at a conference in Hopewell Junction, N.Y., sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council for Human Rights. # Pipe Line Pact Brings Gains Of $3 an Hour

Dallas—The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters reached agreement with the Pipe Line Contractors Association on a new three-year contract with benefits totaling $3 an hour for some 5,000 workers.

The latest renewal of the National Pipe Line Agreement provides a wage increase of 70 cents an hour retroactive to May 1, with contractors paying an additional 5 cents an hour in the pension fund and 15 cents into the union-industry benefit fund. Wages will be raised an extra $1 an hour next May and an additional $1.10 a year later.

Under the old contract, journeyman rates ranged from $5.95 to $6.65 in three zones, plus 65 cents in fringe benefits. Welders' helpers, who got at least $2.85 an hour plus 65 cents in fringes, will get at least $3.15 under the new pact in 21 states, and parity with laborers' wages in 29 states.

Travel pay for journeymen in the new agreement is raised from 14 cents a mile to 15. Language of the new contract will be put into writing in a few weeks, Sec.-Treas. William T. Dodd of the union said.

Labor, Rights Groups Seen as Sharing Goals

Hopewell Junction, N.Y.—"The basic programmatic goals of the labor movement and the civil rights movement have converged," Norman Hill, associate director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told 250 trade unionists assembled at the seventh biennial conference of the National Trade Union Council on Human Rights.

The council, a division of the Jewish Labor Committee, met during Memorial Day weekend here to discuss the topic: "Labor in the 1970s."

Hill at the same time warned that these shared goals are being threatened by twin dangers—white fear and black rage. He outlined 'areas of challenge" that he said must be met by labor and its allies to offset this threat. These include the need to adhere to the principle of integration despite separatist fads, the need to demonstrate the usefulness of the political process, and the need to continue to advance a sound economic program.

He also stressed the need to "engage resources and manpower with ever greater urgency within the political arena," and the need for the labor movement "to become an agent of reconciliation between the have-nots and the have-littles."

Hill's address touched on problems discussed earlier in the conference by Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Tyler told the delegates that solution to the nation's social ills is made exceedingly difficult by gross maldistribution of income and wealth. He pointed out that the proportional breakdown of income distribution had not changed in the past 20 years and that average take-home buying power of non-supervisory workers had decreased every year from 1965 through 1969.

The result, he said, has been growing resentment among working people at having to foot the bill for social welfare programs while those most able to pay escape, through various tax loopholes, from shouldering their fair share of the burden of public expenditures.

Tom Kahn, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy, speaking on a panel on "youth and labor," admonished the gathering against too indulgent an attitude toward "new left" youth groups.

"Too many adults," he said, "have responded to student extremists by patting them on the head and saying 'I was also stupid when I was your age.'" Kahn noted that students are an increasingly active political force and must be dealt with seriously, whether as allies or as adversaries.

Amos Eiran, labor attache of the Israeli embassy, spoke to the final session of the conference on the topic "Labor and the Middle East Crisis." He lauded the AFL-CIO as "one of the strongest forces on the American scene that identifies itself with Israel's fight for survival and is unfailingly sympathetic to its problems." Eiran also discussed the urgent need for the United States to counteract increasing Soviet military involvement in the Middle East.

Advisory Unit Asks Action on Job Safety Law

A committee composed equally of labor, management and public representatives has unanimously declared it "imperative" that comprehensive safety-health legislation be enacted by Congress this year.

The 15-member group known as the National Safety Advisory Committee, was established last April by Sec. of Labor George P. Shultz to advise him on the worsening problem of on-the-job accidents and health hazards.

Following a meeting of the committee in Washington, Chairman Howard Pyle announced that a tripartite subcommittee will be formed to seek areas of general agreement on provisions that should be in a safety-health bill.

Shultz expressed hope that the subcommittee will perform an important role in gaining enactment of legislation "that meets the approval of employes, employers and others interested in the welfare of men and women on the job."

Labor members of the committee are: George Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Safety Committee; Alan Burch, safety director, Operating Engineers; Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke; Brewery Workers Sec.-Treas. Arthur P. Gildea; and Vice Pres. Elwood Swisher of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Incentive Pay Coverage Extended To 21,000 at Three Steel Firms

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Incentive pay coverage for more than 21,000 employes of three big steel companies has been won by the Steelworkers in agreements just negotiated.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel announced that a settlement with Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. follows earlier agreements with Armco Steel Corp. and Inland Steel Co. All three mean more money for more production above standards set by agreement of labor and management.

The incentive pay issue is an offshoot of the three-year contract settlement reached in 1968 for 400,000 employes of 11 basic steel firms. A three-man panel of arbiters ruled last Aug. 1 that all 11 companies must provide incentive pay coverage to at least 85 percent of their production and maintenance workers.

The J & L settlement was worked out just as new arbitration proceedings on a phase of the dispute were due to start May 27. It will add more than 8,000 employes to the incentive program at 10 locations—Aliquippa and Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cleveland, Louisville and Youngstown, O.; Detroit; Hammond and Indianapolis, Ind.; Hennepin, Ill., and Willimantic, Conn.

Incentive pay coverage under the settlement was increased from 52 percent to more than 85 percent of covered employes. The pact also provides backpay of 10 cents an hour from Aug. 1, 1968, to newly covered employes as interim compensation.

At Armco, the incentive pay agreement will bring more than 12,000 employes into the program—approximately 92 percent of the 13,000 workers in the union's bargaining units. Newly covered workers will get retroactive pay of 10 cents an hour also.

Armco plants are at Ambridge, Pa., Ashland, Ky., Baltimore, Houston, Kansas City, Mo., and Sand Springs, Okla.

The Inland Steel agreement extended coverage to an additional 1,374 workers at the company's Indiana Harbor works in East Chicago, Ind. Those affected will get pay hikes totaling $1.5 million a year, plus 10 cents an hour in retroactive pay for newly covered members of the union bargaining unit, Abel said.

Progress toward settlement is being made at other members of the "Big 11" and with some independent firms, according to James P. Griffin, union coordinator. At U.S. Steel Corp., the union resubmitted the issue to arbitration after extensive negotiations failed to produce an agreement.

Veteran Organizer R. E. Engelking Retires

Portland, Ore. — Roland E. "Barney" Engelking retired June 1 after 25 years of service as a staff representative for the AFL-CIO and the former CIO. His associates will salute him at a staff dinner June 12.

SECRETARY-TREASURERS of AFL-CIO affiliates listen to an address by Chairman Richard E. Livingston, secretary of the Carpenters, during the annual conference held in New Orleans.

Oral History Project Preserves Voice from Steel Labor's Past

New Orleans—Secretary-treasurers of AFL-CIO affiliates sat back during their annual conference here and listened to voices from the past of people who helped make history in the American labor movement.

The speakers were veteran members of the Steelworkers, rank-and-file workers, and local union officers who are unknown outside their own communities, but who played a decisive role in the building of their union.

Their voices were on tape recordings, which are a part of a USWA oral history project being conducted by the Pennsylvania State University through the cooperation of the union. The Steelworkers have already contributed $40,000 to finance the project.

The objective is to achieve a clearer, deeper view of the earlier days of American labor, notes Mrs. Alice Hoffman, director of the Penn State program.

"When we complete our project," Mrs. Hoffman said, "we think we will be able to write a different kind of history than has ever been written before. We will be able to document events with the warm feelings and recollections of people who made them."

The recordings also will be used to supplement written records of the USWA and to put the history of the union into better perspective.

Mrs. Hoffman appeared on a conference panel that discussed steps unions can take to improve their system of keeping records. Other members of the panel were Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker of the Newspaper Guild and Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke of the Steelworkers.

Other panels delved into the use of computers for union operations, greater participation of affiliates in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Inventment Trust, and the approaches unions employ to educate members on needs for per capita increases.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland extended thanks to the conference for the response by international unions, state and city central bodies in the General Electric boycott and fund-raising campaign.

Kirkland also cited the recent contract achievements of the Farm Workers and the marked improvement won by postal workers through the collective bargaining process.

AFL-CIO Gen. Counsel Albert Woll discussed the problems unions have encountered under 10 years of the Landrum-Griffin Law.

The conference, which represents the secretaries and treasurers of all federation affiliates, elected two new members to its steering committee.

They are Joseph L. Ames of the State, County & Municipal Employes and Al Kerr of the Seafarers. They replace the late Frank L. Noakes of the Maintenance of Way Employes and Charles A. Perlik, Jr., who is now the president of the Newspaper Guild.

The conference also heard Dir. Fred J. Hoehler, Jr., of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center urge affiliates to take full advantages of the center's programs.

William J. Pachler Dies, Utility Union President

William J. Pachler, a founding member of the Utility Workers and its president since 1960, died after a three-month illness at his home in Kensington, Md. He was 65.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said in messages of sympathy to his family and fellow union officers that "he was a loyal, dedicated trade unionist" who was a leader since the first days of the union and who "served the AFL-CIO with diligence and distinction."

Last rites were held in Holy Redeemer Church, Kensington, with burial in Gate of Heaven cemetery.

The union's executive board met after the services and elected Vice Pres. William R. Munger, another founding member, to succeed Pachler.

Born in Westchester County, N.Y., Pachler in 1933 was elected spokesman for Tremont Building employes of the New York Edison Co. When the firm became Consolidated Edison Co. in 1936, he became the first chairman of the Rider Ave. Plant Committee of Local 829, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Pachler was elected president of Local 829 in 1939 and left Con-Ed to work full-time at his union job. He stayed at the post when the union voted to go "independent" in 1940, and after it joined the CIO in 1945.

When the Utility Workers were chartered later that year, Pachler became the first secretary-treasurer. He was elected president of UWU in 1960 on the retirement of Pres. Joseph A. Fisher.

Pachler helped establish the national conference of union secretary-treasurers and served as its chairman until his election to the UWU presidency. As a member he helped prepare the language of the AFL-CIO ethical practices code on the safeguarding of union funds.

At various times he served by appointment of Meany as a mediator under the Internal Disputes Plan. He was a member of the COPE administrative committee and the executive board of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. He was a trustee of the George Meany Foundation, was a U.S. delegate to the 1963 ILO conference in Geneva, Switzerland, and participated in major negotiations for his union.

He is survived by his wife Gunhild, three daughters, a son, six grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

Accord Reached On 4 CWA Pacts

Contract agreements with three units of the General Telephone Co. chain and a fourth with New Jersey Telephone Co. were reached by the Communications Workers.

CWA negotiators reached a settlement at General Telephone of Kentucky with these benefits for 1,117 workers: wage increases up to 64 cents an hour over two years for plant workers, up to 37 cents for operators and up to 36 cents for clerical workers; improved health insurance, vacations, holidays and pension benefits.

Contract renewals with General Telephone of the Midwest (Nebraska), General of Alabama and New Jersey Telephone provide improvements in wages, vacations and other benefits for 782 members.

General Telephone Co. is reported to be the second largest telephone firm in the United States, larger than any other except the Bell System.

ILO Worker Group Picks CLC's Morris

Geneva—Worker members of the International Labor Organization's Governing Body have elected Joseph Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, as their chairman.

The election of Morris to succeed the late Jean Moeri of Switzerland as worker spokesman automatically made the 56-year-old Canadian vice chairman of the Governing Body, the 121-nation ILO's executive council.

One of Morris's first actions was to spearhead the workers' campaign to have included the problem of occupational cancer on the 1972 agenda of the annual ILO conference of member states.

The increased handling by workers of substances that are known or suspected to cause cancer made urgent the consideration of the question, Morris said.

The government and employer representatives on the 48-member executive group agreed to the workers' proposal that the ILO staff prepare a study of possible ILO action. This will enable the Governing Body to decide at its December session when to put the problem before the conference.

During the brief executive group meeting that always precedes the June conference the delegates took time off for a ceremony to mark the laying of the cornerstone of the 11-story headquarters that the ILO is building at a cost of $23 million.

The ceremony was one of the last official appearances of David A. Morse, who resigned as ILO director general after holding the post for more than 20 years.

Morse, a former U.S. undersecretary of labor, said that the decision of the ILO member states to build the new headquarters was proof of their conviction that "our organization has an essential and ever increasing role to play in the construction of a just and peaceful world."

Speaking on behalf of the worker delegates, Nathalis de Bock, secretary of the Belgian General Labor Federation, said that the minimum working and living standards set by the ILO had considerably influenced legislation in member states.

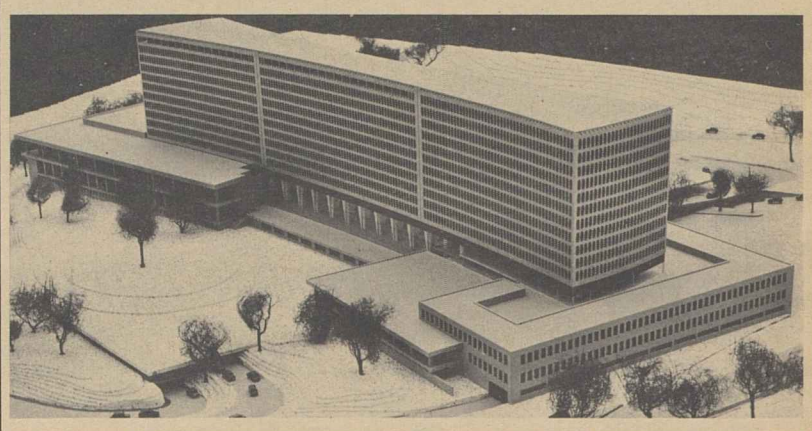
"We therefore firmly believe," the Belgian trade unionist stressed, "that this traditional part of our activities should be strengthened."

Meanwhile, Morse published his last annual report, which will serve as the central theme of the general debate at this year's ILO conference, now getting under way.



In the report Morse called for ILO action to help fight the misery and injustice that remain "familiar yet intolerable facts of life for millions of the world's population still living below the threshold of a minimum standard of living."

Urging the establishment of minimum living standards below which no human being should be permitted to fall, Morse said that "raising the quality of human resources is as essential to future development as is the accumulation of capital."

Vacations with pay, minimum wage-fixing machinery, special youth and employment training programs and the relation of trade union rights to civil liberties are among the items on the conference's agenda.

Rudolph Faupl, Machinists international representative and U.S. worker member of the Governing Body, is again heading the AFL-CIO conference delegation.

'Hate Campaign' Charged:

Wallace Keeps His Alabama Foothold

George Wallace rode a campaign of race hate and fears to victory in Alabama's gubernatorial primary.

After having trailed Gov. Albert P. Brewer in the May 5 Democratic primary, Wallace came back to win a narrow victory in the June 2 runoff following what Brewer termed a "hate campaign . . . the dirtiest I've ever observed."

Wallace labeled Brewer—a former political ally—as the candidate of Alabama's blacks; campaign handbills focused almost exclusively on racial fears.

Alabama Republicans have not named a gubernatorial candidate and gave no indication of challenging Wallace in the general election in November.

Wallace told newsmen he viewed his election as encouragement for the Nixon Administration's "southern strategy." Speaking of the 1972 presidential election, Wallace said that if Pres. Nixon "wants to undercut me and get me out of the way, that's what I want him to do."

Other major primaries held June 2 saw these results:

CALIFORNIA—With Republican incumbent George Murphy considered a vulnerable target this year, two liberal Democratic congressmen ran a close race for their party's senatorial nomination. Victory went to Rep. John V. Tunney, 35-year-old son of the former heavyweight boxing champion. He was promptly pledged the support of his competitor, Rep. George E. Brown, Jr.

In the gubernatorial primary, Jesse Unruh, longtime Democratic leader in the legislature, easily trounced Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty, a conservative who has supported Republicans in major elections. Unruh ran a low-cost campaign, largely ignoring Yorty and focusing his fire on Gov. Ronald Reagan, who was unopposed for renomination in the Republican primary.

A s'aunchly liberal Democratic congressman from the Oakland-Berkeley area, six-term Rep. Jeffrey Cohelan, lost his bid for renomination. The victor was Ronald Dellums, a youthful Negro city councilman with strong support from Berkeley student peace militants and from a fast-growing black community.

Special elections to fill vacancies caused by the death of two conservative Republican congressmen were combined with primaries in the 24th and 35th districts—and both may end up represented by John Birch Society members.

An Orange County district once represented by Pres. Nixon elected State Sen. John G. Schmitz, an admitted Bircher, to fill the balance of the term of the late James Utt and be the GOP candidate in November.

In a Los Angeles suburban area, final returns were not yet in when the AFL-CIO News went to press. Former Rep. John Rousselot, who has served as a national Birch Society official, was running neck-and-neck with a more moderate opponent, Bill McColl. The winner, besides taking the GOP nomination, will face Democrat Myrlie B. Evers in a June 30 runoff for the special election. Mrs. Evers, the widow of slain Mississippi Negro leader Medgar Evers, was unopposed in the Democratic primary.

In the state which once was a bastion of liberal Republicans such as Earl Warren, former governor and retired Chief Justice of the United States, and former Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, there was at least some indication that moderates could survive in the GOP. Two incumbent congressmen, Alphonzo Bell and Paul N. McCloskey, won nomination over right-wing opponents running well-financed campaigns.

NEW JERSEY—Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., won an impressive race for nomination to a third term in the Democratic primary and will face Republican Nelson G. Gross in November. Williams had solid labor support in the campaign.

NEW MEXICO — Sen. Joseph M. Montoya, easily renominated in the Democratic primary, will face a Goldwater Republican in November. Anderson Carter, an extreme conservative, upset Gov. David Cargo in the GOP primary. In gubernatorial primaries, former House Speaker Bruce King won the Democratic nomination and Pete Domenici came out ahead in a six-way Republican contest.

In other states where primaries were held, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield was renominated by a big margin in Montana and Iowa Democrats picked former Lt. Gov. Robert Fulton to run against Republican Gov. Robert D. Ray. In South Dakota, Richard Kneip will be the Democratic candidate against Gov. Frank Farrar.

Mississippi Sen. John C. Stennis was unopposed in the Democratic primary and will have no Republican opponent in November.

PRIMARY VICTORS across the nation thank their supporters and bid for Democratic unity in two of the key senatorial elections to be held in November. At left, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., won easy renomination in New Jersey's Democratic primary. At right, Rep. John V. Tunney was the choice of California Democrats to oppose the state's conservative Republican senator, George Murphy. Mrs. Tunney is at his side after his primary win over Rep. George E. Brown.

D.C. Construction Unions Protest New Racial Quota Hiring Directive

The Labor Dept.'s so-called Washington Plan imposing minority hiring quotas running up to 43 percent was termed totally unworkable by the Washington, D.C., Building & Construction Trades Council.

Even if all new entries in the trades designated by the Labor Dept. come from minority groups, the percentage quotas set by the department cannot be reached because of rising unemployment and cutbacks in construction projects, the council said.

The plan, which was announced by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz June 1, envisions an increase of 3,500 jobs for minority group members in 11 skilled trades over the next four years.

The Washington Plan orders even stiffer hiring quotas than those imposed by the controversial Philadelphia Plan last year. It covers not only the District of Columbia, but a number of suburban areas in Maryland and Virginia.

Under the plan, a contractor is committed to hire minority workers to meet the quota covering not only his federally-involved constructon, but all of his construction work throughout the area during the life of his federally-funded contract.

The trades affected are the electricians, painters, plumbers and pipefitters, iron workers, sheet metal workers, elevator constructors, asbestos workers, tile and terrazzo workers and glaziers.

Excluded are several trades that are predominantly composed of minority group members—laborers, cement masons, roofers and bricklayers. Also excluded are the carpenters, reinforced rodmen, plasterers and operating engineers, which have significant numbers of minority workers.

A statement by the Washington BCTC noted that the national capital area has "the highest percentage of minority workers of any large urban area in the nation" employed in the skilled trades.

It further stressed that through Project Build, sponsored by the council, it will train and place more than 500 minority workers in the construction industry within the next 12 months.

It pointed out that it has sponsored Project Build since 1967 and has operated an apprenticeship information center at the District of Columbia Employment Service for the past seven years.

Like the Philadelphia Plan, the Washington Plan sets quotas for contractors expressed in a range of percentages that moves higher each of four years. For example, the first year hiring goal for iron workers is 11 to 19 percent. In the fourth year, it will range between 35 to 43 percent.

The Labor Dept. estimates that minority group members make up about 26 percent of the Washington area workforce. The department concedes that minority representation in the area construction trades is about 50 percent overall, but it says that "very few of these are located in the 'skilled' trades."

The hiring quotas imposed by the plan in the fourth year of operation would set these goals: electricians, 28 to 34 percent; painters, 35 to 42 percent; plumbers, pipefitters and steamfitters, 25 to 30 percent; iron workers, 35 to 43 percent; sheet metal workers, 25 to 31 percent; lathers, 34 to 40 percent; boilermakers, 24 to 30 percent; tile and terrazzo workers, 28 to 34 percent, and glaziers, 28 to 34 percent.

The Washington BCTC said that one of the reasons the quotas cannot be met is the cutback in construction projects brought on by the highest interest rates in 100 years. It notes that the growing unemployment in the area's construction industry must be blamed on the Administration policies.

It also charged that attacks on the construction trades are unfair. "We do not see the Administration requiring 40 percent minority employment in four years in any other industry or institution in our society," the council said.

IBEW Members Ratify New Pact at RCA Plants

Members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at 12 plants of RCA Corp. voted overwhelming approval of a new 42-month contract providing wage increases ranging from 79 cents an hour to $1.11.

Also won for 23,000 employes were substantial fringe benefits including improved hospitalization and retirement programs.

The new pact, negotiated over a 12-month period, was ratified unanimously by every IBEW-RCA local before being submitted to referendum. It calls for pay raises of 20 cents an hour immediately, with additional 15-cent raises in 1971 and 1972.

The IBEW locals won guaranteed living-cost increases of 21 cents an hour spread over three years; company payment of 5 to 11 cents an hour into the retirement fund—a payment formerly made by employes; improved job security for senior workers, increased shift differential rights, and protection for temporarily reassigned employes.

The union said more than 99 percent of its RCA members will get raises of at least 79 cents an hour over the contract period, plus a 57 percent improvement in retirement and insurance programs.

RCA has contracts with IBEW for plants in Los Angeles and Hollywood, Calif.; two in Indianapolis; one each in Marion and Bloomington, Ind., Lancaster and Meadow Lands, Pa.; Needham, Mass.; Rockaway, N. J.; Findlay, O., and West Palm Beach, Fla.

Meanwhile a walkout of 20,000 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers continued at RCA Corp. plants in seven states over contract terms. A federal mediator called company and union negotiators together two days later to get contract talks under way again.

Chairman Daniel Arnold of the IUE-RCA Conference Board said the last company offer before the walkout was for wage hikes totalling 20 cents an hour over four years, plus fringe improvements and a bonus rate for skilled trades workers.

RCA said it was prepared to offer pay hikes ranging from 76 cents to $1.11 an hour, and better fringe benefits.

Arnold charged that management began circulating a new wage proposal to IUE pickets before presenting it to union negotiators—a device he called RCA's version of "Boulwarism."

IUE represents workers at Camden, Deptford, Moorestown and Somerville, N.J.; Scranton and Mountaintop, Pa.; Cincinnati, O.; Plymouth, Mich.; Lewiston, Me.; Memphis, Tenn., and Los Angeles, Van Nuys and Burbank, Calif.

The IUE filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board May 20 that RCA has refused to bargain in good faith since contract reopening talks began here Apr. 14.

Pipe Trades Praised For Tornado Relief

Lubbock, Tex.—Union plumbers and pipe fitters are credited with averting a major disaster by their speedy volunteer efforts after a tornado ripped through this northwest Texas city early in May.

Shortly after the tornado struck, members of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 629 were on the job with city crews closing leaking gas mains and broken water lines.

Lubbock Civil Defense Dir. William J. Payne said the contribution of the union volunteers was especially vital because a water shortage was facing the city.

Their efforts were further praised by National Civil Defense Dir. John E. Davis, who pointed out that labor organizations are key elements in civil defense and disaster plans because their skills are "vital to rescue, relief and recovery operations."

Davis noted that volunteer efforts of the union members in the Lubbock disaster stemmed directly from a long-standing agreement between civil defense agencies and the AFL-CIO.

Because of the high priority of labor's contribution to civil defense, Davis observed, former AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler was appointed to the President's National Civil Defense Advisory Council.

The death toll of the Lubbock tornado totaled 25, with hundreds injured. But without extensive preparations, it could have been higher, Davis said. He particularly stressed the role of labor in these preparations.

On Senate-Passed Bill:

Showdown in House Set on Voting Rights

The House Rules Committee has cleared the way for a showdown vote on a double-barrelled voting rights bill the Senate passed earlier this year.

It sent to the floor a resolution to accept without change the Senate bill which would:

- Extend for another five years the highly successful Voting Rights Act of 1965, which made it possible for some 800,000 previously disenfranchised black southerners to register and vote.
- Give 18-year-olds the vote, leaving it up to the Supreme Court to settle the dispute over whether this can be done by federal legislation or whether a constitutional amendment is necessary.

If the House approves—as the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups have strongly urged—the legislation will be cleared for the President's signature.

If the House votes down the motion, as the Administration has asked, the legislation would be killed unless a separate vote sent it to a House-Senate conference committee.

Civil rights supporters fear that if it does, it will never survive filibuster and delaying tactics in the Senate and the most successful civil rights law ever enacted will go out of existence.

The House vote, now expected to come in mid-June, is likely to be close.

Although Pres. Nixon had originally sought to water down the Voting Rights Act, he now bases his opposition on the argument that the 18-year-old vote would be unconstitutional and if the issue were not decided until after the 1972 presidential election, "the nation could be confronted with a crisis of the first magnitude."

Besides arguing that the legislation is constitutional, supporters of the bill say there is ample precedent for the Supreme Court to act swiftly—even before the effective date of Jan. 1, 1971.

And the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights—the coalition that mustered support for the original Voting Rights Act—has called a national legislative conference in Washington for June 8 and 9 "for a last minute effort in support of this bill, the single most important piece of legislation on our agenda."

Conference leaders stressed that the bill escaped a filibuster when it was before the Senate only because conservative southerners didn't want to delay action on confirmation of Judge Carswell's nomination to the Supreme Court.

Unless Congress acts to extend the law, they warned, the statutory voting rights protection will end in July.

In addition to continuing federal supervision of voting laws and registration in states which had set up roadblocks to Negro voting, the Senate bill includes two relatively non-controversial proposals made by the Administration.

One would abolish all literacy tests as a voting requirement, throughout the United States.

The other would shorten the residence requirements for voting in presidential elections.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate remained tied up in debate over a resolution prohibiting any U.S. military action in Cambodia after June 30, the date Pres. Nixon originally set for completion of the mission. Opponents of the resolution continued to block a vote, arguing that the restriction would impinge on the President's constitutional authority.
- The House, after sharp debate, voted 236-127 to permit the national debt ceiling to rise temporarily to the $359 billion mark. Voting against the motion were a coalition of fiscal conservatives who almost always oppose the periodic debt ceiling bills and war opponents registering a protest.

Voting for the debt ceiling rise were 129 Democrats and 107 Republicans; opposed were 68 Democrats and 59 Republicans.

The Treasury would be in a financial bind if the temporary debt ceiling increases weren't enacted and House Democrats have expressed resentment that Republicans have opposed these "housekeeping bills" when the Democrats are in the White House and supported them only during Republican Administrations. However, House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills squelched a stronger rebellion by warning the House that he wouldn't convene his committee to report out a smaller increase if the bill were defeated.

He said failure of the government to meet its bills would "topple" Wall Street and starve welfare programs.

World Tobacco Unions Seek Closer Liaison

Unions of tobacco workers in 18 nations moved towards closer cooperation — and possibly international coordinated bargaining—during a two-day conference in West Berlin.

The policy was adopted by delegates to the Tobacco Workers Trade Group of the International Union of Food & Allied Workers Associations, a worldwide trade union body dating back to 1920.

Homer Cole, secretary-treasurer of the Tobacco Workers union in the United States, said two major collective bargaining resolutions were adopted.

One sought inclusion in collective bargaining agreements of basic standards of trade union rights, maximum hours, guaranteed annual wages, equal rights for men and women workers, pensions and other contract benefits.

Another resolution requested the parent organization to convene meetings of unions representing workers in the major international tobacco firms "for the purpose of achieving coordination of demands and joint negotiations at international corporation levels."

A number of companies, including several U.S. firms, have plants or subsidiaries in other nations.

Adequate Funds Urged For Labor, HEW Needs

The AFL-CIO expressed its concern at under-funding of major programs of the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, and the Office of Economic Opportunity.

And the federation, in testimony before a House Appropriations subcommittee, voiced complete bewilderment at a proposed budget cut for the National Labor Relations Board.

"For some unknown reason," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the subcommittee, "the NLRB has the dubious distinction of being the only labor-related agency which would suffer a budget cut if the Administration recommendations were accepted by Congress."

The proposed cut, he noted, would reduce the size of the NLRB staff by more than 100 "at a time when the NLRB case load in both unfair labor practice and representation cases is rising steadily."

Biemiller urged "an increase of $2.5 to $3 million above the budget figure" as "completely justified." His statement was presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Richard Warden.

As in past years, the AFL-CIO testimony called attention to the shortage of wage-hour and Walsh-Healey Act inspectors, and urged a larger appropriation for occupational health and safety programs.

Inadequate funding of social service programs operated by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the AFL-CIO testified, is "inconsistent" with the goal of welfare reform and improving the earning capacity of millions of low-income people.

The federation also expressed concern at the "low priority" given programs for the elderly—with a budget request of only 45 percent of the amount Congress had authorized for these programs.

On the OEO budget, Biemiller protested the apparent downgrading of community action programs.

In a 20-page supplement to the basic testimony, the AFL-CIO discussed the major programs covered by the appropriations bill, urging a number of increases.

In one area, it suggested, money could be saved by scrapping plans for a Bureau of Labor Statistics "so-called study of international price competitiveness."

Since one-fourth of U.S. trade involves overseas subsidiaries of American firms, "no meaningful data on prices can be obtained from a review of invoices accompanying imports. These firms adjust the prices of goods they transfer from this country to other countries and back to this country to benefit the strategy of the firm, not to follow competitive theories of economists and statisticians."

House, Senate Panels Back Bill To Strengthen Ban on Job Bias

House and Senate subcommittees have now approved almost identical versions of labor-sought improvements in the basic fair employment law, which bars job discrimination based on race, color, sex, religion, age and national origin.

A key change—a longstanding goal of the civil rights coalition—would give effective enforcement powers to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The agency would continue its present conciliation and investigation functions. But if it failed to get voluntary compliance, it would be able to issue "cease and desist" orders comparable to those issued by the National Labor Relations Board in dealing with unfair labor practices.

As is the case with the NLRB, the orders would be enforceable in federal appellate courts.

At House hearings last December, Thomas E. Harris, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel, termed this much preferable to an Administration proposal that the EEOC be required to initiate court action against discrimination in a federal district court, the lowest rung on the judicial ladder.

Harris and William E. Pollard of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights, noted that some district courts have backlogs of cases that have been awaiting trial for years.

The bills approved by the House and Senate Labor subcommittees would also greatly expand the jurisdiction of the equal employment law. They would eliminate present exemptions for public employes at all levels of government and for employes of educational institutions.

They would also extend coverage to establishments employing eight or more workers, instead of the present minimum requirement of 25 or more.

Both the House and Senate bills have bipartisan sponsorship, with the chief authors being Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) in the Senate and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) in the House.

Action by the full House or Senate committee is necessary before the legislation can be scheduled for floor action.

The ban on job discrimination in the legislation applies to unions as well as to employers and employment agencies—a principle the AFL-CIO has consistently supported.

Crafts Arrange Summer Jobs For Teachers

Hartford, Conn.—Building trades unions are cooperating with area colleges to assist about 30 school teachers in a new work-study collegiate program this summer.

The teachers will be working on construction jobs arranged by local unions and will also be attending classes to earn credits toward graduate requirements.

The program is being conducted through the cooperation of the Operating Engineers and the Connecticut State Building & Construction Trades Council with local and state education officials.

Teachers will get a chance to explore the job opportunities in the construction industry which can be passed on to their students, the Connecticut Commission for Higher Education noted. The commission is planning and coordinating the program.

The project is being sponsored by the University of Connecticut.

URW Locals Ratify Gains, End Strike

Akron—The Rubber Workers settled their seven-week strike against the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. with contracts providing new benefits totaling $1.30 an hour over a three-year span for 23,000 employes in 16 plants.

Among the first to ratify the agreement was URW Local 2 in Akron, where strikers started returning to work June 10. Other locals took similar action to assure enough votes to ratify. Goodyear said it expects to resume full production by June 15.

The union reported that 13,000 employes of the B. F. Goodrich Co., out since May 6, will remain on strike until they receive an offer that can be taken to a vote. Members at other rubber firms did not strike, and their employers are expected to follow the Goodyear pattern of settlement, the union said.

The Goodyear settlement calls for wage increases adding up to 82 cents an hour over the three years. Also provided is a joint occupational health study financed by company payments of one-half cent per man-hour—a major 1970 objective of the URW. Other gains include better pensions, hospitalization insurance, medical coverage and skilled trades supplements.

The new contracts will run to Apr. 20, 1973, and became effective upon ratification.

The URW opened negotiations with Goodyear Mar. 10 in Cincinnati. Its bargaining committee made proposals drafted last winter at a union-wide conference. When the talks ended without agreement Apr. 20, expiration date of the old contracts, workers left the shops and set up picket lines. Contract talks were resumed in Milwaukee 10 days later.

Goodyear agreed to increase employe wages by 30 cents an hour effective upon a return to work, 26 cents more on July 5, 1971, and an additional 26 cents on July 3, 1972.

It accepted a union proposal to add its new plant in Sun Prairie, Wis., to coverage under the agreement, and to give employes at its Danville, Va., and Union City, Tenn., plants an additional 20 cents an hour—10 cents this year, another 10 cents on July 5, 1971.

Shultz Moved to Key Post As Nixon Revises Regime

Hospital Aid Bill Passed By Congress

A labor-backed bill expanding the Hill-Burton hospital construction program has been approved by Congress and sent to the White House for the President's signature.

The legislation would authorize $1.26 billion over the next three years to continue the 24-year-old program of federal grants for construction and modernization of hospitals, substantially more than the Administration had sought.

It also sets up a new $500 million-a-year program of loan guarantees, with the government to pay 3 percent of the interest cost. The Administration sought the loan guarantees, but not the interest subsidies.

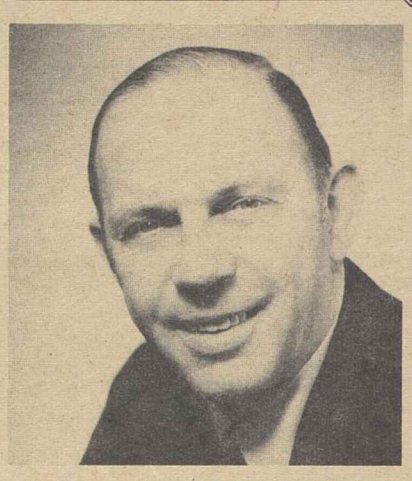
And in a number of areas, it takes important new directions urged by the AFL-CIO.

Thus, more money is authorized for outpatient health services—up from the present ceiling of $20 million a year to $85 million.



Of special importance, it encourages construction of comprehensive health care facilities, such as those operated by prepaid group practice plans.

Under the old law, for example, only public agencies and nonprofit hospitals could receive grants for construction of free-standing outpatient facilities. The new legislation would enable nonprofit groups

Labor Dept. Job Assigned To Hodgson

By David L. Perlman

Pres. Nixon set in motion a major reorganization of the Executive Branch of the government aimed at giving the White House a tighter control over federal programs and agencies. He shuffled his Cabinet to draft the men he wanted for the expanded White House operation.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz was tapped by the President to head a new top-level Office of Management & Budget.

Under a reorganization plan that has cleared Congress, the new office will oversee the operations of government programs, determine where federal money will be spent, and evaluate how well it is being spent.

Nixon said he will name James D. Hodgson, now under secretary to Shultz, as Secretary of Labor.

Earlier, in an unrelated Cabinet shift, Nixon announced that Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Robert H. Finch will join the White House staff as a senior presidential adviser.

Finch will be succeeded as HEW secretary by Elliot L. Richardson, currently Under Secretary of State. During the Eisenhower Administration, Richardson served as an assistant secretary at HEW, and briefly as acting secretary of the department.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said Shultz "has served with distinction" as head of the Labor Dept. "He has fully deserved the confidence that American workers, their unions and the AFL-CIO have placed in him."

Meany extended the AFL-CIO's "congratulations and good wishes" to Hodgson, promising that "he will receive the same cooperation accorded to his predecessor by organized labor."

Beyond the Vineyards:

Farm Union Scores New Breakthrough

Los Angeles—The AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC) has scored two major victories breaking new union ground in the traditional anti-labor farmlands of California.

Both successes extended UFWOC's gains beyond the grape vineyards where it had concentrated its organizing efforts. One is a contract with a corporation that grows 46,000 acres of citrus, nuts, wine grapes and other fruits, and the other a union recognition agreement with a company that produces 10 percent of the $11 million melon crop.

Hollis Roberts, manager of the firm's tremendous operations throughout Kern, Tulare, Fresno and Kings Counties in the San Joaquin Valley of central California, agreed to a three-year pact giving

The latter settlement—the first for the union in the Imperial Valley—touched off a counter-wave of anti-union activity by other growers, led by the State Farm Bureau, including the recruitment of high school students as strikebreakers, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher reported.

Though a large number of the state's vast field, vineyards and orchards still remain to be unionized, the latest UFWOC gains are viewed by Dir. Cesar Chavez as opening new doors to the organization of farm workers.

The contract signing took place in the offices of Roberts Farms, Inc., at McFarland, Calif., six miles from UFWOC headquarters in Delano, hub of the state's fruit and vegetable cornucopia.

Factory Layoffs Push Jobless Rate Up to 5%

By John R. Oravec

Layoffs of full-time adult production workers were the main factor in pushing the nation's unemployment rate to 5 percent in May, the Labor Dept. reported. The jobless rate averaged 4.8 percent across the country in April.

A total of 4.1 million persons were out of work and looking for jobs last month after seasonal adjustments, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

The last time unemployment was at 5 percent was in February 1965, but then it was heading down, not up.

So far this year, the jobless rate has risen 1.5 percent, the sharpest increase for a five-month period in more than a decade, BLS noted.

Peruvian earthquake victims are receiving about $300,000 worth of medicines and baby food through a relief operation conducted with the help of funds from the AFL-CIO.

The federation is paying for the crating and shipping of the medical supplies from the Direct Relief Foundation in Santa Barbara, Calif., to Braniff International Airways terminals. AFL-CIO Inter-American Affairs Rep. Andrew C. McLellan said the airline is flying the supplies to Peru free of charge.

More than 50,000 persons were killed by the disaster that struck two north central Peruvian provinces. At least 80,000 were left injured, in need of medical and hospital attention, and another 800,000 are known homeless.

The Direct Relief Foundation is a surplus drug inventory organization that makes medicines available in disasters. In all, about 31,000 pounds of supplies will be flown to Peru to aid the victims.

The relief operation is being handled by the federation's Inter-American Affairs office of the Dept. of International Affairs. In Peru, distribution is being coordinated through the department's AIFLD representatives and the Peruvian trade union confederation, along with American Red Cross.

Ohio AFL-CIO Votes to Establish Its Own Auto Insurance Company

Cleveland—The 1,800 delegates to the Ohio AFL-CIO convention voted to begin a labor-operated auto insurance company for the benefit of union members in the state.

Formation of the company after years of fighting losing battles against unfair auto insurance rates and practices was the highlight of the three-day biennial convention. The delegates also:

- Increased monthly per capita payments from 10 cents to 15 cents.
- Re-elected Pres. Frank W. King and Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith.
- Increased the terms of officers and executive board members from two to four years.
- Expanded the State AFL-CIO executive board from 26 to 34 vice presidents.
- Endorsed Democrats Howard Metzenbaum for the U.S. Senate and John J. Gilligan for governor at a special COPE meeting held in conjunction with the convention.

Before the decision was reached to go into the auto insurance business, King and Smith told the convention of a four-year battle by the state labor federation to stop massive price hikes, arbitrary cancellations and other acts of discrimination practiced by the auto insurers.

Smith described unsuccessful efforts to persuade the industry-oriented superintendent of insurance to reject rate hike requests; to reform Ohio's weak auto insurance laws in the state legislature, and to challenge the laws in state courts.

Finally, the Ohio AFL-CIO entered federal court where an anti-trust suit charging price-fixing and violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act is still pending.

"Rejections at all levels have left us with this only alternative" said King and Smith as they reported a recommendation to begin the auto insurance company.

Smith said the firm will be a stock company. The Ohio AFL-CIO plans to mortgage its headquarters building in Columbus to acquire the $250,000 necessary to be deposited with the state to begin stock sale. Some $5 million in stock will be offered for sale to local and international unions, individual union members and other interested persons and organizations.

Convention delegates were assured the Ohio AFL-CIO would be able to offer quality auto insurance at lower costs because it would employ cost-saving techniques such as computer processing of policies, plowback of investment income into operations of the company, elimination of expensive advertising programs, and operation of the firm on a non-profit basis.

The convention gave its new executive board authority to grant final approval of the company at the appropriate time.

Much debate was sparked by two controversial resolutions. One urging the national AFL-CIO to reconsider its position on Viet Nam was narrowly defeated. The resolution charged "American workers are staggering beneath a heavy burden of direct taxation and an unconscionable burden of taxation through rapid inflation to pay for the war in Southeast Asia."

A resolution supporting voting rights for 18-year-olds carried by a substantial majority in a standing vote.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) told the convention America is in the midst of a "needless recession" and urged Pres. Nixon to take immediate steps to "put the nation's economic house in order."

Bayh declared "Nixonomics" simply aren't working and said, "Not only has the President failed to use the credit and interest controls Congress gave him, he has failed to use the power of his office to speak out against exorbitant price increases in concentrated industries."

COPE Dir. Al Barkan praised the Ohio AFL-CIO for its use of COPE's data processing systems and called that state federation a "pioneer" in the field of political action. He urged delegates to return home and press an all-out campaign this summer and fall to elect labor's friends in November.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel also focused on the need for vigorous political action. Abel said, "We have the opportunity to show the way again; to bring unity not only to labor, but all the people. We must do our best to organize people to the issues, get them ready and prepared to vote."

Other speakers included Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the Industrial Union Dept.; Vice Pres. Fred Purcell, Machinists, and Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Air Line Union Ratifies Pact With National

Chicago—Members of the Air Line Employes who work for National Airlines voted 3,188-133 to accept a new three-year contract that ended a 108-day strike.

The contract was signed in the Washington offices of Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., after the intervention of Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and others. It calls for an immediate 22 percent wage boost. Half the wage hike is retroactive to last May, when the former contract expired. Another 11 percent increase is due next May, the union said.

National and the ALEA agreed also on a full union shop, improved sick leave, uniform allowances, pension benefits, vacations and other improvements for clerical, office and service employes.

The settlement, reached May 18, followed one achieved by the Machinists after a long strike. Members of both unions began returning to work May 27. The air line announced that full service was being resumed.

Hodgson New Labor Secretary:

Nixon Shifts Shultz To Top-Level Post

There was no immediate announcement of Hodgson's successor as under secretary.

The new Cabinet appointments need Senate confirmation. But since the appointees all won the Senate's approval for their present posts, no problems are foreseen.

Hodgson came to the government from management ranks, having served as vice president for industrial relations at Lockheed Aircraft Corp. His record there has been praised by union negotiators who faced him across the bargaining table.

Shultz was dean of the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business when he joined the Nixon Administration. He had served on major arbitration panels and had been a senior staff economist for the President's Council of Economic Advisers in 1955-56.

Nixon described him as one of the best administrators in government and most qualified to bring "real business management at the highest level into the Executive Branch of government."

The Bureau of the Budget, traditionally the chief management arm of the President, will be incorporated in the new Office of Management & Budget.

The present budget director, Robert P. Mayo, will move to the White House staff as a counselor to the President, advising on budget and economic policy. Nixon said Mayo had signed up for only a two-year hitch with the Administration, indicating that he may leave the government before the year is out.

As deputy to Shultz and in effect head of the Budget Bureau, Nixon chose a fellow Californian, Caspar Weinberger, who has been chairman of the Federal Trade Commission since last November.

The reorganization plan, which will take effect July 1, establishes a Cabinet-level Domestic Council, with its own staff, as a policy planning group, comparable to the National Security Council. Its members will include all Cabinet officers except the Secretaries of Defense and State.

Nixon said the separate management and budget office, which Shultz is to head, will evaluate the performance of government programs, cut through red tape to achieve coordination among government agencies throughout the nation as well as in Washington, and try to overcome bureaucratic inertia.

Nixon told newsmen that he recognized the danger that the reorganization could result in adding just another layer of government. If that's the case, it will be "a mistake," he conceded. But the President said he hoped it would result in "streamlining" the government and making it more responsive.

The President's other Cabinet shuffle—Finch to the White House and Richardson to HEW—appeared to be a matter of trying to find the right slot for Finch.

Nixon described Finch as his "oldest and closest friend" in the Administration and said he drafted him for the White House staff because "I need him here."

The warm words recalled the expectation at the start of the Nixon Administration that Finch, who resigned as lieutenant governor of California to join the Cabinet, would be one of the most influential of presidential intimates.

That role, however, quickly fell to Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, the most conservative of the Cabinet members. Finch, a political moderate, found himself overruled in a series of publicized conflicts over HEW appointments and policies and overwhelmed by the internal problems of HEW. Even under the best of circumstances, the sprawling department has been considered the most difficult in the government to administer.

Shortly before his White House appointment was announced Finch was sidelined by exhaustion for hospitalization and rest.

Either on his own initiative or at White House insistence, Finch fired one of the top men he had brought into the department, Commissioner of Education James E. Allen. Allen had openly criticized the Administration's low priority for education and backward steps on school desegregation.

Earlier, an HEW deputy assistant secretary, James Gallagher, resigned with a statement blaming the Administration "from the White House down" with footdragging on programs to improve education.

Recruiting able people with professional competence as well as political clearance, and restoring morale among the career staff will be the first test for Richardson, who comes to HEW with a high reputation for both personal and administrative ability.

The Old Rummage Sale Trick Foiled by NLRB

Tunica, Miss.—Management has a seemingly endless store of tactics to oppose union organization efforts.

One such device uncovered by the National Labor Relations Board was a "rummage sale" where employes were offered amazing bargains just before a union election and a raffle of a color television set bearing a "Vote No" sign.

The Tunica Manufacturing Co. here, it seems, was opposed to the organization drive of the Clothing Workers last year and carried on a number of activities that an NLRB trial examiner later found were unfair labor practices.

The trial examiner found the company guilty of making threats to withdraw a planned incentive raise, to close down the plant, to fire union leaders and of coercively interrogating workers about their union connections, all of which it was ordered to stop.

He did not find the TV raffle an unfair practice, despite a sign on it reading "one week's union dues will buy this," and a second sign reading "Vote No." Accompanying this was a notice stating that when an employe had voted he could pick up his raffle ticket.

The trial examiner argued that the raffle was not new and that other cases had found that raffles so long as they weren't too big—$84 in groceries or a $350 TV set—were not unfair.

The company rummage sale just before the election was another gimmick.

Ordinarily the company sold "seconds" to its employes privately at reasonably low prices. Quilts, for instance, went for $3 or $4. A week before the election, however, the company offered these "seconds" at 10 cents a pound, spread them out on a table and permitted employes to buy them on company time. At least 30 to 40 employes got real bargains that generally were not available to purchasers.

The trial examiner found that there was not enough evidence to convict the company of an unfair practice.

A three-man panel of the NLRB agreed with the trial examiner's finding on everything else but the rummage sale. It found that the sale just a week before the election was clearly "propitious" from the company's viewpoint and that the 10 cents a pound selling rate was an obvious bargain compared with previous practices.

"In the circumstances," the panel said, "we conclude that the evidence demonstrates that the employer conducted the sale for the purpose of inducing employes to vote against the union." It added the rummage sale to the activities prohibited in the "cease and desist" orders of the trial examiner.

Rubber Union Wins Strike at Goodyear

groups in all Goodyear plants will get an additional raise of 15 cents an hour upon returning to work, and another 10 cents commencing July 5, 1971.

The URW won company agreement on a joint occupational health program designed to protect employes in all plants from avoidable hazards. With money provided by Goodyear management, the School of Hygiene & Public Health of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, will make an intensive study of plant health and safety problems and industrial hygiene practices.

Information obtained in the study will form the basis for developing a long-term program of preventive medicine in all plants, URW Pres. Peter Bommarito said.

Employes affected by the settlement work at plants in Akron, Stow, St. Mary's and Marysville, O.; Gadsden, Ala., Topeka, Kan., Los Angeles, Jackson, Miss., Windsor, Vt., New Bedford, Mass., North Chicago, Ill.; Madisonville, Ky., and Lincoln, Neb., besides those in Danville, Union City and Sun Prairie.

Besides wages, the Goodyear pact provides these benefits:

Pensions: normal pensions will be increased from $5.50 a month per year of service to $7.75. Current retirees will receive an additional $1.25 a month per year of service. Early retirement benefits are improved for employes with 30 years of service.

Survivor Benefits: payments of $150 a month for 24 months will be made to qualified survivors of active employes. Similar payments will be continued to a widow or widower who is aged 50 or more on the death of an employe until remarriage, age 62 or eligibility for reduced social security payments, whichever occurs earlier.

Insurance: life insurance coverage will be increased from $7,500 to $8,500; accidental death and dismemberment insurance will go from $3,750 to $8,500; weekly sickness and accident benefits will be raised for all employes from the current $60-$70 a week to a flat $85 a week for up to 52 weeks.

Medical Benefits: payments to doctors for hospital benefits will be raised from $5 for each visit up to 365 days of confinement to $7 for each visit up to 730 days; top diagnostic and laboratory benefits for each 12-month period will be increased from $100 for all dependents to $100 for each dependent; X-ray and radium therapy payments will be raised from $300 to $500, and payment will be made for bandages, crutches, braces and the like.

Drugs: starting July 1, 1971, the purchase price of all prescription drugs over $1 will be paid by the company.

Other Health Benefits: benefits for convalescent nursing home care and visiting nurse service will be liberalized; for employes who subscribe to an approved local group practice plan, the company will contribute the average cost of benefits under Goodyear's own program.

Unemployment benefits: maximum company funding of supplemental unemployment benefits will be increased from $300 per employe to $375; management will make additional payments into the SUB fund when it falls below an average of $260 per employe.

Other Changes: substantial changes will be made in the basic working agreement covering all plants — broadened pay provisions for temporary transfers, holiday pay, vacation eligibility and other local areas.

The union announced that following local membership meetings, each plant will negotiate separate supplemental contracts covering local working conditions.

ILO's 54th Conference Focuses On Ways to Widen Social Justice

Geneva—Delegates to the International Labor Organization's 54th conference of member nations were urged to concentrate their efforts on furthering the agency's goal of social justice.

"Let us therefore aim at achieving practical results in terms of action, operations and programs," V. N. Manickavasagam, Malaysia's minister of labor, said on his election as president of the three-week session.

Of the 121 ILO member states, 111 were represented by more than 1,200 government, worker and employer delegates and their advisers when the conference, or general assembly, got under way.

With the question of trade union rights prominent on the conference's long agenda, a Soviet attempt to take the lead in the discussion was quickly blocked by a coalition of free workers and employers with the support of some governments.

Vasily L. Borisov, a Russian government delegate, sought the chairmanship of the conference's committee on trade union representation at the shop level.

But Borisov withdrew his bid rather than face certain defeat in a vote after U.S. Worker Delegate Rudolph Faupl and the entire U.S. delegation joined other free nation participants in stressing the absurdity of having a Communist government official direct a discussion on trade union rights.

Faupl, a Machinists international representative, also slapped down Cuban government objections to the nomination of Edwin P. Neilan, U.S. employer delegate, by his fellow employers as their vice chairman on a committee dealing with the ILO's structure.

Faupl stressed that under the ILO's unique tripartite structure government representatives could not dictate to the workers or the employers.

With the start of the session's committee work, U.S. trade union participants took on major assignments.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland is working on the committee concerned with human rights and civil liberties. Floyd Smith, Machinists president, is on the committee drafting proposals to guarantee trade union rights at the shop level.

The broadening and updating of earlier ILO pacts on minimum wages is being examined by a committee including Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. Pres. Harry D. Sayre of the Papermakers & Paperworkers is a member of a committee that is overhauling ILO accords on paid vacation.

Recommendations on special youth employment and training programs that are to go forward to governments with the full weight of the ILO behind them are being prepared by a committee on which West Virginia State AFL-CIO Pres. Miles Stanley is sitting.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman is on a committee that is screening the 14 wide-ranging resolutions that have been proposed by delegates for the conference's consideration.

Coordination Pays Off For 5 Sylvania Unions

Boston—Five AFL-CIO unions used the coordinated bargaining route to work out a common agreement providing pay and benefit increases for more than 10,000 employes of Sylvania Electric Products Inc. in 10 plants.

The unions are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Communications Workers and Steelworkers. Their Sylvania members will vote on the new terms after agreement is reached on all local plant issues.

The settlement marks the first time that the unions, working together as a coordinated bargaining committee of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., have been able to sit together in national negotiations with Sylvania to bargain on common objectives, the IUD reported.

The plants involved are in Ipswich and Salem, Mass.; Buffalo, Batavia and Seneca Falls, N.Y.; Ottawa, O.; Titusville, Warren and Williamsport, Pa.; and Smithfield, N.C.

After the terms were negotiated, Sylvania offered them to a newly organized Teamsters local of employes at Danvers, Mass. They were accepted without further negotiation, the IUD said.

The new three-year agreements call for a 23-cent hourly wage increase retroactive to June 15, another 15 cents in 1971, and 15 cents more in 1972. Cost-of-living adjustments up to eight cents an hour will be made during the second and third contract years. Skilled workers will get additional increases of 5 to 25 cents an hour to add 69 to 94 cents an hour to their rates over three years.

A major improvement in the Sylvania non-contributory pension plan provides that effective next Jan. 1, workers reaching age 65 will retire on a minimum benefit of $7 a month times years of service since Sept. 1, 1961—an increase of $2.50 in monthly benefits per month for each year of employment.

Pension benefits for service prior to Sept. 1, 1961, were increased by $3.50 a month times years of service to put the total monthly benefit between $7 and $10 a month, the best in the electrical manufacturing industry, according to the IUD.

The pacts also provide full semi-private hospital insurance coverage for 365 days a year, five weeks' vacation pay after 25 years of service, and extra days for workers after 16 years.

IUD Organizing Dir. Nicholas Zonarich praised the negotiators for helping make new advances possible for Sylvania workers. He said the settlement "narrows the pay and benefit gap between Sylvania and the other giant companies."

Service Employes Win Five L.A. Units

Los Angeles—The Service Employes won the right to represent more than 7,000 county employes in elections conducted by the County Labor Relations Commission. With six units voting, SEIU won five, lost one.

SEIU Local 535 won by a 2-1 margin to represent a 955-member unit of supervising social service employes, and a 1,700-member unit of client-eligibility workers. In two other units comprising 4,000 social workers and child welfare workers, Local 535 got nearly 2,000 of 2,300 votes cast. SEIU Local 434 and the County Employes Association, listed jointly on the ballot, were chosen by almost unanimous vote in a unit of 400 medical social service employes.

SEIU Pres. David Sullivan called the result "further evidence of the growing confidence" of public employes in union representation.

Wage Boost for 18,000 Set in Sportswear Pact

New York—Wage increases totaling 20 percent over three years were won for 18,000 blouse and sportswear makers by the Ladies' Garment Workers in a new contract settlement.

The changes were approved by unanimous vote of shop representatives of ILGWU Local 23-25. They become effective June 22, and probably will set the pattern for 25,000 other workers, chiefly in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, who make garments under contract for New York jobbers and manufacturers.

Union Vice Pres. Shelley Appleton said that in the face of "exceptionally depressed conditions in our industries," the union has "made the largest gains in our history."

Local 23-25 members will get a 10 percent wage increase this month, an additional 5 percent increase next June 7, and another 5 percent a year later.

Wage minimums will rise 50 cents an hour in sportswear for operators, 40 cents for cleaners, assorters and other floor workers, and by corresponding amounts for other craft workers.

The minimum for pressers, who were represented in contract negotiations by Local 35 Manager Morris Kovler, will go from $2.75 an hour to $3.15 in the same contract period. Increases for members of Local 10, who were represented by Manager Abe Dolgen, will be from $115 a week to $135 for markers and graders, and from $105 to $125 a week for cutters.

Other gains in the new agreements include one more paid holiday—Good Friday—for a total of nine per year; a third week of vacation pay after Jan. 1, 1972, when employer contributions to the union health and welfare fund will be raised from 7.5 percent of payroll to 9.5 percent.

The employers agreed also to raise their contributions to the ILGWU retirement fund from 2 percent of payroll to 2.5 percent this coming July.

Appleton emphasized that the new pacts give the union the right to reopen wage negotiations if living costs continue to rise.

The ILGWU recently announced settlements with substantial gains for 42,000 coat and suit workers in the New York metropolitan area, represented by the New York Cloak Joint Board, and 9,000 operators, machine pressers, shipping clerks, floor workers and other members of New York Local 105.

New York State Boosts Minimum Wage to $1.85

Albany—The New York state legislature raised the minimum wage in the state from $1.60 to $1.85 an hour, increased workmen's compensation benefits and improved measures for consumer protection in its recent session.

The measures were signed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, but he disappointed unionists when he vetoed a bill that would have banned the use of "lie detectors" on job applicants.

Also effective July 1 is an increase in total disability benefits to $80 a week from $70.

An increase in workmen's compensation benefits from $85 to $95 a week for temporary disability will go into effect July 1, along with an increase in non-job-connected disability benefits, which will be raised $10 a week to $75.

The maximum payment under unemployment insurance will be raised from $65 a week to $75 effective Sept. 7.

In the consumer protection area, the legislature raised from $30 to $85 a week the amount of earnings exempt from garnishment. However, 10 percent of the wages above $85 may be deducted by the employer to pay a worker's creditor.

In other action, the legislature repealed all protective laws that limited the number of hours women over 21 may work. The bill was strongly opposed by the state AFL-CIO.

With strong labor backing, the assembly defeated a bill passed by the senate that would have exempted theater ushers and ticket takers from the minimum wage law.

Other labor-opposed bills that failed adoption would have:

- Barred unemployment insurance benefits for the duration of a labor-management dispute for workers on strike or locked out, rather than for the first seven weeks as is provided by current law.
- Allowed the use of hazardous machinery by youths without supervision.
- Permitted public contractors to ignore agreements with building trades unions if a charge were brought that job discrimination existed.
- Revised the workmen's compensation law concerning disability from dust disease in a way that could block benefits to totally disabled workers.
- Allowed employers to deny accident report statements submitted to the Workmen's Compensation Board.
- Set up a medical board whose decisions would be binding on the Workmen's Compensation Board and its referees. It also could have upset court-determined decisions on application of the law.

Initial Contract Won at Ghetto Shoe Factory

St. Louis—Workers at an inner-city shoe manufacturing plant here won a 15-cent-an-hour pay increase and fringe benefits in their first contract at the new factory.

The plant was constructed in a black ghetto area to provide employment for jobless workers. Production began at the plant early last February. The union was certified as bargaining agent later the same month.

Pres. Andrew McKenzie, of Local 160, Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers said the two-year contract with Brown Shoe Co. provides a top scale of $1.90 an hour after a year's experience; nine paid holidays; a one-week vacation after a year, two weeks after four years and three weeks after 10 years; and paid funeral leave.

The contract provides a piecework rate that permits union members to earn from $2.50 to $3.50 an hour, McKenzie said.

The negotiated scale calls for $1.80 an hour for beginners and $1.85 for workers with eight months of experience.

There are 119 production workers at the plant.

ITU Re-Elects Top Officers

Members of the Typographical union voted by a 2-1 margin for the re-election of ITU Pres. John J. Pilch and all other candidates on his Progressive Party ticket. They included Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud, Vice Presidents A. (Sandy) Bevis, Joe Bingel, and Joe Bailey; Harry F. Bennett for auditor; Printers Home Trustees Ross K. Edmonds and Robert M. Russell, and Home Agent William F. Foley.

A union-wide referendum was held May 20. Pilch was opposed by Cornelius J. Sullivan of Sacramento, Calif., Local 46.

7 New Board Members Elected:

Retail, Wholesale Delegates Boost Dues, Per Capita Tax

By Rex Hardesty

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union revised its dues, re-elected its two top officers and chose seven new board members at its 11th convention.

The convention also heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Donald MacDonald issue stinging indictments of the economic policies of the government in each of their countries.

Max Greenberg, 62, was elected to his fifth four-year term as president of RWDSU and Alvin E. Heaps, 50, was re-elected as secretary-treasurer, a post he has held since 1948.

Seven new members of the union's 32-man executive board were elected to fill vacancies created by retirement and a restructuring that reflects the union's growth in Canada and in its national hospital division. The convention also elected 75 council members, who are nominated by regions and meet between conventions.

Three of the new board members are Negroes, reflecting a unanimous convention resolution urging more black representation.

Three speakers on behalf of that resolution, all Negroes, stressed that the resolution wasn't calling for "window-dressing" or the "tokenism" of a few blacks, but for the election of those capable and deserving of the office. Heaps, also speaking on behalf of the resolution, called for "greater awareness of the problems and needs of minority groups."

The officers reported a slight net gain in membership since the 1966 convention, which means RWDSU has added enough new members to offset the pending disaffiliation of some 20,000 members. That disaffiliation, by the union's District 65, is now being tested in court.

Delegates voted a $1 per month dues increase for all locals except those which have had a dues increase during the past year. It also voted a minimum dues structure of $5 a month and a 50-cent per month increase in per capita payments to the international. That 50 cents is broken into yearly steps between now and the union's next convention in 1974.

Meany told the convention he considers the Administration's economic policies a complete failure and said it stubbornly refuses to take the actions necessary to correct the situation because it contends the present tight-money policy will have to work some day. "Well, it may work," he commented, "but before it works, we may not be in a recession but a major depression."

He repeated labor's call for selective credit controls, interest rate ceilings on some types of loans, and allocation of credit to attain balanced economic growth and more jobs. Instead of that kind of action, Meany said, the Administration has seen fit only to lower margin requirements for stock purchasers, "which of course helps the market speculators. Maybe they'll want to do something for the boys in Las Vegas next."

Meany termed the recently completed strike and boycott against General Electric "the most important in many years because it was a strike against a company that had found its own way to nullify collective bargaining."

The ultimate defeat of Boulwarism, he said, "marked a milestone in the history of American labor. This was the finest demonstration of effective, complete trade union cooperation in my lifetime." The effectiveness of the boycott showed in GE's quarterly profit reports, Meany noted, and it wouldn't have been so effective without the cooperation of a large number of unions, including the Teamsters who refused to handle GE products.

Turning to foreign affairs, Meany said the United States must continue to extend the economic and military aid necessary to help Israel maintain its independence. "We have made it crystal clear to this Administration that we have a stake in the preservation of this little nation," he declared.

He rejected the argument that an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Southeast Asia would relieve the pressure on Israel. "One thing about the Soviets," Meany said, "they understand anyone who deals in strength." Thus the crisis in Berlin slackened in 1963, he noted, only after Pres. Kennedy had made a forceful stand against Russian missiles in Cuba.

"Everyone I know wants to see an early end to this conflict," he said of the war in Viet Nam. "They want our boys back home. I want to say to you that I am not a defender of Richard Nixon, but I believe that he, like Pres. Johnson before him, would do almost anything that he could to bring an end to this war."

He said he thinks the present Administration program of troop withdrawals is working, with more than 100,000 U.S. troops already home and another 150,000 scheduled to be withdrawn by May of 1971.

In a convention resolution on the war, the RWDSU delegates said its cost "has brought an abrupt halt to our sorely needed programs of housing, education, health, urban renewal and anti-poverty measures. We therefore call upon the U.S. government to establish a policy which outlines an early and orderly withdrawal of all U.S. armed forces from Indochina."

MacDonald told the delegates that Canada's economic problems are very much like those of the United States, with the unemployment rate currently at 6.6 percent, or 544,000 jobless persons in a work force of 8 million. In fact, MacDonald said, the recent convention of the CLC listed eight high-priority concerns for the 1970s that could just as well be applied to the United States: poverty, education, medical care, social security, housing, pollution, human rights and consumer affairs.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman and Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, also addressed the convention, as did Organizing Dir. William Kircher and Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen.

In other actions, the convention:

- Declared that despite some progress in curtailing pollution, the United States has "not yet seen the turn-around point" and urged creation of a Joint Congressional Committee on the Environment "to focus our country's attention on this issue."
- Deplored the serious loss of employment among workers in American plants producing toys, playthings and novelties and urged enactment of a bill sponsored by Rep. Jacob Gilbert (D-N.Y.) to impose import quotas on these items.
- Urged establishment of a broad-gauge national health insurance system, a massive educational program to lead to the purchase of drugs by their generic designations, and effective policing of fraud and overcharging on health items by the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Urged the U.S. government to provide Israel with adequate economic and military assistance so urgently needed for its defense, "not merely for the sake of Israel, but in the interests of world peace and freedom."
- Called for a national system of standards to measure the quality and durability of consumer products; elimination of abuses in automobile insurance practices; federal standards of safety for automobiles, household appliances and other products, and uniform accounting procedures for insurance and utility companies to determine their actual profits.

Pilots Urge Action To Curb Hijacking

The Air Line Pilots urged Pres. Nixon to initiate positive action to stop such incidents as the wounding of a jet plane pilot at Dulles Airport near Washington by an armed hijacker. ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby told Nixon "this nationwide nightmare" of continued hijackings "deserves the immediate attention of the President."

It is time, Ruby said, "to bring the full power and intelligence of our country to bear on this intolerable situation."

J. P. Stevens Found Guilty In Ninth Case

For the ninth time, the National Labor Relations Board has ordered J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc., to stop violating federal labor law.

Three board members upheld a trial examiner's finding that the giant textile firm interfered with a scheduled representation election by announcing, two days before the balloting, that it was giving employes of its Cleveland plant in Shelby, N.C., an additional paid holiday.

The board also agreed that a union supporter had been discriminated against by management. It ordered Stevens to offer her "immediate and full reinstatement to her former job" or a substantially equivalent position, if the job no longer exists. Also Stevens must compensate her fully for any lost pay.

An election scheduled for May 28, 1969, was called off when the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and the Textile Workers Union of America filed unfair practice charges against Stevens. The firm continues to gain government contracts despite its persistent violations of the labor relations law.

Stevens has been found guilty of interference with the rights of its employes on eight previous occasions since 1963. It appealed seven of them, lost every appeal in court—including two in the Supreme Court—and is expected to appeal the latest finding in line with its pattern of seeking every possible delay in carrying out remedial orders of the labor board.

Beyond the Vineyards:

Farm Union Wins New Breakthrough

some 4,300 full and part-time workers a $1.75 minimum hourly wage. The rate will reach $2 an hour with increases of 10 cents in the second year and 15 cents in the third year.

Contract language on piece rates was still being resolved at the time of signing. That rate, however, is expected to be commensurate with or better than the prevailing $6.50 per bin (40 boxes) of peaches picked or 25 cents per lug box (22 pounds) of grapes harvested.

The Roberts corporation, the world's largest walnut grower which also grows almonds and a variety of citrus, peaches and other fruits, went down the line with terms previously won by UFWOC from seven table grape growers.

Included are the hiring hall, successor and pesticide clauses—ban of DDT and other "hard" pesticides in the fields and orchards—and contributions to health, welfare and job displacement programs.

Meanwhile, another scene in the Farm Workers' drama was being played in the desert melon patches of the Imperial Valley near the Mexican border.

Following a three-day strike—one of the most effective conducted anywhere by UFWOC—the Abatti Bros. Produce Co. signed a union recognition agreement, immediately upped wages from $1.65 to $2 an hour and consented to open contract negotiations July 14.

When the strike in Abatti's cantaloupe fields started two days before the peak of the seven-week season, growers attempted to recruit pickers through radio commercials offering $2 an hour.

The Mexican "green carders"—aliens in the U.S. on temporary work permits—weren't, however, having any of the growers' pitch this time.

Some of the broadcasts were beamed over a Yuma, Ariz., rock music station aimed at teenage boys and some into Mexico. There was little response from south of the border, and it wasn't until Abatti settled that about 150 boys—some only 14 years old—arrived from Yuma to work other fields. About a third of them were sent home because they were too young to obtain work permits.

The rich cantaloupe crop of the Abatti firm — the largest melon grower in the country employing about 300 workers year around and more than 900 at peak—had been in danger of wasting on the vines by the third day of the strike.

The break came when Manuel Chavez, Cesar's brother and an effective catalyst in discouraging Mexican nationals from strikebreaking, arrived with other UFWOC officials in several cars and went to the watermelon patches that had not yet been struck.

As they alighted from the cars they sounded the horns and waved the fiery red strike flag bearing UFWOC's symbol, the black eagle in a white circle. Workers immediately began leaving the fields from as far away as half a mile.

Within an hour, Ben Abatti announced that he was ready to talk with the union. By 5:30 p.m. he agreed to a pact recognizing UFWOC as the bargaining agent for all workers in the company's 1,200 acres of melon fields, to recognize the union as agent for workers in other crops on the basis of a card check, to drop a damage suit against UFWOC, and to start negotiations next month.

Abatti accepted UFWOC's demand that he pay $2 an hour to the workers, the amount he and other growers had offered strikebreakers. The pre-strike base was 35 cents an hour less.

The agreement was signed at the union's Imperial Valley headquarters in the Hotel Del Rey in Calexico, just two blocks from the Mexican border.

Kircher, who was in Calexico and El Centro to help direct the strike and negotiations, said the key to the victory was Abatti's inability to recruit "green carders" from Mexico as strikebreakers. This was a reflection of the success of Manuel Chavez in enlisting farm workers on both sides of the border to the UFWOC cause.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), on a four-day California trip highlighted by addressing a COPE fund-raising dinner in Los Angeles, joined the victory festivities and at a news conference in Calexico hailed the agreement as "one beneficial to the union, to the company and the community." He congratulated the union for its "truly great efforts."

STEELWORKER JOSE CISNEROS and his family in Corpus Christi, Tex., read about a federal court order they helped win. It compels the city school system to stop segregating Spanish-speaking and Negro sections into one district separate from the "Anglo" schools. The Cisneros, one of 32 families to file suit two years ago, said "this is a victory for the nation as a whole, not only for Corpus Christi." The parents were backed by their union, including Pres. I. W. Abel and District Dir. James E. Ward.

5-Year Pact Ends St. Louis Cement Strike

St. Louis—A lengthy construction strike has been settled here with acceptance of a five-year contract by Hoisting Local 513 of the Operating Engineers. The agreement provides for $3.25 an hour in wage increases over the five-year term.

The local had been on strike against the Sand & Gravel Producers Association since Apr. 1. It struck the Material Dealers Association on May 1 and the Quarrymen's Association on May 11. About 430 members of the local were involved.

Sand and gravel workers now earn $4.23 an hour; quarry workers, $4.26 and ready-mix engineers, $4.50. The pay increases are retroactive to May 1 at those places where members were working.

Fringe benefits include two additional weeks of vacation. Engineers will receive a third week's vacation after 10 years and a fourth week after 17 years. Two additional holidays were granted, making a total of eight for all groups of employes.

The lack of concrete forced the shutdown or curtailment of major construction projects in the city during the strike.

Woodworkers Score Weyerhaeuser Victory

Daisy, Ark.—The Woodworkers staged a comeback in the pine woods of Arkansas and Oklahoma to win bargaining rights for 1,600 logging and factory employes of the Weyerhaeuser Co.'s Dierks division.

Despite a fierce campaign against the union, workers backed the IWA in National Labor Relations Board balloting at six scattered locations in the far corners of the two states. The vote was 798 for the IWA, 696 against, with 39 challenged votes and eight void ballots.

The union credited the victory to careful coordination by the AFL-CIO and its Dept. of Organization with IWA officers and the Arkansas and Oklahoma AFL-CIO. It also praised the cooperation and help of other unions including the Carpenters, Papermakers & Paperworkers, Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The Woodworkers had represented Dierks Co. employes until 1954, when management succeeded in ousting the union. Dierks was bought by Weyerhaeuser in 1969 for $317 million, and employes petitioned for a new campaign early this year.

The NLRB brought ballot facilities to 1,619 eligible workers—191 forestry employes, 185 roving maintenance men, and crews of company sawmills, planing mills, a wood-preserving plant, repair shops and boxmaking plant.

The voters stopped work long enough to vote at company locations sheltered in 1.7 million acres of pine timberland. Workplaces include Broken Bow, Wright City and Clebit in Oklahoma and Mountain Pine, Blakely, Dierks and DeQueen in Arkansas, spreading for 50 miles from East to West and nearly that much again from North to South bordering Texarkana.

Headquarters for the union campaign were in Daisy, west of Hot Springs, Ark.

Weyerhaeuser, which has 10,000 other employes represented by the IWA, fought the organizing effort vigorously with frequent letters to the workers, full page newspaper advertisements assailing "high union dues and poor service," small group indoctrination programs and sudden changes in working conditions.

The union campaign turned on face-to-face contacts, home and camp visits, and centralized committee meetings.

Presidents J. Bill Becker of the Arkansas AFL-CIO and Henry L. Likes of the Oklahoma state body helped muster support and sent personal letters of encouragement to all affected employes.

Presidents of other union locals at Weyerhaeuser plants also stressed their experience and the advantages of joint action and collective bargaining.

IWA Vice Pres. Keith Johnson and James Craven, assistant southern director for IWA directed that union's staff of organizers. Two coordinators were IWA's James McManama and AFL-CIO's Paul Nash, with federation Regional Dir. W. G. Pendergrass and five organizers from three AFL-CIO regional offices.

Johnson said the vote was a "clear victory" for the workers, union committees, and the concept of inter-union cooperation.

Labor Presses For Effective Job Safety Bill

Passage of a strong and comprehensive occupational health and safety bill is "a major priority of this Congress," the AFL-CIO declared.

In a letter to every member of the House Labor Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller strongly urged support of the job safety bill now before the committee for action. He said the bill, drafted by Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.), has "the wholehearted endorsement of all segments of organized labor."

"In particular," he continued, "we urge that you oppose any amendments that would reinstate a separate board to promulgate occupational safety and health standards, any provision creating a so-called occupational safety and health court, and any weakening of the enforcement provisions and the procedural rights of workers as set forth in the Daniels bill."

Noting that the bill's passage will be "the first long step to achievement of a safe and healthy workplace," Biemiller assured each of the congressmen that his support is needed. It will, he said, "be deeply appreciated by every American working man and woman."

Federal Contractors Get Guidelines On Equal Opportunities for Women

The Labor Dept. has issued sweeping new guidelines to assure equal job opportunities for women and to bar discrimination against them by federal contractors and subcontractors.

The guidelines follow up an earlier presidential order issued several years ago that provided for a general ban on discrimination against women by employers under federal contract.

The new guidelines specifically spell out discriminatory practices that are prohibited.

They require federal contractors to maintain written policies expressly stating that there will be no discrimination against workers because of sex. Collective bargaining agreements on conditions of employment also must be consistent with those guidelines, the Labor Dept. said.

Discrimination against women by private firms employing more than 100 workers is prohibited by civil rights laws. But the responsibility for enforcing the new guidelines is in the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, which can immediately cut off funds to the contractors.

Among the practices prohibited by the new guidelines are:

- Making any distinction based on sex in job opportunities, wages, hours, or other conditions.
- Advertising for workers in newspapers columns headed "Male" or "Female" unless sex is a bona fide occupational qualification.
- Distinguishing between the marital status of persons of one sex unless the same distinction applies to the opposite sex.
- Denying jobs to women with young children unless the same policy exists for men.
- Penalizing women for their conditions of employment because of time off needed for bearing children.
- Maintaining seniority lines or lists based soley on sex.
- Discriminatorily restricting one sex to certain job classifications and departments.
- Maintaining different retirement ages for male and female workers.
- Denying a woman a job she is qualified to do on the basis of state "protective" laws.

The guidelines also require the contractors to include women candidates in management training programs and in other jobs that were previously excluded to them.

The new guidelines were hailed by Mrs. Elizabeth Duncan Koontz, director of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau, as a "most appropriate milestone of women's progress" on the 50th anniversary of the bureau. She said the action constitutes "a giant step forward for those Americans whose talents too often have been wasted simply because they are women."

The American System

I HAVE NEVER SEEN the labor movement in a better position. I have never seen the labor movement more solid. I have never seen it in a better position to make its contribution, not just on behalf of its 14 million members, but on behalf of the entire society of which we are a part.

And I have no illusions. I don't see perfection in the labor movement, and I don't see perfection here in the country as a whole; nor do I see perfection anywhere else on earth. As a nation we have made mistakes; as a labor movement we make mistakes and undoubtedly we will make mistakes in the future.

But speaking as an individual American, I can say that under this system, with all the mistakes that we make, that in my lifetime I have seen greater and greater progress than has ever happened in the history of any other nation at any time.

Despite our problems, despite our shortcomings, here in America we have a system under which we can continually improve. Here in America we have a system under which people themselves by joining together in organizations such as labor unions can jointly work for the betterment of all concerned.

And under this system the American trade union movement has brought greater benefits to workers than has any other movement anywhere on earth at any time, and I make no apology for that statement.

Yes, we have an America that has had the courage to face the race problem. Oh, we haven't solved it, but at least we have had the courage to face it, and this applies to many segments of American society despite the cries of pain and anguish that come from the South; we are not finished with that job, but we are on our way.

We have abolished polio in my generation; we have started an official government war on poverty—we have still got a long way to go, but at least we have started, and at least they are talking now of a guaranteed income.

And, in addition, we have seen an American on the moon. I don't know whether that has any economic effect, but as an American, I like the idea.

WE ARE, in effect, in the early stages of what I think is the greatest social and economic revolution of all time. I think we are going to continue to move forward. We are not going to be confronted, as someone said the other day, by a choice between anarchy and repression; we are not going to have anarchy and we are not going to have repression.

And we are not going to abandon our basic principles upon which this nation was founded—principles of human decency and justice for all—all creeds, all colors, all nationalities.

We are not going to knuckle down to extremists from either end of the political spectrum. Oh, we had Joe McCarthy, you remember, not so many years ago, and I remember people were saying this is the first fascist, this is a terrible thing. Well, the American people took Joe McCarthy in stride, and I think they can take the John Birchers in stride, as they can take the Barry Goldwaters or anyone else.

I refuse to sell America short, and I refuse to sell the American worker and his union short. I am sure that the AFL-CIO will continue in the years ahead to play a major role in the forward progress of this country and for all of its people.

Intellectuals Seen Misguiding Europeans on American Values

By John P. Roche

ROME—History, Karl Marx once observed, does repeat itself: the first time as tragedy, the second as farce. This wry comment was brought to mind by the remarkable similarity between the European view of the United States in 1970 and that encountered in 1953.

In 1953, I spent several months in western Europe. Everywhere I went, the press and the intelligentsia carried the same message: the United States was on the verge of fascism. Pres. Eisenhower was considered the "American Hindenburg"—a military figurehead who would turn the nation over to Sen. Joe McCarthy as Adolf Hitler had received power from the aged German president in 1933.

Although Ike had not received my vote, this seemed preposterous. I was convinced that the Wisconsin demagogue was a nasty paranoid, but incapable of organizing a milk route, much less a mass political movement.

As I wrote at the time, McCarthy was the bull used by the Republican conservatives to gore the Democrats. Once Eisenhower was elected (in 1952), however, Sen. Taft and the other serious GOP leaders had no further interest in McCarthy. He simply became a public nuisance, perhaps even worse, a public bore.

Europeans knew better. To them, I was just a liberal pollyanna incapable of understanding the dynamics of American society. Just as in 1898 the French were asking, "Did the Americans blow up the Maine themselves?" European intellectuals in 1953 (and in 1970) could find signs and portents invisible to naive Americans. At the risk of sounding unduly critical, I have long suspected that wishful thinking enters the picture: they would love to see us take a fall.

Now, 17 years later, I find the same hysterics with a different cast of characters. Using that same ambivalent mixture of apprehension and delight, these critics see the United States entering a period of revolutionary disintegration.

Their sources are American—the magazines and newspapers edited by those in the United States who curiously have the same value system. (I had never before realized the degree to which the Eastern intellectual establishment is merely a branch of the European parent fir[illegible])

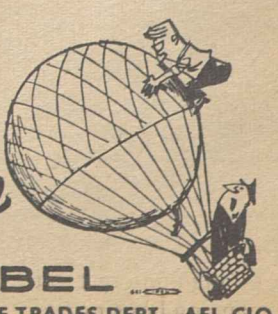
It is a harsh charge, but I am convinced that the major complaint of intellectuals—European and American—is that the United States has a mass society that works. While many of them think of themselves as "radicals," they are profoundly distressed—even nauseated—by the "crudity" of American political culture.



After all, to be an intellectual is to join an elite, a class that expects deference from the ignorant masses. In personal terms, egalitarianism is a threat to their status. Like the enraged young aristocrats who have been tearing up the American colleges, they bitterly resent "one man, one vote."

Their function is to provide leadership to the unwashed, and the deeper one penetrates the sources of anti-Americanism (at home and abroad), the more he suspects that "Americanism" symbolizes the rise to power of what in the 18th Century were called the "lower orders."

It is supremely ironic that in Italy and France the Communist Party has capitalized on the American revolution by providing a gathering place for those who find their upward mobility blocked by the "system." The average Communist voter knows little and cares less about Marx or Lenin; he wants a car, a refrigerator, a TV, above all, a decent apartment, a decent wage.

ANTI-AMERICANISM then—to borrow from Marx again—is the opiate of the intellectuals. It is the accepted way in which the elite can express its contempt for mass society. The problem is that the virus has begun to run wild among the people. So the elite fights back with the message, "America Is a Failure." The evidence varies from time to time. In 1953, we were about to go fascist; now we are crumbling into revolutionary disarray.

Life in the United States has a number of unpleasant aspects, but in any sort of historical perspective we have done remarkably well. To have developed a huge, democratic mass society is no mean accomplishment—even if our intellectuals are not saluted on the street and are limited to one vote each.

'Declaration of Conscience':

Extremism of Radical Left Parallels McCarthy Era Tactics

On June 1, 1970, Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R-Me.) marked the 20th anniversary of her famous Declaration of Conscience that led to the downfall of Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy with a speech in the Senate on the new extremism. This is excerpted from the Congressional Record.

MR. PRESIDENT, 20 years ago on this June 1 date at this same desk I spoke about the then serious national condition with a statement known as the "Declaration of Conscience." We had a national sickness then from which we recovered. We have a national sickness now from which I pray we will recover.

I would like to recall portions of that statement today because they have application now 20 years later.

I said of the then national condition:

It is a national feeling of fear and frustration that could result in national suicide and the end of everything that we Americans hold dear.

Surely that is the situation today.

I said then:

I speak as briefly as possible because too much harm has already been done with irresponsible words of bitterness and selfish political opportunism.

That is not the only situation today, but it is even worse for irresponsible words have exploded into trespass, violence, arson, and killings.

I said then:

I think it is high time for the U.S. Senate and its members to do some soul searching—for us to weigh our consciences—on the manner in which we are performing our duty to the people of the United States—on the manner in which we are using or abusing our individual powers and privileges.

That applies today. But I would add this to it—expanded application to the people themselves, whether they be students or construction workers, whether they be on or off campus.

I said then:

Those of us who shout the loudest about Americanism in making character assassinations are all too frequently those who, by our own words and acts, ignore some of the basic principles of Americanism—

The right to criticize;

The right to hold unpopular beliefs;

The right to protest;

The right to independent thought.

That applies today—and it includes the right to dissent against the dissenters.

I said then:

The American people are sick and tired of being afraid to speak their minds lest they be politically smeared. . . . Freedom of speech is not what it used to be in America. It has been so abused by some that it is not exercised by others.

That applies today to both sides. It is typified by the girl student at Colby College who wrote me;

I am striking with my heart against the fighting in Cambodia but I am intimidated by those who scream protests and clench their fists and cannot listen to people who oppose their views.

I said then:

Today our country is being psychologically divided by the confusion and the suspicions that are bred in the U.S. Senate to spread like cancerous tentacles of "know nothing, suspect everything" attitudes.

That applies today—but it must be expanded to the people themselves. Twenty years ago it was the anti-intellectuals who were most guilty of "know nothing" attitudes. Today too many of the militant intellectuals are equally as guilty of "hear nothing" attitudes of refusing to listen while demanding communication.

I said then:

I don't like the way the Senate has been made a rendezvous for vilification, for selfish political gain at the sacrifice of individual reputations and national unity.

That applies today. But I would add that equally I do not like the way the campus has been made a rendezvous for obscenity, for trespass, for violence, for arson, and for killing.

I said then:

I am not proud of the way we smear outsiders from the floor of the Senate and hide behind the cloak of congressional immunity and still place ourselves beyond criticism on the floor of the Senate.

Today I would add to that—I am not proud of the way in which too many militants resort to the illegalities of trespass, violence, and arson and, in doing so, claim for themselves a special immunity from the law with the allegation that such acts are justified because they have a political connotation with a professed cause.

I said then:

As a U.S. senator, I am not proud of the way in which the Senate has been made a publicity platform for irresponsible sensationalism.

Today I would add that I am not proud of the way in which our national television networks and campuses have been made publicity platforms for irresponsible sensationalism—nor am I proud of the countercriticism against the networks and the campuses that has gone beyond the bounds of reasonableness and propriety and fanned, instead of drenching, the fires of division.

I have admired much of the candid and justified defense of our government in reply to the news media and the militant dissenters—but some of the defense has been too extreme and unfair and too repetitive and thus impaired the effectiveness of the previous admirable and justified defense.

I said 20 years ago:

As an American, I am shocked at the way Republicans and Democrats alike are playing directly into the Communist design of "confuse, divide and conquer."

Today I am shocked at the way too many Americans are so doing.

I spoke as I did 20 years ago because of what I considered to be the great threat from the radical right—the threat of a government of repression.

I speak today because of what I consider to be the great threat from the radical left that advocates and practices violence and defiance of the law—again, the threat of the ultimate result of a reaction of repression.

It is time that the great center of our people, those who reject the violence and unreasonableness of both the extreme right and the extreme left, searched their consciences, mustered their moral and physical courage, shed their intimidated silence, and declared their consciences.

Meany Editorial:

Labor to Persevere In Environment Fight

The following editorial by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is excerpted from the June issue of the American Federationist.

THE UNITED STATES is the richest nation in the world and it should follow that life here would be the richest in the history of man.

It could be and it should be.

In the historic struggle to make it so, the trade union movement is justifiably proud of the role it has played. But today, we find our gains eroded by the slipping quality of the environment around us:

- We have bargained for shorter working hours only to see the average worker's day lengthened by the 2 to 4 hours he spends commuting in a nerve-racking maze of traffic.
- We have bargained for more vacation time only to arrive at the vacation site and find the lake is dead, the fish are gone and "no-swimming, polluted-water" signs are posted.
- We have bargained for more pay only to find one of the conveniences it will buy, air travel, consists of time spent circling a congested airport.
- We have bargained for earlier, more comfortable retirement only to see the decay of our metropolitan centers make that life far from golden.

The effect has been much the same on other historic trade union goals, social security, minimum wage, equal opportunity, Medicare, access to education—all these benefits are meaningless if you are to be poisoned by the air you breathe or the water you drink.

In 1970, the attention paid to environmental problems has reached a high level. Ecology is becoming a household word. The accumulation of years of waste and pillage of our natural resources has hit hard on the conscience of America.

But we must not be deceived into confusing attention with action. The hard work lies ahead:

- For the federal government, it means ferreting out the overlapping jurisdictions among various agencies and smoothing them into a coherent, workable plan.
- For Congress, it means following up in the enforcement of anti-pollution standards and closing the gap between what funds are authorized and what is actually appropriated.
- For state governments, it means taking maximum advantage of the federal initiative by participating fully in matching-funds programs.
- For local governments, it means vigilance and correction of faults—as in the recent instances of cities with new sewage disposal equipment but no technicians to run it.

AND FOR EVERYONE in America, it means a willingness to pay the price of extra care not to defile the countryside as well as the tax dollars per person it will take to correct our present pollution. We know those dollars will be necessary, but in the long run they will pay a handsome return if the squandering of natural resources is truly stopped.

Already, the more cynical among the nation's commentators are saying that environment is simply this year's issue, that it will pass and be forgotten like the rest. In the early 1960s, they point out, the issue was civil rights, then it was poverty, or consumer affairs, or hunger, and all of those issues joined the passing parade of yesterday's forgotten crusades.

We in the AFL-CIO have not forgotten. For years, we have argued that guaranteeing a Negro the right to be served in a restaurant is an empty gesture if he doesn't have the price of a hamburger. And we pressed for full realization of those newfound rights through full employment at a decent wage.

So too must we continue in the fight for an environment of high quality. And the same principle applies: the legislation already passed, the rush of bills that have been introduced in the excitement of early 1970, are empty gestures without the follow-through of full funding and enforcement.

Many have raised the question of the environment in the 1970s and 1980s in terms of "Will Man Survive?" We think the real question is "Will Man Persevere?"

We pledge that the AFL-CIO will.

Home Loans Lacking:

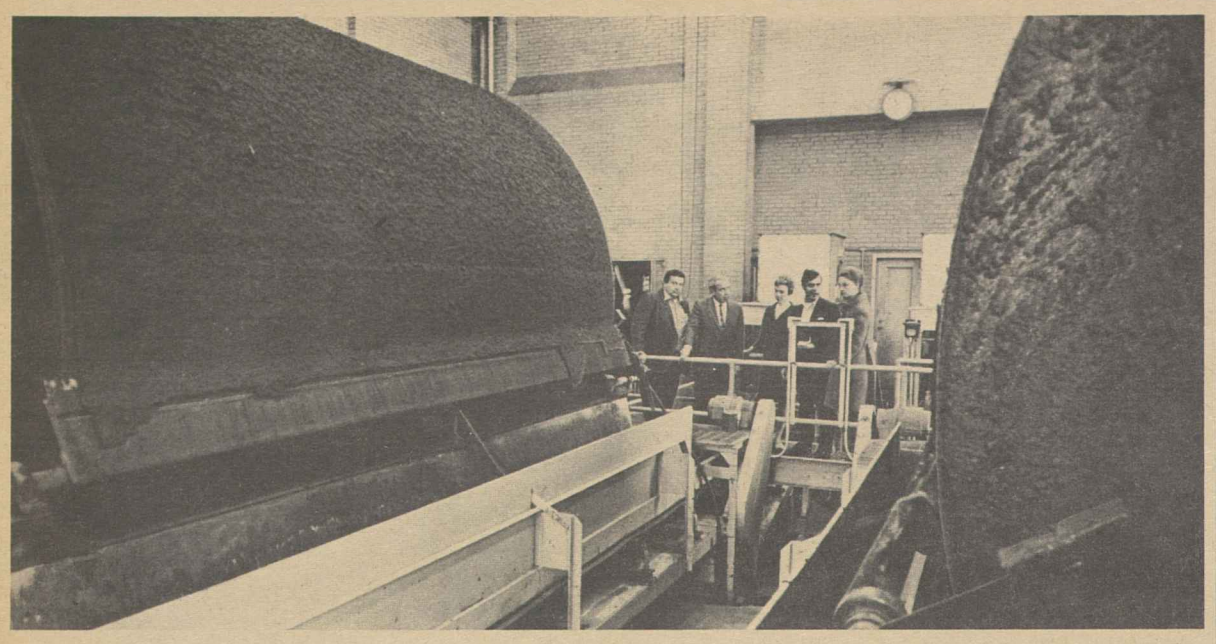
Congress Urged to Prod Nixon On Financial Crisis in Housing

CONGRESS should direct the President to use his authority to end the "sheer anarchy" reigning in U.S. money markets and ease the "plunging depression" now gripping the housing industry, AFL-CIO legislative Rep. Ray Denison suggested.



The Administration has failed to propose or support the kind of "new, extensive, emergency and long-range housing programs" needed to meet the demand for 26 million new housing units over the next 10 years, said Denison. He pointed out that fewer housing units are being built today than 20 years ago, largely because of high interest rates and other difficulties in financing housing.

"The financial institutions in the United States have, in effect, veto power over housing," he declared. They can decide whether to lend money "at a reasonable rate of interest for a home," or lend it to a "business promoter for the purpose of building a motel, or a gambling casino or a conglomerate take-over," he asserted.

"We feel that the priorities of lending money have been turned around," he said, and "loans are not going to the people who really need them." Denison appeared on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

"SHEER ANARCHY" in the U.S. money markets could be ended through use of presidential power now on the books, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and James F. Welsh of the Washington Evening Star. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

ECOLOGICAL PROBLEMS concerning the country are investigated by a group of students from the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center during a tour of the main waste disposal plant in Washington, D.C. The students are part of a class that attended a studies center seminar on "Man and His Environment." The huge drums here process solid waste which is later used as fertilizer, land fill or in other products.

Pioneering Mental Health Project Aids Hundreds in Clothing Union

New York—A man is what he does. Most men derive their sense of status and self-worth from the contribution they make through work. When mental illness impairs the worker's ability to perform his job, his world—in the shop and at home—may fall apart. His employer may feel justified in firing him, his co-workers in spurning him, and his family relationships will deteriorate.

Recognition of this close relationship between "work" and mental health led one union to pioneer in one of the first mental health programs to emphasize the importance of the work environment.

The results from the five-year project by the New York Joint Board of the Clothing Workers are in: More than 600 union members have returned to or been maintained at productive work. "Normal living" was achieved by more than half the cases after as few as eight treatment sessions, or within three months.

The ACWA's mental health program is co-sponsored by the New York Clothing Manufacturers Association, financed in large part by federal grants, and operates from the Sidney Hillman Health Center.

Dr. Hyman J. Weiner, project director, said a "short-term, crisis oriented" approach was used in which the worker was interviewed, his problem uncovered and discussed, and a practical method sought to cope with it. Those helping the worker included the patient himself, his family and co-workers, the union's business agent, the employer, the psychiatrist and the social worker.

Emphasis was on what the worker could do, rather than on "defining" his illness. Therapy helped him test out different ways of dealing with conflicts on the job, such as controlling his anger. He was taught to stay with, not run away from, conflicts.

"The inability to face conflict squarely generally leads to many difficulties," Dr. Weiner said. "Anger builds up and becomes directed either toward the other party or toward oneself."

The importance of work as an avenue for identifying the ill is illustrated by some typical referrals:

- A skilled, stable worker lost his fifth job in a year because of a fight in the shop. His recent employment instability was diagnosed at the center as a type of mental illness.
- A consistently late-to-work union member was helped over his alcoholism problem.
- Personal and family problems caused numerous other emotional problems in workers which were reflected in their poor or erratic job performance.

The clinic maintained an open door, with any worker in the industry or member of his immediate family eligible for free treatment. While work-connected problems received staff priority, walk-in and in-patient care were provided those with other emotional problems through an agreement with three New York hospitals.

The Amalgamated Insurance Fund relieved workers' financial pressures. Jobs were found for workers requiring them through the union's job-placement service.

The project's results—analysis of experiences with patients and new treatment techniques—will be available shortly to central labor bodies, unions, community health facilities, consumer-sponsored health programs and government agencies. Meanwhile, a report based on a Labor-Mental Health Conference is available from the Sidney Hillman Health Center, 16 East 16th St., New York, N.Y. 10003.

Sen. Williams Backed By New Jersey Labor

Atlantic City—Delegates to the New Jersey State AFL-CIO convention gave Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., a cheering ovation and pledged solid support for his campaign to win re-election to a third term in November.

The convention closed ranks also behind a slate of officers, all elected by acclamation for three-year terms.

Charles H. Marciante, longtime secretary-treasurer of the state organization, was elected to his first full term as president. Marciante had been serving as president since March, when Vincent J. Murphy retired.

As secretary-treasurer, the delegates picked John J. Brown of the Operating Engineers. Thomas J. Kean, a former staff member of the State AFL-CIO who had been named interim secretary-treasurer in March, did not seek election to the post. A previously announced candidate, Bruno Sorchinski of the Bakery Workers, withdrew before the balloting began.

Richard A. Lynch was re-elected an executive vice president and a vacant post of executive vice president was filled by the election of Joseph Stevens, an international representative of the Steelworkers.

In a major policy resolution, the convention called for enactment of a national health insurance program as the solution to meeting the health care needs of the American people while putting a lid on the rapid rise in the cost of medical care.

In his report to the convention, Marciante attacked the increased use of injunctions by state courts in labor disputes and the jailing of teachers in strikes caused by the refusal of school boards to act on legitimate grievances and carry out the recommendations of impartial fact-finding panels.

Other speakers at the convention, which was attended by nearly 2,000 persons, included New Jersey Gov. William T. Cahill and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. George Craig.

Fringe Benefit Ratio Shows Little Change

A Bureau of Labor Statistics survey has found little change between 1966 and 1968 in the ratio of fringe benefit costs to direct payroll expenses—either among private employers or for the nation's largest single employer, the federal government.

The 1968 statistics, the latest available, showed private employers spending 25.1 cents for "pay supplements" for each dollar in basic wages or salaries. The comparable figure for the federal government as an employer was 24.3 cents.

In both cases, the fringe costs included payments required by law, such as the employer portion of the social security tax and the government's share of the cost of civil service retirement.

The fringe benefit cost as a proportion of direct payroll was about one-half of 1 percent higher for both private industry and the federal government than it had been two years earlier.

While the overall cost ratios were similar, the breakdown showed a number of variances. For example, the government paid more than private industry for vacation and holiday time—11.7 percent to 8.4 percent. But private industry paid an average of 3.6 percent of payroll for life and health insurance for its workers, compared with only 1.6 percent in the government service.

Factory Layoffs Up Jobless Rate to 5%

declared that this sharp rise in unemployment for five consecutive months, coupled with unchecked inflation, "is testimony to the complete failure of the Administration's economic policies.

"Workers and consumers are paying the price for these policies," he added.

Expressing concern for the continuing rise in both joblessness and consumer prices, coupled with production cutbacks that are shrinking paychecks of millions of other workers, Meany called for steps to halt the deterioration in the nation's economy. He said:

"We urge Congress to direct the Federal Reserve System to establish selective controls, interest rate ceilings on specific types of loans and the allocation of credit to where it will do the most good for balanced economic growth, increasing employment and meeting America's needs for housing and community facilities."

Since December, unemployment has climbed nearly 1.3 million—600,000 adult men, 425,000 adult women and 225,000 teenagers. The BLS said that of this increase, 60 percent were persons who had lost their jobs, 20 percent were people returning to the labor force, and 10 percent were workers who left jobs voluntarily or persons who had never worked before.

Total employment decreased from April by 475,000 to 78.4 million in May. This is a reverse of the normal pattern of rising employment during the spring period. All of the decline occurred in non-farm jobs, the BLS reported.

Full-time workers were hit hardest by last month's increase in unemployment. Their rate rose to 4.7 percent from 4.4 percent in April, while joblessness for part-time workers dropped to 6.4 percent from 7.4 percent the month before.

The unemployment rate for adult men rose from 3.2 percent in April to 3.5 percent in May. This rate has been climbing steadily for the past six months.

The jobless rate for married men rose two-tenths of 1 percent to 2.6 percent in May.

The BLS noted that the jobless rate for adult women, after remaining virtually unchanged in April, increased from 4.4 percent to 5.1 percent in May.

Teenage unemployment declined in May to 14.3 percent, from 15.7 percent in April. The rate had risen sharply in April after little change for three preceding months, the BLS said.

All of the increase in unemployment in May occurred among white workers, while the Negro jobless rate declined, the BLS reported. White unemployment rose to 4.6 percent from 4.3 percent and black unemployment dropped to 8 percent from 8.7 percent in April. The black rate was still above the 7.1 percent rate of March.

The ratio of Negro to white unemployment in May was 1.7 to 1. It had been about 2 to 1 in seven of the last eight months, BLS said.

After seasonal adjustments, non-farm payroll employment slipped in May by 270,000 with 225,000 of this coming in manufacturing. Employment in durable goods fell by 130,000 while non-durable goods industries posted their first sizable decline—90,000 — since current manufacturing employment declines began.

The average workweek and average overtime hours in manufacturing continued to drop off in May. The average workweek for rank-and-file workers slipped to a seasonally adjusted 39.9 hours from 40 hours in April. Factory overtime edged down by one-tenth of an hour to 2.9 hours.

Average hourly earnings for production and non-supervisory workers on private payrolls rose by 2 cents in May to $3.20. These earnings were up 19 cents over May 1969.

However, BLS Assistant Commissioner Harold Goldstein indicated that consumer prices also rose in May although he said all the figures are not yet available.

Average weekly earnings increased $1.06 between April and May to $118.72. They were up $5.24 over May 1969.

Over the year ending April 1970, average weekly earnings were up by 5.3 percent, but in terms of real dollars adjusted for consumer price changes, earnings actually declined by seventh-tenths of 1 percent, the BLS pointed out.

Supreme Court Upholds State Ban on Picketing

The Supreme Court relied on a law passed by Congress in 1793 in ruling that a federal district court can't void an anti-picketing injunction issued by a state court—even though the picketing is clearly permitted by federal law.

Its 5-2 decision was handed down in a case arising out of the Florida East Coast Railway strike.

Railroad management, after having been refused an anti-picketing injunction in federal court, obtained an injunction from a state judge. The Locomotive Engineers, citing a recent Supreme Court decision upholding picketing rights in a similar situation arising out of the same strike, sought and received an order from the federal court that in effect nullified the state injunction.

But the Supreme Court said the 1793 law was intended to prevent lower federal courts from interfering with the workings of state courts.

Thus, the court majority said, the union should have appealed the injunction through the higher levels of the Florida judicial systems. If turned down in the state's top appellate court, it then could have appealed to the Supreme Court.

A dissenting opinion by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., joined by Justice Byron R. White, maintained that the case represented one of the exceptions allowed under the 18th Century law.

Brennan said the federal court's determination that the union had a protected right to picket "has been rendered wholly ineffective by the state injunction."

In another case with possible implications for maritime labor, the Supreme Court held that a foreign-flag ship controlled by American interests is not wholly exempt from U.S. law.

It upheld the right of a Greek seaman to bring a personal injury damage suit against the ship owner in a U.S. court, even though the ship is registered in Greece.

The court noted that the owner lived in the United States and the ship was principally engaged in trade to and from the United States.

SIU Sea School

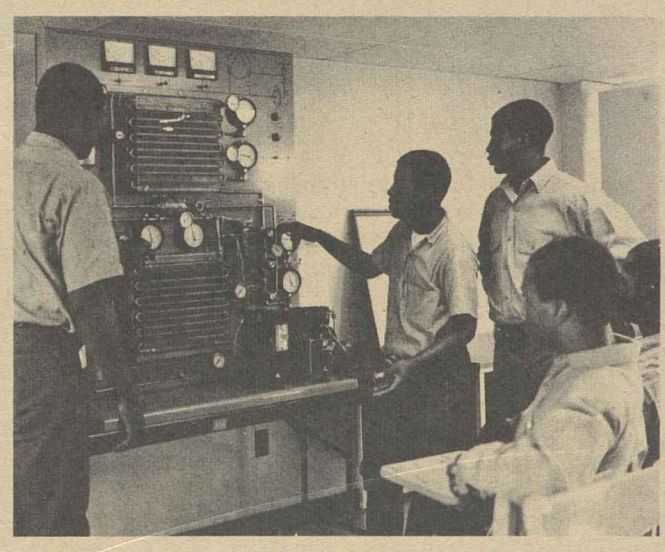
A FEW MILES DOWN the Potomac from Washington, not far from where the river flows into Chesapeake Bay, hundreds of young men are in training for careers in the merchant marine.

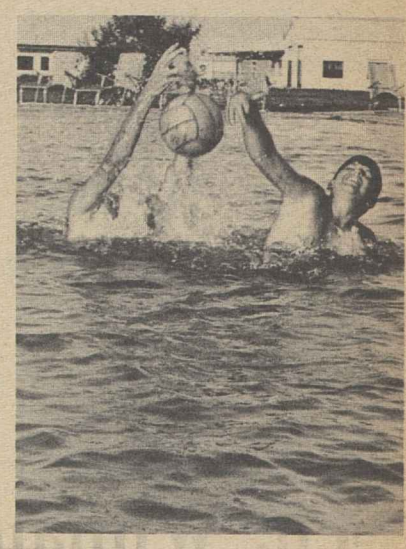
In a typical year, more than 1,000 recruits are graduated from the Seafarers' Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship at Piney Point, Md., to qualify as merchant seamen.

The training facility, located on a 53-acre tract, is also responsible for the upgrading of about 800 seamen in the unlicensed ratings and for preparing another 300 men for examinations to qualify as licensed deck and engineering officers.

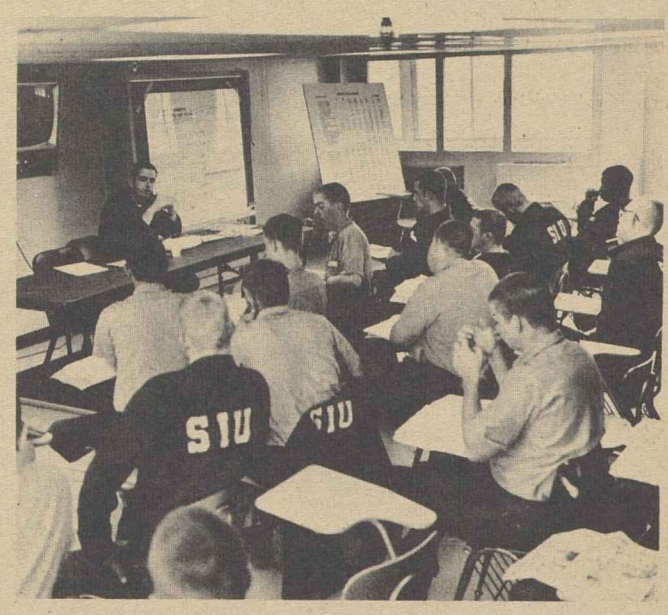


The Lundeberg school, named after the founder and first president of SIU, is an outstanding example of cooperation between management and labor. The joint operation of the school provides qualified manpower for the operators of privately-owned American flag vessels under contract with the union.

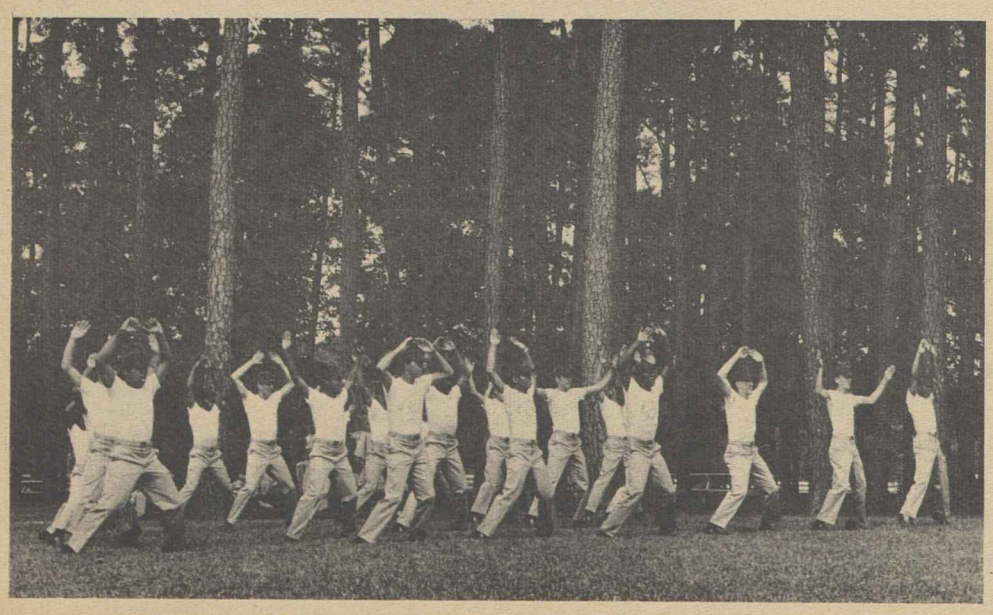
The SIU job-oriented training program had its beginnings in 1953, and was conducted in a number of ports throughout the country.



But as the program expanded, it became evident that a centralized operation was needed. The SIU acquired the Piney Point facility, a former Navy torpedo-testing station, to carry out the objectives of the union's training program.



Recruits man the oars during a lifeboat training session.



New trainees are instructed at a mock-up of shipboard equipment.

After-duty activity in the swimming pool.

Student seamen participate in a classroom discussion.

Rigorous physical training prepares recruits for sea careers.

Basic shipboard skills are taught by veteran seamen.

House Okays New Curbs on Air Pollution

The House approved a massive federal program to curb air pollution, and authorized nearly twice the amount Pres. Nixon had requested in order to get it under way.

It sent the legislation to the Senate by a 374-1 vote, with the only complaint coming from congressmen who had wanted an even stronger bill. A companion Senate measure, sponsored by Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), would set a higher spending ceiling than the House-passed bill.

The House bill authorizes $200 million in federal funds for the fiscal year starting July 1, compared with the $106 million sought by the President. The House bill would provide still more funds in subsequent years, totaling $775 million over a three-year period. But how much would actually be spent depends on year-by-year appropriations.

A substantial portion of the money—$300 million over the three years—would be designated for research on curbing pollution from gasoline, coal and oil combustion.

The House bill directs the federal government to set up national standards to curb pollution in the atmosphere and provides penalties for violators.

Wage Offer Breaks Logjam In Rail Talks

A union representing 13,000 railroad workers received a new wage offer from management in an 18-month-old contract dispute as other rail unions took strike votes and pressed for settlement of their negotiations with the railroads.

The Firemen & Oilers, resuming meetings with management after a breakdown in wage and rule talks, received a proposal that union leaders submitted to general chairmen on U.S. lines. A union spokesman said a settlement is possible.

The new offer came after brotherhood members voted overwhelmingly for a strike. The union has exhausted the mediation procedures of the Railway Labor Act and will be free to strike June 20 if there is no settlement by that time.

Members of the Railway Clerks and the Maintenance of Way Employes recently voted almost unanimously to authorize strikes if current bargaining efforts fail to produce adequate gains in wages and work rules.

Members of the Dining Car Employes, affiliated with the Hotel & Restaurant union, and general chairmen of the United Transportation Union also voted strike authority to their negotiators. Three of the unions are seeking general wage hikes of 12 percent a year, and the UTU has been asking 15 percent a year for two years.

Pres. H. C. Crotty of the Waymen said that rail management has made no offer that would serve as a basis for settlement of his members' objectives—wages to meet the constantly rising cost of living, and reasonable work rules.

100,000 Exhaust Jobless Benefits

More than 100.000 workers exhausted their right to unemployment insurance in April, the Dept. of Labor reported. This was an increase of 13,600 from March 1970 and 18,400 higher than in April a year ago, it said.

The Labor Dept. said insured unemployment dropped 50,800 to 1.6 million for the week ending May 23. But the total insured was roughly twice that of April 1969 and the highest total since 1961.

LABOR BOOKSHELF—a collection of 12 outstanding books on the labor movement compiled by the Clothing Workers—is presented to the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center library by ACWA Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel, left. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., studies center director, accepted the collection. The ACWA has given the book set to more than 50 libraries across the country.

McGlotten Appointed New HRDI Director

Robert M. McGlotten, a staff representative of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Civil Rights, has been named director of the labor federation's Human Resources Development Institute (HRDI), Pres. George Meany announced.

The HRDI was established in 1968, in cooperation with the U.S. Dept. of Labor, to coordinate union and government manpower programs.

As HRDI director, McGlotten will be responsible for guiding labor activities in a wide range of manpower programs, including Job Opportunities in the Business Sector, the Outreach apprenticeship program, Model Cities, the Concentrated Employment Program, the Cooperative Area Manpower Planning System, and numerous on-the-job training programs under the Manpower Development & Training Act.

The programs McGlotten will administer "are vitally important to labor and, I believe, to the nation," Meany declared. "These are the spearheads we have established to find ways to open good and productive jobs to people who have been labeled hard to employ, and who have been pushed aside and largely excluded from our nation's economic life.

"Labor believes there is no more important task than to prove that there is room in our society for all its members, and that there is a job and a constructive kind of life for everyone."

Meany called McGlotten well qualified to guide these programs and said "the AFL-CIO Executive Council intends to see, to the best of its ability, that he has the backing he needs to help carry them out."

McGlotten, 33, is on indefinite leave from his assignment in the Dept. of Civil Rights, which he joined in April 1967. He replaces Merlin Taylor, who has returned to his post in the U.S. Labor Dept.

Before joining the AFL-CIO staff, McGlotten was a national labor relations specialist for the Opportunities Industrialization Center Job Training Program.

He is a vice president of the Negro Trade Union Leadership Council and has served as a public relations representative for Transport Workers Local 234 in Philadelphia. He was active in organizing activities of a number of unions in the Delaware Valley, including the Teachers, Steelworkers and Paperworkers.

He attended the University of Pennsylvania, St. Joseph's College Institute of Industrial Relations and the Pennsylvania State Labor Education Center.

Congress Raises Aid To Health Facilities

which do not own a general hospital to receive such grants. This would include community group health organizations. The only requirement would be that the medical staff of such outpatient centers have hospital affiliations that would enable them to treat patients who were hospitalized.

The bill also would permit federal assistance in purchase of equipment for a health facility, when the equipment will provide a health service not previously available in the community.

Another provision would allow the state planning agency to approve up to 90 percent federal financing for projects that offer the likelihood of reducing health care costs through shared services, and for projects providing services for either urban or rural poverty groups.

The bill also continues the trend away from rural hospital construction that marked the early years of the programs by providing a priority for construction grants to both urban and rural poverty areas.

As is the case with all authorization bills, the dollar amounts in the legislation are merely ceilings on how much can be spent. The money must still be appropriated year-by-year by Congress in separate legislation.

In other congressional developments:

● The House Judiciary Committee voted 13-8 approval of a bill opposed by unions in the newspaper industry that would exempt publishers in financial difficulties from a number of antitrust restrictions. They would be able to merge all non-editorial operations with competitors to pool profits, fix prices and allocate markets. The Senate has passed a similar bill.

● Several hundred delegates from union, civil rights and church groups, in Washington at the call of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, reported mounting support for House acceptance of a Senate-passed extension of the Voting Rights Act. One of its provisions would give the vote to 18-year-olds.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert sent to his colleagues copies of statements by leading constitutional scholars upholding the constitutionality of a law enfranchising 18-year-olds. Albert noted that Republican supporters of the bill have circulated similar material and the issue "is by no means partisan."

● The House put off action on the postal pay-reform and collective bargaining bill for another week, after opponents tried to get the House Rules Committee to change the ground rules for considering the legislation.

The National Right to Work Committee has organized a major assault on a provision of the bill that would give postal workers the same right to bargain for union security as other workers.

A statement by the "work" committee hailed the threat by Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.) to filibuster against the bill in the Senate unless the bill is amended to prohibit a union shop agreement.

Tax Changes to Boost Take-Home Pay July 1

America's workers will receive a little more in their pay envelopes starting in July, when two labor-supported provisions of last year's tax reform law take effect.

Take-home pay will go up as the last portion of the 10 percent surtax enacted in 1968 is phased out. The surtax had been cut to 5 percent for the first six months of 1970 and will be eliminated entirely on July 1.

On that same date, the tax deduction allowed for each personal exemption—for the taxpayer and each dependent—will be increased from $600 to $650.

The two tax changes will mean that slightly less money will be withheld from wages and salaries under new tax tables that have been sent to employers.

A married worker with two children, earning $150 a week, will receive an additional $1.30 in take-home pay. The amount deducted for federal income taxes will drop from $15.80 to $14.50. Workers with fewer dependents or lower gross pay will receive a smaller increase; those with more dependents or a higher salary will receive a bigger take-home raise.

Still further benefits are due in future years as tax relief provisions of the law become fully effective. By 1973, the personal exemption will rise to $750, the standard deduction will increase, and single persons and heads of households will also have their taxes cut.

The AFL-CIO had supported a broad-ranging program of tax reform based on closing loopholes that enabled a large part of non-wage income to escape taxation. The federation also endorsed the tax relief provisions proposed by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) which raised the personal exemption, removed the poor from the tax rolls and provided relief for middle-income wage earners.

The final version of the legislation was described by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as "an important first step toward tax justice" but "not the end of the road."

'Failure' and 'Disunity':

White House Policies Scored At Textile Union Convention

Miami Beach—Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America delivered a slashing attack on the Nixon Administration at the union's 16th biennial convention here, charging that a nation that was moving ahead has been reduced to "fighting the fires that threaten to burn down what we have built."

"Eighteen months ago, our country was on the move," Pollock told the 1,100 delegates. "We were concerned with the problems of the cities, with pollution, with housing and education and raising the level of living of our minorities —the blacks, Puerto Ricans and migrant farm workers."

But since then, Pollock said, "Pres. Nixon has created a level of dissension and disunity unequalled in our lifetime. His Vice President and Attorney General have fostered hatred and suspicion between the races and between the generations."

In reporting to the convention on the state of TWUA, Pollock said the union had grown by 17,300 members since its 1968 convention and the average straight-time hourly earnings in the industry had risen from $2.15 to $2.39 an hour, the biggest increase in a two-year period since 1939.

Pollock also reported that the increasing pressures of inflation have hurt the union's finances. Although the TWUA had fewer strikes in the past two years, he noted, defense fund expenditures increased because of a 25 percent boost in strike benefits. As for the general fund, he said, "we would be in the red now" if it weren't for the earnings of union investments.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who addressed the convention on its opening day, declared that the nation's present economic slump and resulting unemployment are "clearly the result" of what he called the "sorry failure" of Administration policies. "So it is up to the Administration to do something about it, and if they don't, then Congress should."

Pollock said "The invasion of Cambodia, the resumption of the bombing of North Viet Nam and our involvement in Laos have contributed heavily to the sharp division that exists among Americans.

"Unless he pulls American troops out of Cambodia by June 30, as he has promised; unless he has brought our troops home from Viet Nam by 1972, he should follow the lead of his predecessor and not be a candidate for re-election."

Meany also called attention to the "unfair competition of foreign, low-wage imports that are destroying American jobs at an alarming rate," in the textile and other industries. He said the changes in U.S. import-export ratios have been brought about by the internationalization of technology and the growing number of U.S. corporations taking advantage of low-wage conditions to establish plants in foreign countries.

Meany mentioned new plants for manufacturing radio components planned by Zenith and Motorola in Taiwan and South Korea. Zenith, he noted has laid off 3,000 workers in the United States—one-third of them are black—and plans to lay off 4,000 more.

This is a company, Meany pointed out, which has pledged through the National Alliance of Businessmen to help find jobs for ghetto dwellers.

"It is still supposed to do this job, but here is a corporation which is instead shipping jobs abroad, closing factories here and operating them in Taiwan," he observed. "And Henry Ford is in the same boat."

The ideal solution, he said, would be international agreements on imports, "but we don't live in an ideal world. Genuine cooperation might take 10 or 20 years and the workers whose jobs are at stake cannot wait that long."

Meany said the recent Senate rejections of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and G. Harrold Carswell for the Supreme Court prove again that "the trade union movement, working hand-in-hand with the civil rights organizations, can make progress that affects the lives of all of our workers, of all colors and creeds."

The first contracts for farm workers in California came about, he noted, after six years of intense effort. "But the significant part is this: We can go 11 years or 15 years and get a breakthrough. But we do not quit."

Meany said the United States is currently in the midst of a social and economic revolution unparalleled in its history. He cited the giant strides made during the presidency of Lyndon Johnson in such areas as education.

"During the last days of the Eisenhower Administration, there was no federal aid to education," Meany said. "And when Pres. Kennedy died, there were a couple of billion dollars in that pot. But in the four years Johnson spent in the White House, federal aid to education has gone up to close to $30 billion a year.

"In the last six or seven years, the United States has recognized for the first time that the education of America's children is a federal responsibility. And we are getting closer to the day when America's children can get all the education they can assimilate, whether or not their parents can pay for it."

Pollock declared that the union would continue to press for legislation for adequate health protection. He mentioned such hazards as excessive noise, which can bring deafness; asbestosis, a "sometimes fatal ailment" brought on by inhaling asbestos dust; and byssinosis, or "brown lung," caused by inhaling cotton dust.

Byssinosis tests for all delegates were scheduled during the convention. A mobile laboratory under the supervision of Dr. Richard Bader of Mt. Sinai hospital in New York was set up in the lobby of the convention hotel. TWUA Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin told the delegates that all results would be confidential unless they requested their own results.

Another brown lung expert, Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of Mt. Sinai, was scheduled to address the convention later.

Glass Workers Certified for Aid

About 350 glass workers at Arnold, Pa., who lost their jobs because of the impact of foreign imports were certified eligible by the Labor Dept. for adjustment assistance.

They were employed by American St. Gobain Corp., which has completely ceased operations in the manufacture of window glass.

The workers were members of Glass & Ceramic Workers Local 17 and Glass Cutters Local 5.

The adjustment assistance provisions are a part of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

Workers will be eligible for payments of 65 percent of average weekly wages with an $85-a-week maximum. Payments are limited to 52 weeks, but up to 26 additional weeks may be allowed so workers can complete training courses.

TEXTILE WORKERS Pres. William Pollock takes the test for damage from byssinosis, or "brown lung" disease, at the opening of the union's convention in Miami Beach, Fla. AFL-CIO Pres. ## Runaway Manufacturer Tells How He Exports Jobs

Labor's case for a new trade policy to halt the export of American jobs to low-wage countries was bolstered at House Ways & Means Committee hearings by the first-hand testimony of a runaway shoe manufacturer.

William Sheskey, president of the Commonwealth Shoe & Leather Co. was being questioned by Rep. Sam M. Gibbons (D-Fla.). Excerpts from the transcript follow:

Gibbons: "You bought a company and immediately shut it down? Was it obsolete?

Sheskey: "No, it wasn't obsolete at all."

Gibbons: "Why, then, did you buy the factory?"

Sheskey: "I bought the factory. I shipped the lasts, dies and patterns and the management and much of the leather to Europe. There I am making the same shoes under the same brand name, selling them to the same customers, with the same management, with the same equipment, for only one reason: the labor where I am making the shoes is 50 cents an hour as compared to $3 per hour that I was paying.

"Now I have to do that in order to survive. . . . Here is a perfect example of where I took everything American except the labor and that is exactly why I bought the company."

Lack of Funds Hinders Federal Safety Efforts

An independent study of federal consumer safety programs has criticized Congress for failing to appropriate enough funds to enforce the very legislation it passes.

One result of this failure, the study found, is that regulatory bodies have to ask industry for basic information needed in writing regulations instead of obtaining it on their own. The industries have a vested interest in the information they give the federal agencies which should have their own testing facilities, the report said.

The study dealt with enforcement of auto safety, flammable fabrics, toys and hazardous substances programs. It was conducted by Howard A. Heffron, former chief counsel of the National Highway Safety Bureau.

Heffron did the study under contract from the National Commission on Product Safety which will soon submit its report to Congress based on more than two years of studies and public hearings on product safety.

Because of inadequate congressional funding only one full-time employe at the Food & Drug Administration's Bureau of Compliance was responsible for enforcing the ban on hazardous substances, the report found.

It also noted that Congress failed to appropriate new funds to enforce the flammable fabrics program during its first year and that the National Highway Safety Bureau lacked the money to construct its own research and test facilities and depended on automakers for testing information.

The report said consumer protection agencies ought to have emergency power to prevent the sales of dangerous products while administrative proceedings are going on. Millions of consumers might be threatened by drawn-out legal proceedings that protect the manufacturers' right first and the consumers' last, it suggested.

Although the regulatory agencies are supposed to be the consumers' representative in government, their most daily contact with industry representatives has narrowed their vision, said the report. It urged strong independent consumer representation in the regulatory process.

The regulatory agencies came in for stiff criticism for the long delays in writing regulations and enforcing them.

The Dept. of Commerce has failed to take steps to apply even the weak existing flammability standard to blankets or bedding, said the report, and only this year has started proceedings on flammability standards covering children's clothes and carpets.

FDA took more than three years to complete proceedings to ban the extremely dangerous substance carbon tetrachloride for home use. During that period it failed to use its power to ban the substance pending the outcome of administrative hearings, the study reported.

The National Highway Safety Bureau's tire tests turned out to give consumers better protection than the tire industry's earlier voluntary test program and was noted as a bright spot in the regulatory picture.

Former BLS Chief Arthur M. Ross Dies

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Arthur M. Ross, vice president of the University of Michigan and former U.S. Commissioner of Labor Statistics, died at the age of 54.

Dr. Ross had been a prominent mediator and arbitrator, serving on major presidential disputes panels, before becoming head of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1965. He died at a motel near Detroit while on a business trip for the university and is survived by his widow and four children.

2 Metromedia Stations Struck By Engineers

Two small local unions of TV engineers pledged to keep picketing Channel 5 stations in Washington and New York until Metromedia Inc., powerful independent radio-TV chain, stops trying to take away 25-year-old contract conditions.

In Washington, 46 members of Theatrical Stage Employes Local 819 have been picketing Station WTTG since May 22. In New York, 72 members of IATSE Local 794 have been on strike against Station WNEW since about the same time.

Washington strikers said Metromedia management first took away such assignments as covering Pres. Nixon's press conference broadcasts, then insisted in negotiations on new contract language calling for "unmanned" cameras and doubling up on engineers' jobs.

Two-Stage Package:

Nixon Asks Changes In Welfare Reform

Pres. Nixon has proposed a two-stage package of amendments to his welfare reform and family assistance bill, including a plan to scrap the Medicaid program and substitute a form of national health insurance for low-income families.

The new presidential message was aimed at unblocking the House-passed family assistance bill, which has been stalled since April in the Senate Finance Committee.

Nixon stressed the Administration's "total commitment to passage of this legislative milestone this year."

Key senators on the Finance Committee had complained that some people on welfare would still be better off without a full-time job than working at low wages and receiving the proposed family income supplements.

They told the Administration bluntly that they would sit on the bill until changes were proposed to overcome this objection.

The new proposals, thrashed out during weeks of internal debate within the Administration, are in two parts.

As immediate changes in the House-passed bill, the President proposed:

● Eliminating a special program of federal-state assistance to unemployed fathers, which about half the states have adopted. About 90,000 men would lose benefits under this proposal, thus presumably increasing their incentive to find full-time jobs. The alternative apparently rejected by the Administration would have been to raise benefits for persons with jobs.

● To overcome what it considers a "disincentive" under the present public housing program, the Administration repeated a recommendation it made earlier on housing legislation—that a family living in public housing pay 20 percent of its income under $3,500 in rent, and 25 percent of its income above that amount. Thus, the theory goes, the family would not have to fear being evicted from low-cost housing if its income moved slightly above the present cutoff.

For next year, Nixon promised Congress that he would:

● Submit a reorganization plan at the start of the new Congress to transfer the food stamp program from the Agriculture Dept. to the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. The plan would make it possible for a family to receive its food stamp allotment automatically with family assistance payments, with the cost deducted from the assistance check. The food stamp price would rise with increases in income.

● Propose legislation early in 1971 "to establish a family health insurance program for all poor families with children. This insurance would provide a comprehensive package of health services, including both hospital and outpatient care."

Nixon said details of the family health insurance plan will be developed by the new Domestic Council being set up in the White House.

However, a background paper submitted with his message suggested how such a program might operate.

It would require all except the poorest families to pay premiums, with the amount scaled to income up to a maximum of about $500 a year.

In states with more generous Medicaid programs, the effect might be to require low income families to pay for care they now receive without charge. From another viewpoint, however, the proposal is the closest the Administration has come to the concept of national health insurance.

Despite the suggestions of the background paper, the details of the plan will not be known until next year.

Griepentrog Retires, AIW Names Jewell

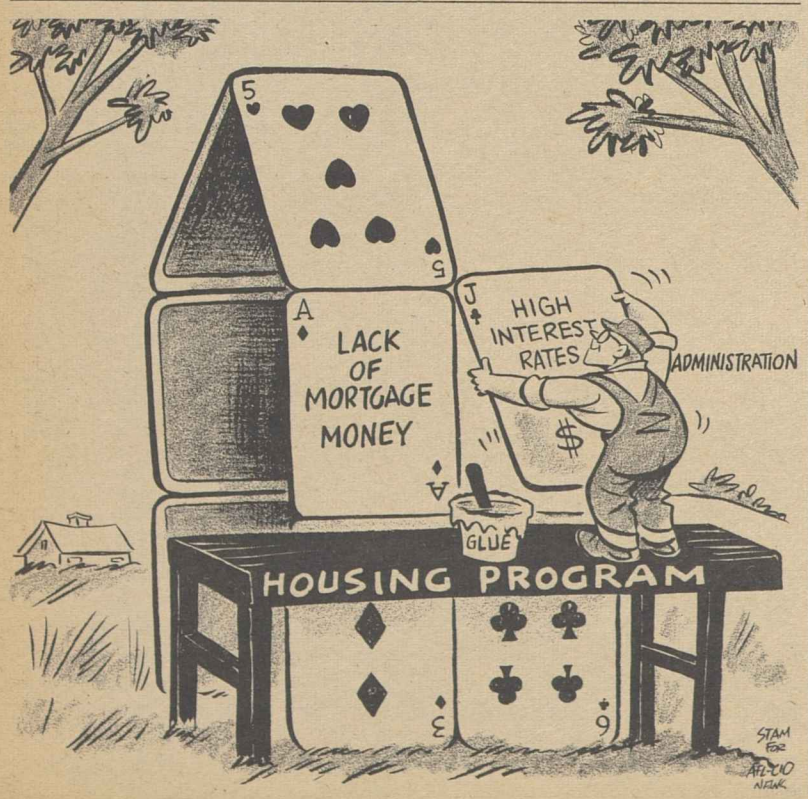
Milwaukee—Gilbert Jewell has been elected president of the Allied Industrial Workers to succeed Carl W. Griepentrog, who retired June 1. Jewell had been secretary-treasurer of the AIW since 1957.



The union's executive board also elected Dominick D'Ambrosio, director of AIW Region 4 in Cincinnati, as secretary-treasurer.

The terms of Jewell and D'Ambrosio will run until the AIW convention in autumn of 1971. Jewell is 62 and D'Ambrosio is 47.

Jewell, a native of Missouri, has been a member of the union since it received its charter from the AFL in 1935.

He was named secretary-treasurer by the executive board in 1957 and was elected to the post at a special convention later that year. He was re-elected at the three subsequent conventions.

The executive board named J. B. Arnold, Jr., a Region 4 representative from Owensboro, Ky., as administrator of the region.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP of urban transportation systems is urged by Pres. John M. Elliott, right, of the Amalgamated Transit Union before a House subcommittee. At left is Walter J. Bierwagen, ATU executive board member and director of public affairs. Elliott told the House Banking & Currency subcommittee that a tax-supported free fare system is also needed to solve the transport crisis.

Transit Union Urges Free Fare System

Tax-supported free fares and public ownership of all urban transit systems are being pressed by the Amalgamated Transit Union as the solution to the transportation crisis affecting bigger cities across the nation.

The union made these proposals to Congress after its executive board abandoned its traditional policy of staying out of the argument for public ownership of transit systems.

ATU Pres. John M. Elliott testified before the House Banking & Currency subcommittee in support of the mass transit bill that would provide $3.1 billion in federal funds to improve transit facilities for urban areas.

Elliott told the subcommittee that urban mass transit systems should be treated the same as other public services, such as police and fire protection, schools and parks.

"This means the reduction or even total elimination of high fares assessed against riders," he declared.

The union has linked the deterioration of mass transit systems with skyrocketing fares. In its position paper on fare increases and public ownership, the board declared that the policy of fares for profit "is not sound today."

"In many respects, the transit industry represents an outstanding failure of the American free enterprise system," the ATU board stressed. "The industry suffers loses every year. . . . It has responded defensively by cutting service and raising fares."

The board further noted that during the last 15 years more than 200 bus companies have gone out of business, leaving their communities without service and destroying job opportunities.

The high fares being charged by the bus companies are diverting riders from the transit industry, the union said. Washington, D.C., and Chicago are contemplating fares of 40 and 50 cents while Kansas City already has reached the 50-cent mark, it noted.

Elliott told the subcommittee that a tax supported free-fare system is the realistic way of spreading transit costs and benefits to all levels of the community.

The union noted that the increasing charge for fares is a form of regressive taxation—a tax imposed on the working people, the poor and aged.

It also pointed out that it will support public ownership only if it will provide adequate protection to preserve existing rights of employes to collective bargaining and other benefits.

Elliott testified that the ATU fully supports the views expressed by Sec. of Transportation John A. Volpe when he said, "We ought to get rid of the idea once and for all that public transportation must make a profit at the fare box."

The Senate-passed mass transit bill is now bogged down in a House subcommittee over the question of funding the $3.1 billion program.

Rohan Elected New President Of Pressmen

Sec.-Treas. Alexander J. Rohan of the Printing Pressmen was declared the winner of a two-way vote contest for the union's presidency and was sworn in to serve until June 1972 to fill a vacancy caused by the death Jan. 20 of Anthony J. DeAndrade.

Rohan defeated Walter Turner, former IPP vice president, by a vote of 39,583 to 20,592.

Final election returns were tabulated June 10 by the union's board of electors. Installation ceremonies were conducted by John Long, retired international legislative representative and long-time Rohan friend.

The vacancy created by Rohan's elevation will be filled by Vice Pres. J. Frazier Moore until an election can be held. Moore was interim president following DeAndrade's death.

Rohan and Turner topped a field of 16 candidates nominated by union locals. Their names were the only ones on the May 27 election ballot.

Rohan was born in Haverstraw, N.Y., and attended public schools in Yonkers. He started work in a commercial printing plant in 1932 and joined the Printing Pressmen the same year.

He was named an international representative in 1951, was elected vice president in 1953 and has served as secretary-treasurer since 1961.

New Chairman Rejects NLRB Pro-Labor Tag

The new chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Edward B. Miller, told newsmen attending his swearing-in ceremony that he doesn't agree with employer charges that the NLRB has been "pro-labor."

He said he expects to get his share of criticism after he begins taking part in NLRB decisions. But Miller said he doesn't think his background as a management lawyer will affect his actions as a public official. As a lawyer, he stressed, his role was that of an advocate.

In a formal statement, Miller thanked opponents as well as supporters of his nomination.

Opposition by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who told the Senate that neither management nor labor attorneys should be named to the quasi-judicial NLRB, was "in the best traditions of our democracy," Miller said.

He noted that Meany had voiced "a clear and effectively presented statement of opposition." But, Miller stressed, "neither he nor anyone else who opposed my appointment at any time engaged in that kind of irresponsible character assassination which sometimes marks such opposition, and without which we can get along very well in this country."

Miller was named by Pres. Nixon to succeed Sam Zagoria, a liberal Republican, as a member of the NLRB and to replace Frank McCulloch, a Democrat, as board chairman. McCulloch remains on the labor board until his term expires in August. At that time, presumably, Nixon will replace him with a Republican to reverse the NLRB's present 3-2 Democratic majority.

Building Crafts To Establish Canadian Unit

Ottawa — Eighteen international construction unions operating in Canada will open a joint headquarters in Ottawa this year.

The venture was confirmed at the recent Canadian Labor Congress convention in Edmonton. It means a step toward greater autonomy for the estimated 200,000 Canadian construction workers who are members of the unions.

The office will be financed by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The proposed budget, CLC reported is $50,000 a year, including a salary of about $18,000 annually for a full-time Canadian director.

Until now, there has been no single building trades spokesman in Canada. Disputes between unions in Canada's building industry have been referred to the U.S. offices of the unions.

The Canadian department will be run as an adjunct to the CLC.

Voting Rights Victory Aids Youths, Southern Negroes

NEWLY-APPOINTED Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson meets with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the federation's headquarters. Earlier, Meany assured Hodgson of "the same cooperation" that the trade union movement gave to his predecessor, George P. Shultz, who moved into a key White House management and budget post. Hodgson's nomination as secretary was quickly approved by the Senate.

Labor-Backed Bill Clears Congress

By David L. Perlman

The 91st Congress kept faith with southern Negroes and expressed its faith in young Americans of all races.

It sent to the President—over Administration opposition—a single, labor-supported bill which:

- Renews the federal Voting Rights Act for an additional five years. The landmark 1965 law ending discriminatory registration laws, subterfuge and harassment of Negroes attempting to vote in Deep South communities would otherwise expire on Aug. 6.
- Lowers the voting age to 18 in every state, starting in 1971.
- Abolishes literacy tests as a voting requirement in all states.
- Reduces the residence requirement for voting for President to not more than 30 days. In every presidential election, millions of Americans who have moved too recently to meet local and state residence requirements lose their right to vote.

The final action came in the House, where the civil rights coalition had lobbied for weeks for the votes necessary to accept a Senate-passed bill intact, without changing even a comma.

Unless that had been done, there was a real danger that the legislation would die in a House-Senate conference committee or be talked to death in a Senate filibuster.

Pres. Nixon had asked the House to reject the 18-year-old vote, contending that the voting age could only be lowered by a constitutional amendment.

Most, but not all, House Republican leaders supported him.

The key vote, permitting the House to vote for or against the

House Vote Sidetracks Postal Pact

The House sidetracked a postal reorganization, pay and collective bargaining agreement negotiated by the White House with the AFL-CIO and seven postal unions to take up a drastically changed version drawn up by its Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, that version also was being rewritten on the House floor, with numerous amendments still to be voted on.

The first action taken by the House was to vote down, 219-139, a rule that would have allowed the negotiated agreement to be voted on intact as a substitute for the committee bill.

Then the House bowed to a scare campaign by the National Right to Work Committee and its employer supporters.

One of the few sections of the original agreement kept intact by the House committee gave postal workers and management the same

President Outlines Program:

Nixon Admits Economic Woes; Meany Calls Plan 'Educational'

Pres. Nixon admitted that the impact of inflation and unemployment on the nation's economy "is greater than we foresaw" and that it was time to "adjust our tactics" with a new government program.

The program, spelled out to the country in a nationally televised address, was keyed to the creation of a National Commission on Productivity to help secure more stable prices; setting up an "Inflationary Alert" by the Council of Economic Advisers to spotlight "significant areas of wage and price increases," establishing a special board to review federal purchasing, import and other policies.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany commented that the President's programs "may increase public education on economic issues. However, I fail to see how they will curb inflation, reduce unemployment and cut interest rates."

The President specifically said he would not use or impose wage and price controls, didn't want the authority to use them on a stand-by basis and rejected wage-price guidelines as "controls in disguise."

The AFL-CIO, in testimony prepared for the House Banking Committee before the President's speech on economic policy and productivity, had urged selective credit controls and interest-rate ceilings, a sharp look at the role of major corporations in key industries in administering price increases, and a study of specific causes of pressures on living costs, such as doctors' fees, hospital charges, housing costs and auto insurance rates.

The testimony, presented by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, sharply assailed the "guidelines" approach, declaring that calling it an "incomes policy" is "simply fraudulent . . . regardless of whether the source is a so-called liberal economics professor or a conservative government official." One-sided curbs on workers' wages are neither an incomes policy nor a balanced stabilization policy, they said. (Excerpts, Page 4.)

The federation generally endorsed legislation to give the Pres-

NLRB Shifts Stand, Takes College Units

By Eugene A. Kelly

The National Labor Relations Board set aside a 19-year-old precedent and voted to assert jurisdiction over private, non-profit universities and colleges whose employes formerly could not petition successfully for representation elections.

Exercising its discretion under the National Labor Relations Act, the board directed that a secret-ballot election be held within 30 days among a state-wide non-supervisory, non-professional unit of Cornell University employes. They will vote for or against the Civil Service Employes Association, Inc., which petitioned for the election along with the university.

The board noted in its decision that times have changed since 1951 when it refused to take jurisdiction in a Columbia University case.

College enrollment is almost double what it was then; the federal government has provided more funds for higher education, and union organization is "already a fait accompli at many universities."

"Consequently," the board said, "assertion of jurisdiction is required over those private colleges and universities whose operations have a substantial effect on com-

Cost of Living Continues Sharp Rate of Increase

Living costs in May 1970 were 6.2 percent higher than a year ago as consumer prices continued their year-long sharp rate of increase.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported a four-tenths of one percent rise in May over April, but on a seasonally adjusted basis it came to five-tenths of one percent, the same rate as the previous month.

The BLS consumer price index showed that it cost $13.46 in May for every $10 worth of typical family purchases in the 1957-59 period on which the index is based.

The price rises nearly wiped out increases in weekly earnings for workers with a $1.06 advance reduced to a gain of 39 cents after adjustment for higher prices.

About 128,000 workers covered by cost-of-living escalator clauses will receive varying wage increases based on the May report, BLS said, with 72,000 aerospace workers getting an 8-cent an hour pay hike for the past year's rise in living costs. Another 43,000 workers covered by escalator clauses will receive no further increases, BLS said, because they have reached the maximum rises provided in the contract.

Costs of all major categories making up the CPI were up in May. The largest increase was registered in transportation where a 5.3 percent hike in used car prices sent

Textile Workers Pledge Voter Registration Drive

Miami Beach—The Textile Workers Union of America closed its 16th convention here by re-electing all top officers and directing them to give top priority to political action in the 1970 elections, organizing, and improving the lot of the nation's textile industry employes.

New two-year terms were voted for Pres. William Pollock — his eighth; Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin, his second; and 20 incumbent vice presidents running in a field of 23 candidates.

Some 1,100 delegates from local unions in the U.S. and Canada recommended support for the New Democratic Party in the Dominion after hearing a report by Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress. MacDonald noted the same problems of unemployment, poverty, housing, medical care, and low wages chasing high prices as in the United States.

The convention, after hearing a strong appeal from COPE Dir. Al Barkan, voted an all-out effort to register members and their families and to seek the election of candidates who will steer the nation on a progressive course.

Delegates called on the textile industry to "enter the world of the '70s by raising wages and other benefits of textile workers to a par with those in other industries."

Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, New York City, told of the incidence of byssinosis—brown lung—among cotton mill workers. He urged amendments to workmen's compensation insurance laws so that "people whose lives have been shortened, whose lungs have been damaged, receive compensation."

The physician cited figures indicating that one mill in North Carolina was found to have 35 percent of its carding room employes affected by the disease.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) addressed the closing session of the five-day convention. He ticked off the "vital statistics" of the economic downturn, charging that the Administration "refused to heed the warning of the AFL-CIO and now the entire economy is being depressed." Other speakers included Executive Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany discussed the "unfair competition of foreign low-wage imports that are destroying American jobs at an alarming rate." The delegates voted solid support for the Mills bill, which would impose quotas on imports of all textile products not covered by international agreements.

After prolonged debate the convention condemned the invasion of Cambodia by the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese and expressed "regret" that Pres. Nixon saw fit to send troops there. It urged the President to "live up to his promise" to withdraw U.S. armed forces and advised that he call on the United Nations to seek a negotiated peace in Indo-China.

The officers reported union growth by 17,300 members since 1968 and expressed appreciation to the AFL-CIO, its Industrial Union Dept., the CLC and international unions for help in TWUA organizing efforts.

Walter Smethurst, CIO Pioneer, Dies

McAllen, Tex. — Walter Smethurst, member of the Steelworkers and aide of the late John L. Lewis in organizing the CIO, died here at 77.

Smethurst was a member of the AFL-CIO field staff in the Cleveland, O., region when he retired in 1957. He moved to McAllen the following year. Survivors include his wife, Mary Agnes; three daughters and a son.

In a 46-year career as a union organizer, he had been a member of several unions before joining the Mine Workers in Montana. He served as a member of the UMW international executive board from 1929 to 1935, as organizing director from 1933 to 1935, and as executive assistant to Lewis from 1940 to 1942.

As a CIO staff member he worked on organizing drives with the Utility Workers in Michigan and New York, with the Shoe Workers in Missouri and other states, with the former Paper Workers and other CIO unions. He joined the USWA in 1942.

Smethurst was a World War I veteran who was elected to the Montana State Legislature in 1923. In World War II he was a member of the Kansas City, Mo., regional War Labor Board.

Boosts Per Capita Payments:

CWA Gears for Bargaining With Major 'Phone Systems

By John R. Oravec

Cincinnati—The Communications Workers set their sights on negotiating key wage increases with major telephone companies in coming months and voted a 50-cents-a-month hike in per capita payments.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne set the tone of the union's 32nd annual convention as he said: "We are serving notice on the communications industry today that the CWA will be bargaining for wage and benefits increases that will make the largest package ever won before look like small potatoes."

Beirne told the 1,500 delegates that wages must catch up with inflation-fed runaway prices which are eroding workers' paychecks of gains negotiated in recent years.

"Our wages are way out of line with what has happened in our economy," Beirne stressed, "and we intend to make some big changes in our upcoming negotiations."

The union is already negotiating with the General Telephone system and will be opening contract talks with the Bell system in a few months.

Citing the recommendations of the union's Bell system bargaining council, Beirne said that "the hardships endured by members are the result of exorbitant excesses of profit makers" and "will be fully balanced during our next negotiations."

"Twenty or 25 cents an hour will not do it," he said, adding: "That's small potatoes."

The delegates roared their approval when he declared: "A three-year committed contract on wages is out the window."

The current three-year CWA contract with Bell expires in 1971. The pattern of progress will be carried through for all CWA members, Beirne pledged. The union membership topped 408,000 at the end of May.

On the Southeast Asia war, Beirne said that the President is working earnestly to bring back American forces and to secure a just peace in South Viet Nam.

"Without a doubt," Beirne observed, "a part of our tension is the result of the long drawn out war in Southeast Asia." And although all Americans wish that the war would be over, the United States cannot ignore its responsibility to the free world, Beirne said.

"We can't run away from our conscience," he declared. "And in our conscience we are aware of the promises and assurances made to the people of the free world who may be threatened by Communist aggression."

Changes Proposed

On internal affairs of the union, Beirne noted that the executive board has called for a restructuring of the CWA upper echelon of leadership following a study by an outside consulting firm.

The restructuring would shift greater responsibility to the union's executive vice presidents and executive board with the aim of providing improved services to CWA districts and locals.

The board also cited a need for a continued program of internal organizing to fully realize the union's growth potential by enrolling the thousands of nonmembers included in the more than a half-million workers the CWA represents.

To meet the financial obligations of both internal and external organizing and for other key CWA programs, Sec.-Treas. Glenn E. Watts called on delegates to approve an increase in per capita payments of members from $2.50 to $3 a month, a recommendation based on the findings of the union's finance committee.

Delegates voted to accept the committee's report in full after a number of amendments were defeated and a lengthy floor debate on raising of the dues.

The action authorizes the CWA to divert 50 cents from the union's defense fund to the general fund budget from July 1 until per capita payments are raised 50 cents next Jan. 1.

Watts suggested the 50-cent increase in per capita payments should be considered a stop-gap solution until a plan can be developed to collect dues on the basis of a percentage of wages.

Called Fairest Plan

Although he noted that an ad hoc committee of local presidents did not show much support for the percentage dues plan, Watts went on record to back the plan "as the most fair and equitable method of establishing dues and the best practical way to provide for the future financial soundness of the union."

Astronaut John L. Swigert, a crew member of the Apollo 13 mission, addressed the convention to thank workers of the communications industry for their efforts during the ill-fated flight to the moon. Swigert showed a film clip on the Apollo mission and presented Beirne a citation for the CWA's support of America's manned space program.

Returning to problems on earth, the convention adopted a resolution expressing concern for the nation's ecology and the need to halt pollution. It called for continued participation of members in efforts to improve the environment and for the establishment of a CWA "Environment Day" program which will be observed by the union's locals across the country.

Domestic problems explored by Beirne in his keynote address centered on unchecked inflation and rising unemployment rates.

"We are in a serious recession," he stressed, and "we are in danger of heading toward a real depression."

He said American standards are being threatened because of the Nixon Administration's handling of the national economy and charged that the unemployment situation facing the country is unnecessary. "Furthermore," he added, "it is illegal under the Employment Act of 1946."

"We can't very well talk about law and order as it applies to certain matters and find the federal government violating its own law which was designed to bring order in the field of employment," Beirne declared.

He also noted that while unemployment climbs and inflation is rising at a 6 percent annual rate, the nation's housing industry is at a standstill.

Beirne called on Pres. Nixon to take affirmative steps to ease domestic tensions and to quell extremism, including an effort to bring more responsible leadership within the Administration. "We do not need the harshly worded and provocative diatribes of Spiro," he declared, referring to certain speeches by Vice Pres. Agnew.

"There is too much noise in America already," Beirne added. "We can easily do without the emotional hate phrases."

General Electric Unions Convey Thanks for Aid

The gratitude of General Electric Workers for the aid they received in the long GE strike was formally expressed in a letter to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany from the presidents of unions making up the Coordinated Bargaining Committee. The text:

On behalf of the 147,000 members of the 11 AFL-CIO unions involved in the 1969-70 strike against General Electric, we wish to express to all members of the AFL-CIO our profound and permanent gratitude for the unprecedented trade union support that helped insure victory.

Please convey our thanks to all of our brothers and sisters who adopted our fight as their own. They freely contributed more money than has ever before been given to such a cause. They devoted countless hours to help make the AFL-CIO's first national boycott an outstanding success. They carried our story to the public in communities across the land.

It was a convincing demonstration of the solidarity of the American labor movement.

In the GE struggle, we believe, a new standard of unity and brotherhood was forged on which our unions and the entire trade union movement can build in the years ahead.

Fraternally,

Paul Jennings, president, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.
Charles H. Pillard, president, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.
I. W. Abel, president, Steelworkers.
M. A. Hutcheson, president, Carpenters.
William E. Fredenberger, president, Firemen & Oilers.
James Woodside, president, Technical Engineers.
Floyd E. Smith, president, Machinists.
Peter T. Schoemann, president, United Association of the Plumbing & Pipe Fitting Industry.
Edward F. Carlough, president, Sheet Metal Workers.
George M. Parker, president, Flint Glass Workers.
Gilbert Jewell, president, Allied Industrial Workers.

Counterfeit Tapes, Recordings:

AFM Urges Drive On Piracy of Music

Houston—The Musicians called for international cooperation to halt the "pirating" of musical recordings as the 73rd annual AFM convention opened here. Delegates also voted to establish a new strike fund for members of symphony and opera orchestras.

Expressing concern for the "untold millions" of dollars lost by professional musicians and the recording industry because of "pirated" records and tapes, AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin reported that nearly $250 million worth of the counterfeit works were marketed last year.

He noted that the AFM has petitioned the State Dept. to urge a universal copyright convention to have recordings protected under international law.

Kenin said that the proliferation of fraudulent recordings is a worldwide problem. While more than $236 million in counterfeit tapes and records were known to be sold last year, sales of millions of dollars more went undetected, he added.

Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), speaking at the convention, urged passage of a congressional amendment to revise copyright laws so performing musicians could receive royalties on the same basis as those enjoyed currently by authors and composers. The bill is sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Despite the losses to counterfeiters, recording musicians will receive almost $500,000 more this year from the union's special payment fund than was distributed last year. Kenin said the AFM will send out checks on Sept. 1 totalling $5,290.000, a 10 percent increase over last year's payments.

The new strike fund for symphony and opera musicians was approved by the 1.000 delegates on the recommendation of the union's executive board.

The fund will be set up with a $250 000 loan from the international and will be built into a budget of not less than $500,000 a season. Participating musicians will pay $1 a week into the fund over a 35-week season.

Five trustees, including Kenin and Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard, will administer the fund, which is expected to be operational after Sept. 15.

Increased federal aid to symphony orchestras was urged by Sen. Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) as he spoke to the convention through an electrical hookup from Washington. He said that federal funds currently represent only 3.5 percent of orchestra budgets. "It ought to be 10 percent," Javits declared.

He also noted that operating costs of symphonies will soon rise by 20 percent even though musicians are still underpaid.

In his keynote address, Kenin went on to score the inequities in the national cultural exchange program, stressing that "we welcome interchange with foreign artists, but we must insist at all levels of government that their employment on these shores is not used to weaken existing standards."

He said that undercutting of wages by foreign musicians is sorely affecting America's symphony orchestras, "whose problems are severe enough already."

Kenin presented a lifetime honorary membership card to Richard Gibson, who as a patron of the arts has spent more than $200,000 to support jazz music. Gibson is currently sponsoring "The World's Greatest Jazz Band," which came to Houston to entertain the delegates.

The convention also was entertained by the Rennie Drumm Youth Band of West Springfield, Mass. The group is made up of young people ranging in age from 8 to 18.

The delegates re-elected Kenin and Ballard by acclamation to new one-year terms. Also re-elected were Vice President Hal C. Davis of Pittsburgh and J. Alan Wood of Toronto, Ont. Elections for members of the AFM executive committee were scheduled for later in the convention.

A NET GAIN in membership of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union was reported at the 11th convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. Delegates re-elected Pres. Max Greenberg, shown speaking, for his fifth term, and returned Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps to the post he has held since 1948. The convention raised the dues structure and chose seven new board members.

UTU, Illinois Central Form Joint Commission

The United Transportation Union and the Illinois Central Railroad have created a joint commission aimed at achieving more business for the carrier and greater benefits for its employes.

The potential significance of the agreement was underscored at a press conference and luncheon by UTU Pres. Charles Luna, IC's Chairman W. B. Johnson and Pres. Alan S. Boyd and Transportation Sec. John A. Volpe.

Luna said that the new Commission on Joint Opportunity for Better Service (JOBS) represents a "triumph for collective bargaining" that recognizes the mutual interest of workers and their employers in helping a railroad to prosper.

"We hope," he said, "that we have now shown the way to adapt this industry to 20th Century needs, and to prepare itself for the greater changes which are coming as this century closes."

The commission, which will link new service programs to additional compensation for workers, will operate for 18 months. The presidents of the UTU and the IC will then review its results to determine if it should be continued on a permanent basis.

The commission will consist of four carrier and four union members. Named by Luna to represent the UTU are Quentin C. Gabriel, a union vice president, and M. S. Stuckey, B. E. Hudson and Walter Canty, general chairmen on the railroad.

Tied to the agreement for the commission is settlement of a long dispute between the union and the IC on train crew sizes. There are provisions for continuing that settlement even if the commission is dropped.

Russell H. Olson, IBEW Aide, Dies

Russell H. Olson, assistant to Pres. Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, died at 53 of injuries suffered in a tree-pruning accident in the yard of his home in Wheaton, Md. He was buried June 17 in Parklawn Cemetery, Rockville, Md.

A native of Chicago, Olson formerly was president and business manager of IBEW Local 1359. He was named to the organizing staff in 1952 and came to Washington in 1957 as presidential assistant. Survivors include his wife, Lorraine, and three children.

House Vote Sidetracks Postal Pact

right unions and employers have under the Taft-Hartley Act—to negotiate for a union shop except in states that prohibit it through so-called "right-to-work" laws.

By a non-record vote of 179-95, the House inserted language proposed by Rep. David N. Henderson (D-N.C.) prohibiting a union shop agreement after the postal service becomes an autonomous organization conducting its own labor-management relations.

Although the White House and the Post Office Dept., as well as the unions, supported authority for union shop negotiations, Republicans joined with southern Democrats in voting it out of the bill.

One of the few northern Democrats to join in imposing an open shop on the new postal service was Rep. Edith Green of Oregon. Her argument was that it would unbalance bargaining by making postal unions too strong.

As the House took up the bill, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reiterated the federation's commitment to the agreement negotiated in good faith with the Administration in the aftermath of the wave of spontaneous strikes that hit the postal service early this spring.

The agreement included a 6 percent retroactive raise for all government workers — which has already been enacted—an additional 8 percent raise for postal workers effective when the reorganization bill becomes law, a negotiated reduction of the time needed to go from the starting salary to the top of the pay scale from 21 to eight years, and national collective bargaining covering wages, hours, working conditions "and in general, all matters that are subject to collective bargaining in the private sector." In place of the right to strike, various disputes-settling provisions were included, with binding arbitration as a final step.

The House committee bill gutted the concept of national bargaining, inserted a mandate for area wage differentials and rewrote other major provisions of the agreement. As a "sweetener," the committee proposed to make the pay raise retroactive.

At one stage in the disjointed House debate, Rep. James C. Wright, Jr. (D-Tex.) proposed to ditch the entire reorganization bill and replace it with a two-part substitute—giving postal employes an 8 percent raise and firing automatically any postal worker who ever goes on strike. But that was beaten on a 105-57 vote.

Meanwhile, the Senate Post Office Committee has approved its own version of the legislation—one that comes substantially closer to the original negotiated agreement.

ILO Worker Delegates Push Training Subsidy

Worker delegates are putting up a strong fight at the International Labor Organization's annual conference to assure the success of the ILO's advanced training center in the Italian industrial city of Turin.

Established in 1965, the center has so far been unable to recruit enough vocational and technical instructors from the poorer countries for maximum effectiveness because of a shortage of funds.

With governments failing to make the voluntary financial contributions to enable the training program to operate successfully, the workers are calling for a special ILO subsidy of $700,000 for the Turin center.

"The position of the center would be completely untenable if this proposal is not supported," Cyril Plant of Britain's Trades Union Congress told the conference of worker, employer and government delegates from most of the ILO's 121 member states.

Rudolph Faupl, U. S. worker delegate, recalled that a 28-nation survey had clearly demonstrated the "tremendous need" for the type of advanced training offered by the center.

The workers' group, Faupl continued, believes it is the ILO's responsibility to "find the ways and means and the resources so that the center may operate effectively and efficiently."

Gabriel Fogam of the Cameroon Trade Union Congress, in a moving appeal to the conference, declared that "we in the developing countries need this center."

"If you really want to help us," Fogam added, "you should do so not by mere paper resolutions but by supporting this budget."

While a number of employer delegates, including Edwin P. Neilan of the United States, endorsed the subsidy proposal, it is running into opposition from economy-minded governments.

George H. Hildebrand, U. S. deputy under secretary of labor, assured that Washington recognized the center's value even if it opposed the proposed subsidy.

The issue was left in abeyance while the conference welcomed a one-time ILO worker delegate who is now President of India.

On the eve of an official state visit to Switzerland, Varahagiri V. Giri reminded the delegates that it was as spokesman for India's workers that he attended the 1927 session of the conference to propose the holding of ILO regional meetings.

Giri, former head of the All-India Trade Union Congress, said it was "significant" that the ILO had survived World War II while the League of Nations and other agencies either withered away or collapsed.

The ILO's vitality, he said, is "mainly due to its tripartite character — the democratic arrangement of having employers, workers and the representatives of government sitting at a common table."

In a dignified rebuttal to attacks on his country by Arab and Communist delegates, Aharon Becker, the Israeli worker representative, appealed to Arab workers "to meet and sit down with us in our common interest, which is the betterment of life in our region."

"Let us work together for the advancement of our region," Becker urged. "Any economic and social progress of the working people will bring peace in our area nearer," he said.

"I believe that our organization can do a great deal," he continued, "and that through our efforts to implement basic goals we shall all make our best contribution to the cause of peace."

NLRB Cases Up 8 Percent Over Year Ago

The National Labor Relations Board reported an eight percent increase in new business for the first three months of the calendar year. The increase included a new record for the quarter in the number of unfair labor practice charges filed —5,088.

New cases of all types totaled 8,442 for the January-March period. A year ago the number was 7,753.

There was an 11 percent increase in charges against employers, unions or both alleging unfair practices under the law.

Petitions for secret ballot elections rose from 3,162 for the year-ago quarter to 3,354.

The report noted "the NLRB does not initiate cases. It processes charges and petitions brought before it." It added these details:

The NLRB general counsel set 511 cases for trial or hearing in the first three months of 1970 against 453 a year ago. Trial examiners conducted 260 hearings. Board members issued formal decisions in 168 unfair practice cases after review.

The board conducted 1,664 representation elections in which 84 percent of eligible employes voted. AFL-CIO unions won a majority in 525 of the 1,018 elections in which they were on the ballot. Unaffiliated unions won 406 of 747.

Economic Gamesmanship

THE PRESENT COURSE of economic trends spells a continuing rise of unemployment and declining buying power for millions of workers in the coming months as weekly working hours are cut and rapidly rising consumer prices erode the value of shrinking paychecks and retiree pensions.

There is a danger that this deterioration may begin to feed on itself. The decline in the real volume of business sales can create widespread inventory reductions, with cancellations of orders for goods, further production cutbacks and additional layoffs.

The Administration is not only permitting this downward drift to continue—holding to the "game-plan," as Administration spokesmen playfully call their disastrous policies—but also shows no signs whatsoever that it is prepared to rapidly return the economy to high employment when the present recession is over.

The Administration's "game-plan," therefore, involves continuing high unemployment through both 1970 and 1971. And since this "game-plan" has failed to predict the seriousness of the present deterioration, there can be no confidence at all in the prediction that the economy will somehow achieve high employment even two long years from now.

The dangers to the national economy and the welfare of the American people from the Administration's economic policies include not merely a deepening recession that may get considerably worse, but also the threat of economic stagnation and widespread unemployment after the recession runs its course.

BOTH AMERICAN and foreign experience have proven that the guideline approach is inequitable and unworkable. It would place guideline curbs on workers and trade unions as we experienced in the early 1960s. But there would be no effective guideline on prices and no guideline at all on profits—as we also know from the experience of the early 1960s.

A guideline approach would attempt to place a one-sided pressure on wage and salary earners. Without effective curbs on prices, profits, dividends and executive compensation, however, there is no rational basis for expecting workers to accept restraints on their wages and salaries.

Talk of a guideline approach as an "incomes policy" is simply fraudulent. American workers are too intelligent to believe such fakery—regardless of whether the source is a so-called liberal economics professor or a conservative government official. One-sided curbs on workers' wages—with no effective restraints on prices or the incomes of other groups in the economy—are neither an "incomes policy" nor a balanced and equitable stabilization policy.

THE TIME is long overdue for an effective and equitable policy to stabilize the American economy and restore it to full employment. In addition to stabilization measures, America needs expansionary economic policies to achieve and sustain full employment. Moreover, the needed rise in output will, in itself, reduce inflationary pressures by boosting productivity and slowing the rise of unit costs.

The government's monetary and fiscal squeeze on the economy must be replaced by expansionary measures. An expanding supply of money, at reasonable interest rates, is essential. Equally essential for the balanced growth of the economy is an expansionary fiscal policy—the full funding of federal appropriations for such socially vital needs as housing, community facilities, education and health care and adoption of a large-scale public-service employment program for the hard-core unemployed and seriously underemployed.

A Word Edgewise:

NATO Nations Cool to U.S. On Commitment to Aid Israel

By John P. Roche

LOOKING BACK over the various discussions with Europeans and knowledgeable Americans these past weeks, I find one theme that intruded time and again. Some spoke of it with dismay; others quite coldly in the tradition of "realpolitik." The gist was that for NATO the American commitment (the word used, even though we have no formal alliance) to Israel was far more disturbing to the European powers than our activities in Southeast Asia.

There are a number of reasons for this. First, of course, is the realization that a real, full-fledged war between the U.S. and the Soviet Union could flare up in the Middle East.

Unlike the situation in Southeast Asia, the Russians have put their own power and status directly on the line in Egypt and have beefed up their naval operations in the Mediterranean since 1967. They have set out to strangle Israel and, if it came to a crunch, only American power could possibly preserve the Jewish state.

Such a conflict would, in European eyes, inevitably spill over into the NATO jurisdiction. That is, in blunt terms, Europeans might get killed. Understandably, nobody is particularly happy about that prospect so imaginative minds have gone to work demonstrating that American policy is provocative, risky, even immoral.

As usual, high theory is buttressed by concrete interest: the Western European economy floats on Arab oil.

This is, unfortunately, a familiar pattern. Since no one expects the Soviets to pay the slightest attention to complaints about Russian policy, the objective—if one is to head off a possible war—must be to deter the United States from covering Moscow's bet. Ironically, great hopes are placed on the U.S. Senate. One leftwing Italian intellectual (a "Chinese" as they are known in Italy) neatly inverted the usual American anti-war argument: "Cambodia in itself," he said, "is trivial, but it can serve the progressive forces in America as the pretext for keeping Nixon from supporting Israeli imperialism."

The knowledge that denouncing Moscow is futile has another interesting, if depressing, consequence. Reasons have to be found why Israel is at least as guilty as the Arabs of generating tension. Once this has been done, one can clear his conscience—"a plague on both your houses"—and go out for a drink.

Again, this is a familiar human response. In the anti-war movement back in 1940-41, we used to spend an inordinate amount of time talking about British "imperialism," suggesting that, properly understood, World War II was a private fight among imperialist gangsters. It helps explain why the present anti-war movement in the U.S. spends so much time on the Thieu-Ky government and so little on Hanoi.

THE ISRAELI GOVERNMENT is now on the receiving end of this treatment. The "hard-liners in Jerusalem," "the hawks," are constantly accused of standing in the way of a sensible negotiated settlement.

At the Rome meeting of the Atlantic Alliance, Sec. of State William Rogers was allegedly urged by his peers (with the exception of the Italian foreign minister) to refuse the Israeli request for more Phantoms. The rationale for this was that the "hawks" in Jerusalem must be forced to take a more reasonable attitude toward negotiations.

Israel lives in the shadow of the gallows, which, as Dr. Johnson put it, concentrates a man's mind wonderfully. And the memory of the death camps tends to generate "hard-liners" who meditate more on the lesson of Biafra than on the potency of "great power solutions." But to European statesmen, obsessed with avoiding a confrontation with the USSR, this is little more than megalomania. Admittedly their position reflects a fundamentally isolationist public attitude—"I-don't-give-a-damnism" is a rough translation of both the French and Italian vernacular ideology.

In practical terms, then, the United States is on its own in the Middle East as it is, so far as NATO is concerned, in Southeast Asia.

The Israelis know this and it is hardly surprising that they view current efforts to cripple the power of the U.S. President as a direct threat to their survival. If the President cannot react instantly (as Lyndon Johnson did on June 10, 1967), Israel could be destroyed before Sen. Fulbright finished hearings on a "Declaration of War."

Shultz Views Peaceful Strikes As Essential Form of Protest

The following is excerpted from remarks by Labor Sec. George P. Shultz at the National Press Club two days before Pres. Nixon named him to head the top-level Office of Management & Budget in a major reorganization of the Administration.

ASSUMING THIS IS a typical working day, there are more than 300 strikes or lockouts in effect throughout the United States. Almost all of them would be reported on, or at least mentioned, in local newspapers. A few would receive national attention, most would be small, but about 30 or more would involve upwards of about 1,000 workers each.

A far greater number of contracts, on the order of 25 to 1, would be in the process of peaceful negotiations. For every 30 to 40 workers losing the day's work because of strikes, some 10,000 would be working. Put it another way. Let's take a measure such as man-days idle because of strikes and express that as a proportion of total man-days worked. You get a very low number of .20 for the first four months of 1970, identical with the corresponding period of 1969, and lower than the .28 in 1968—and this despite the special stresses this year on collective bargaining and the heavy bargaining calendar.

So a great many people must be settling their problems peacefully. I might just point out in passing, much more time is lost through on-the-job accidents—about 10 times as much. I am aware that labor-management peace seldom makes a sexy story, but I bring out these points just to register with you the fact that on the whole, collective bargaining does work out settlements peacefully.

I recognize that there are strikes and strikes, and man-days lost in proportion to total worked are only one index. Not all strikes are of equal importance. Some cause more damage than others. There is also the problem of emergencies created by strikes, and the problem of public employment strikes which should be dealt with separately from my comments here about industrial strikes in general.

LET ME MAKE another point about perspective. I would argue that we cannot allow labor peace to become the overriding objective in our collective bargaining. Any company that says, "we will just not have a strike, no matter what," they have had it. And a union that says, "we will not hit the bricks, no matter what," they have had it.

The late Sumner Slichter, who I am sure many of you remember, used to say in situations like we have today that one of the problems in the American economy is that we don't have enough strikes. Here we are trying to get the economy turned around somewhat, get the inflation out of our system, and get ourselves back on a path of strong and stable economic growth. We know that is a period of hard transition. And we know what happens if there are not some companies willing to take strong positions at the bargaining table. Union leaders cannot take the position that their members should not be asking for high wage increases. That's got to come from management, and if there are no people who take that position, we will never be able to solve these problems.

The strike, if it is conducted properly, is an orderly form of protest. I don't want to be classified as pro-strike by any means. People on both sides get hurt, some badly, when strikes occur, and I am not for that.

On the other hand, what form would you have orderly protest take? There are not very many ways to set wages and working conditions. Sometimes the employer unilaterally sets them and makes the system work, but he has to be alert to the pressures of the labor market and the needs of his employes or his system won't work very long. The vast majority of wage rates in this country are set in this manner. Some people think the government should determine wages and working conditions, but that would not work long either in a free country, except in time of extreme peril.

That leaves the employer and the employes to determine wages and working conditions together through a process of collective rather than individual bargaining. Collective bargaining now covers about 19 million of the 81 million people in our labor force. This method provides the most drama in dealing with the universal problem of resolving diversities of interest—among employes as well as between employes and the employer.

That diversity sometimes becomes conflict, and conflict sometimes takes the form of a strike or lockout.

Beyond the industrial world, violent protest is so common and general today as to make the average industrial strike look like a placid form of life. The world desperately needs orderly forms of protest, nationally and internationally.

Ideally, of course, there would be no need of protest anywhere; then comes the millenium.

But granting the existence of discontent and dissatisfaction in a normal world, these human feelings will seek expression in one form or another.

In an unorganized plant, or even in an organized plant, you will have "quits," and the quit rate can be correlated with dissatisfaction or protest.

But when your best people quit in a tight labor market you know there is something wrong with you. That's a form of protest and sometimes you wake up to it later than you wish.

Strikes can purge resentments, which is good for all, and may after a while make workers feel how well off they are. The strike is certainly educational for both sides. They learn about each other because they are paying attention to what the other fellow is saying.

So, while I'm not saying the strike is desirable, the peaceful strike is probably one of the least worst forms of protest we have.

Clothing Union Charges:

Lower Costs of Imports Seen Aiding Stores, Not Consumers

CLAIMS THAT imports guarantee lower prices for high quality clothing are false and "immoral," a vice president of the Clothing Workers charged.

Although foreign-made articles involve labor costs far below U.S. levels, retailers most often take higher profit margins, rather than pass the savings on to American buyers, said Murray Finley, on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference. Finley, who is also manager of the ACWA's Chicago Joint Board, said that heavy imports have cost some 1,000 workers their apparel and textile industry jobs in that area in the past year.

Finley pointed out that most of the 2.5 million jobs in this nation's textile and apparel industries are "semi-skilled, relatively easy to learn and earn a decent wage." Displaced workers find it particularly difficult to find new employment, he added. The AFL-CIO public affairs program is broadcast Tuesdays at 9:35 p.m. EDT on the Mutual radio network.

The union official said the refusal of four Chicago newspapers to publish the union's advertisements on the issue blocked efforts to "inform customers of various stores carrying the imported men's clothing" so they could "decide whether or not they wanted to buy such items." He said the union's lawsuit growing out of that incident is now before the U.S. Court of Appeals.

FINLEY STRESSED that imports of some clothing articles had grown as much as 200 per cent in the last year, with much of the increase coming from Taiwan and Korea, where wages are as low as 7 cents an hour. He said that American workers are being forced to bear the full burden of that competition.

Calling for regulation of wool and synthetic imports by international agreement or by law, he said the union is "willing to let imports grow" as the population and markets increase, "but we don't want them to grow at the worker's expense."

Reporters questioning Finley were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

DON'T DOWNGRADE the role of the blue collar worker in American industrial life. He and his job will be around for a long time.

This is the clear conclusion that can be drawn from a huge report by the U. S. Labor Dept., the 1970-71 edition of the Occupational Outlook Handbook.

The handbook, which covers some 859 pages, concedes that white collar employment is steadily increasing, but it nevertheless has a 218-page section dealing with "skilled and other manual occupations."

There are now 27.5 million blue collar workers in the United States and the prospect is that their numbers will increase and not decrease over the next 10 years. While technological progress is causing major changes in the job make-up in the United States through automation and other devices, the handbook concludes:

"Nonetheless, the number of skilled and semiskilled workers is expected to continue to increase through the 1970s despite this rapid mechanization and automation of production processes. It is expected that our increasingly complex technology generally will require higher levels of skill to operate and service this machinery and related equipment."

The number of blue collar workers has dropped slightly in proportion to total employment, yet during the past 10 years blue collar jobs increased by more than 4 million with the number of unskilled workers dropping slightly.

What has become obvious is that within the blue collar category more and more training and education will become necessary.

BREAKING DOWN the blue collar category, the handbook reports that skilled craftsmen numbered 10 million during 1968 when the study was made. Of these, almost 900,000 were carpenters, followed by automotive mechanics who numbered 825,000.

Chances for jobs for skilled workers are high, since some 200,000 workers are needed annually merely to replace those who retire or die. "Young men who acquire a good basic education (including courses in mathematics and the sciences) as well as through job training, will be better able to compete for higher paying skilled jobs than applicants without this training," the handbook says.

Semiskilled workers make up the largest occupational group in the American labor force. In 1968 there were 14 million such workers, representing almost one out of five workers in the country. Of these, 8.9 million were employed in manufacturing industries, making clothing, automobiles, parts, textiles, machinery and electrical equipment.

Women numbered about 4 million in the semiskilled area, including 80 percent of all workers in the apparel industry.

"The broad field of semiskilled jobs will provide hundreds of thousands of employment opportunities for young people in the years ahead," the handbook predicted. It estimated that more than 300,000 such workers will be needed each year simply to replace those who retire or die.

The handbook said that unskilled jobs—now about 3.5 million—will continue to drop because of the growth of mechanized equipment replacing hand labor. It noted that power-driven machinery is now doing much of the work that used to be done by hand. It nevertheless predicted that industrial expansion probably would create a need for unskilled laborers "which will about offset the jobs lost to labor-saving mechanical equipment."

While the blue collar worker is with us and will be with us for a long time to come, more education and training will become increasingly necessary for him to get and hold jobs.

All in all, the American blue collar worker is marching ahead in the fields of education and training as the demands for higher skills grow greater daily to meet the challenges of greater mechanization and automation.

The artificial distinction between the blue collar and the white collar job grows less each year.

HIGHER PROFITS for retailers, rather than lower prices for consumers, most often result from U.S. sales of imported clothing produced at wages as low as 7 cents an hour, Clothing Workers Vice Pres. Murray Finley, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 9:35 p.m., EDT, on Mutual radio.

NEW PRESIDENTS recently chosen by their unions are, top, left to right, Alexander J. Rohan of the Printing Pressmen and Fred Fulford of the Furniture Workers; bottom, William R. Munger of the Utility Workers and Gilbert Jewell of the Allied Industrial Workers. Rohan and Munger were elevated to succeed presidents who died in office; the other two fill vacancies caused by retirements.

Negro Engineer Elected As Mayor of Newark

The political spotlight focused on New Jersey's biggest city as a 38-year-old Negro civil engineer, Kenneth A. Gibson, was elected mayor of Newark by a decisive margin.

Race and corruption were the twin issues in the bitter campaign which threatened to polarize the city along black-white lines.

But when the votes were tallied, ballots from a number of white neighborhoods helped add up to a 54,892 to 43,339 margin for Gibson over two-term Mayor Hugh J. Addonizio.

Addonizio's progressive image in past elections had been marred by federal indictment on corruption charges, and his trial at Trenton began two weeks before the election.

Although Newark's shifting racial pattern — with an estimated black majority in population—provided the backbone for Gibson's vote, he failed to carry with him a four-man slate for at-large election to the City Council.

Elsewhere, political news was being made by senatorial candidates.

In Minnesota, former Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey made his expected declaration of candidacy for the Democratic nomination for the Senate.

Humphrey represented Minnesota in the Senate from 1948 until 1964, serving as majority leader his last four years. The seat he is seeking has been held by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, who is not seeking renomination.

Humphrey is expected to be nominated at Minnesota's Democratic - Farmer - Labor Party convention opening June 24. He will face a heavily-financed Republican opponent, Rep. Clark MacGregor.

In Maine, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie was unopposed in the Democratic primary for a third term and is heavily favored over the surprise winner of the GOP primary, a 66-year-old extremely conservative former state senator, Neil S. Bishop.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy had no opposition in the Massachusetts Democratic state endorsement convention and is rated a heavy favorite over anyone the Republicans might nominate in the Sept. 15 primary.

At Indiana's Democratic convention, Sen. Vance Hartke was renominated unopposed for a third term and will face Republican Richard L. Roudebush, a conservative five-term congressman in November.

The news from Connecticut was that Sen. Thomas J. Dodd will not seek renomination at the Democratic state convention on June 26. But the 63-year-old senator, who was censured by the Senate in 1967 for misuse of political funds, left the door open for a possible decision to run as an independent.

Breaks Long Deadlock:

House Committee Approves Labor-Backed Job Safety Bill

The House Labor Committee broke a long deadlock over occupational health and safety legislation and approved a bill that carried the AFL-CIO's strong endorsement.

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), would give the Secretary of Labor broad powers to set job safety and health standards—and strong powers to enforce them.

In voting that closely followed party lines, the Daniels bill was approved on a 21-13 vote. Earlier, a Republican substitute bill backed by the Administration was rejected, 19-15.

The substitute would have given standards-setting authority to a presidential board and established an elaborate occupational safety and health court system for enforcement.

All Republicans and a lone Democrat, Rep. William D. Hathaway of Maine, voted for the weaker bill. When it was defeated, Hathaway and Rep. Alphonzo Bell (R-Calif.) joined in supporting the Daniels bill.

Job safety and health legislation had initially been proposed by Pres. Johnson, but bitter opposition from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other employer groups blocked congressional action.

With health and safety emerging as major national concerns, the Nixon Administration sought to draw up a bill that would be acceptable to employers who had complained that the Democratic-supported legislation would give the Secretary of Labor too much power.

Attempts to work out a compromise within the House Labor Committee proved unsuccessful, but for several weeks in a row committee approval of the Daniels bill was blocked by lack of a quorum. Republicans stayed away deliberately and absenteeism by some Democrats left the committee without a majority necessary to do business.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter urging all committee members to be present for a vote on the legislation, said the Daniels bill "has the wholehearted endorsement of all segments of organized labor."

Daniels said he will ask the House Rules Committee for an early hearing on the committee-approved bill, so that it can be scheduled for a House vote.

The legislation, he stressed, "is urgently needed to end the yearly slaughter of 14,500 American working men and women and the disabling of another 2.2 million persons."

The AFL-CIO also called for action on two other bills pending in the House.

Biemiller urged a House Commerce subcommittee to support a Senate-passed bill aimed at limiting campaign spending for television time and at the same time providing candidates and parties with a public forum.

Rising campaign costs, especially for television, threaten to limit candidates for federal office to "the very wealthy or well-financed," Biemiller warned.

The Senate bill repeals the "equal time" law which prevented networks from giving free time to major presidential candidates because of the obligation to provide equal time for every obscure, minor candidate.

It bars candidates for federal office from spending more than seven cents per voter or $20,000, whichever is larger, for radio and television expenditures. At the same time, it requires stations and networks to sell time to candidates at their lowest commercial rate for that time period.

Biemiller wrote Subcommittee Chairman Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.) that the legislation would be "a major contribution toward upholding the democratic ideal that public office go to the best man, regardless of his personal fortune."

In another area, the AFL-CIO reiterated its support of legislation to establish a "bank of last resort" to provide housing mortgage funds at reasonable interest rates. Part of the bank's funds would come from compulsory investment of a small portion of tax-exempt pension and foundation assets.

House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) had sought to include such a housing development bank in the pending Emergency Home Finance legislation, but he was outvoted in committee. He has said he will seek to amend the bill when it reaches the House floor to restore the provision.

Biemiller wrote all House members urging support for Patman's motion when the bill comes to the floor. He said it would benefit "every community in the nation where housing funds have been non-existent or available only at exorbitant interest rates."

NLRB Reverses Stand To Take College Units

merce to insure the orderly, effective and uniform application" of the nation's labor policies.

Petitions for elections in three units smaller than statewide were dismissed in favor of an election in one overall unit.

In another case, the board dismissed a petition that it take jurisdiction over workers at Syracuse University who voted for Service Employes Local 200 recently in an election conducted by the New York State Labor Relations Board.

The decision related that at a hearing, Syracuse and Local 200 "virtually stipulated to the appropriateness of the unit and were engaged at the time in collective bargaining." It said both parties "have urged the board to honor the state certification" of the union.

The ruling by all board members except new Chairman Edward B. Miller, who did not participate, said "it is well established that the board will recognize the validity of state-conducted elections . . . where the procedure was free of irregularities and reflected the true desires of the employes." That was the case at Syracuse, the board said in dismissing the university's petition.

The SEIU presented a brief on behalf of its Syracuse local. It said the decision could set a precedent of "considerable importance" for many unions.

An NLRB statement said the decision in the Cornell case does not mean the board will take jurisdiction over every non-profit private educational institution. Appropriate standards will be set in later cases, it said.

Before the decision was issued, briefs supporting the board's right to take jurisdiction were filed by the AFL-CIO, the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., and 13 universities and colleges. The New York State Labor Relations Board and several universities and associations opposed assertion of jurisdiction.

Earlier the board voted to take jurisdiction over a nonprofit nursing home in line with a U.S. District Court finding that the NLRB may not refuse to assert its jurisdiction over an entire class of employers having a substantial impact on commerce. The board ordered an election by July 7 at Drexel Home, Inc., in Chicago. Workers may vote for the Service Employes Local 73; State, County & Municipal Employes Council 19, a private association, or no union.

Ruling on Status of Retirees Seen Heading for Supreme Court Review

The U.S. Supreme Court will be strongly urged by unions to overturn a circuit court ruling that retired workers are not employes for bargaining purposes and that an employer is not required to bargain improvements in their benefits.

The finding that retired workers are not employes within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley Act came in a decision by the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals reversing a ruling by the National Labor Relations Board.

The board had held that retirees remained employes for the purpose of bargaining about changes in benefits; that bargaining about such changes as pensions and medical benefits is mandatory because active workers have an interest in them.

The AFL-CIO and a number of its affiliates had filed briefs with the NLRB urging it to support the position that retired workers' benefits can be bargained for after a trial examiner had held that workers on pension no longer came under the labor law's definition of an employe.

The case involved the Pittsburgh Glass Company's Chemical Division and Local 1, Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers, and the action by the company in unilaterally adjusting the financing of medical benefits for retirees without bargaining about the matter with the union.

The NLRB, with one member dissenting, held that the company violated the Taft-Hartley Act by its action. It was this ruling that the appeals bench overruled with Judge Anthony Celebrezze writing the unanimous opinion.

The opinion said that "the fact that retired persons may continue to receive pensions after permanently leaving the service of an employer does not entitle them to continued status as employes, indeed, the receipt by them of retirement benefits further emphasizes the finality of their employment severance."

The court ruled also that retired workers are not within the bargaining unit and therefore employers have "no statutory duty to renegotiate with their union improvements in retired employes' pension plans."

Noting that there is an established practice of employers bargaining on retired employe benefits, the court commented that "this voluntary practice demonstrates the increasingly humanitarian quality of the labor-management relationship, and it is to be encouraged. However, it does not form a basis on which this court can alter statutory language, or undermine the congressional intent."

But Rejects Controls:

Nixon Calls for Shift In Economic Tactics

ident temporary, standby authority to stabilize prices, rents, wages and salaries and urged other measures dealing with profits, dividends, and capital gains.

Commenting on the current economic situation, the AFL-CIO told the committee that "there is a danger that this deterioration may begin to feed on itself," and that the Administration is "not only permitting this downward drift to continue," but that it shows no signs "that it is prepared to rapidly return the economy to high employment when the present recession is over."

Nixon, posing the current economic situation as one of transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy, called on Congress to approve specific legislation on unemployment compensation insurance, manpower training, insurance for investors, tieing social security benefits to the cost of living, aid for financing housing, increased small business loan authority, emergency assistance to railroads and generally to hold down federal spending.

The President detailed cuts in defense spending, noting that three-quarters of a million people have been affected in terms of jobs, and that the government is now spending more on human resource programs.

The new productivity commission will consist of 23 members, six each from management, labor and the public and five government members. It will have as its first priority achieving a balance "between costs and productivity that will lead to more stable prices."

The Administration, Nixon said, has earned the credentials to call for restraint from business and labor "to slow down inflation," with business taking price actions more consistent with a stable cost of living and labor structuring its wage demands "to better achieve a new stability of costs."

"I believe there is a new social responsibility growing in our economic system," the President said, "on the part of unions and corporations. Now is the time for that social concern to take the form of specific action on the wage-price front."

The AFL-CIO testimony before the House Banking Committee noted that its recommendations on selective credit controls and interest rate ceilings, as well as other steps, are necessitated by 18 months of Administration economic policies "which have brought America the worst combination of developments: the most severe inflation in 20 years, the highest interest rates in 100 years and the sharpest rise in unemployment in over 10 years. Moreover, no end to this situation is in sight."

The federation reiterated its views on mandatory controls, noting they are never desirable but at times may be necessary. They must be even-handed across the board, the AFL-CIO said.

Painters Rap SBA Practice On Contracting

Government agencies are contracting out construction work to non-union firms without competitive bidding, Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters charged.

Raftery said the contracts have been handed out by the Small Business Administration under a section of the Small Business Act which has never in the past been applied to government construction contracts.

In letters to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and to Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Raftery said the contracting procedure of the Small Business Administration "has a very tenuous legal foundation."

He said all trades are being hurt, citing contracts let to non-union firms without competitive bidding at the Wright-Patterson Air Force Base involving work normally performed by members of the Carpenters, Laborers and Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, in addition to the Painters.

The government has claimed that a 1958 amendment to the Small Business Act permits such contracts to be let, even though in the past it has been used only in subcontracts for goods and services.

President Gets Caught With His Message Down

There were some red faces in the White House after a news conference at which Pres. Nixon sharply criticized Congress for its delay in passing emergency home financing legislation.

"Ladies and gentlemen," the President told the press, "on Feb. 2, I sent to Congress a message asking for enactment of the Emergency Home Finance Act of 1970."

The legislation, he said, had been urgently sought by Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney, who was standing by his side.

"Four months have passed," the President complained, "and Congress has yet failed to act."

It wasn't until the next day that the embarrassing truth came to light. The President, it turned out, had never sought such legislation or sent Congress the message to which he referred.

Both the House and Senate Banking committees, on their own, have held hearings on the tight money, high interest squeeze that has crippled homebuilding. The Senate in mid-April passed its own Emergency Home Finance bill, and the House Banking Committee has approved similar legislation. And only after the Senate acted did the Administration take a stand in support of the legislation.

House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.) suggested the President call another news conference to correct the "goof."

Free Labor Institute Graduates 31st Class

Members of the 31st graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development were urged to return to their home countries and put their training in cooperatives and community development to work helping the poor.

The 30 trade unionists from 14 Latin American countries were told by Bert M. Tollefson, Jr., assistant administrator of the Agency for International Development, that in building rural cooperatives, credit unions and similar projects, they consequently build up the lives of their fellow citizens and "the whole political and social structure" of their nations.

Presenting diplomas on behalf of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger also applauded the graduates' commitment to "the broad, essential task of social and economic development in your nations."

He urged them not only to "improve wages and job conditions," but to go beyond the work place "into the community and society as a whole" and seek to improve "the human condition."

At the luncheon following graduation, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery also stressed that organized labor, as the "principal catalyst for progress," must involve itself increasingly in the "total life of the community," particularly in the promotion of needed social legislation.

Speaking for the class, Ulises Clivio Rodriguez of Uruguay praised the AIFLD course of study and suggested that it be "more . . . longer . . . more technical in nature, because we believe that these educational programs to train the leaders in our future development are the best investment that can be made in the struggle for liberty."

In accepting a symbolic gift of three little trees from the class, William C. Doherty, Jr., AIFLD executive director, said that "the cooperative movement can be used to strengthen the trade union movement."

The trees were presented by Mauro Caraccioli Henderson of Honduras, who told the assembled guests that as they grow, "there will be a growth of cooperatives and trade unionism in our hemisphere."

Among the guests attending the graduation ceremonies were Ambassador Hector Luisi of Uruguay, a nine-man trade union team from Chile, six trade unionists from Venezuela and the secretary-treasurer of Guyana's largest trade union, the Manpower Citizens' Association, Cleveland Charran.

ACWA Official Named To Panel on Population

Howard Samuel, vice president of the Clothing Workers, has been named to a new Commission on Population Growth & the American Future, the White House announced. The commission, established by Congress, will be headed by John D. Rockefeller 3rd, chairman of the board of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Rubber Union Wins Pattern At Goodrich

Akron — The Rubber Workers settled a contract dispute with the B. F. Goodrich Co., second of two major tire firms involved in strike action, and continued efforts to get "pattern" settlements with Firestone, Uniroyal and General Tire without a strike.

Union negotiators came to terms first with Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. after a seven-week strike. They won contract benefits totaling $1.30 an hour over a three-year period for 23,000 employes in 16 Goodyear plants.

The "pattern" then was sought at Goodrich, where 11,000 workers set up picket lines May 6 at nine plants in eight states.

The union put the value of the Goodrich settlement at $1.39 an hour — 9 cents more than the Goodyear agreement because of higher pension costs.

The Goodrich contract will give employes a total wage increase of $3,190 over a three-year span, according to the union. That represents hourly increases totaling 82 cents, plus additional raises of 15-25 cents for top-skilled workers.

The new agreement must be approved by a majority of members from a majority of Goodrich locals. Some workers were called back while ratification meetings were being scheduled.

Covered employes will get increases of 30 cents an hour now, 26 cents more on July 5, 1971, and another 26 cents a year later. Skilled trades workers get an additional 15 cents an hour now and a possible 10 cents more on July 5, 1971, if locals approve. Also provided were major advances in pensions, vacations, hospitalization, holidays and other benefits.

Rising Joblessness Hits Skilled Workers Hard

Workers in high skill occupations rather than those at the bottom of the occupational ladder were hit hardest by the sharp rise in unemployment since mid-1969, the Labor Dept. reported.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said that "one of the surprising facts" about the jobless rise was the extent to which it affected workers in high skill jobs, mostly males and white.

Noting that the unemployment hit heaviest in the Middle West and the Pacific Coast, BLS said that "cutbacks in the defense and aerospace fields, the impacts of which are also being felt in many other industries, have been primary factors in halting the growth of factory employment since mid-1969." It added that a weakness in automobile sales and the slowdown in construction also were factors in the rising unemployment rate.

Manufacturing employment, BLS said, has dropped nearly 700,000 between July 1969 and May 1970, with the drop initially confined to durable goods but now beginning to affect the non-durables as well. In the services area there has been little or no employment growth since February 1970.

Of the 1.3 million increase in the number of unemployed between December 1969 and May 1970, about 600,000 have been men 20 years of age and over. A great proportion of these men lost their jobs while relatively few quit or were looking for their first job.

Joblessness among women workers and teenagers has increased less rapidly so far, rising 400,000 among adult women and 200,000 among teenagers.

The unemployment rate among white-collar workers rose nearly a full percentage point since December, surprising because this type of worker is usually not affected by joblessness.

The jobless rate for professional and technical workers has risen to a level last reached in 1963, reflecting the cutback in aerospace and defense-related areas where a large proportion of the workers are highly skilled. A reduction in government-financed research also is a factor.

For blue-collar workers the rise in the jobless rate from 4.3 percent in December to 6.2 percent in May is concentrated among skilled craftsmen.

While the slowdown of employment growth has had "serious repercussions for both white and Negro workers," BLS said, the Negro unemployment rate has risen "more moderately" than the white rate. This stems from the shift of Negroes into occupations with relatively low unemployment, the impact of government manpower programs and some possible lessening of discrimination, said BLS.

OECD Labor Unit Headed by Usery

Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., has been named chairman of a panel on industrial relations which advises the 22-nation Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development. The "working party" which he will head is made up of top level government officials from member nations who are experts in the labor relations field.

Landmark Law Extended:

Voting Rights Act Sent to White House

Senate-passed bill, carried on a 224 to 183 rollcall.

Making up the majority — casting "right" votes on labor's scorecard — were 165 Democrats and 59 Republicans. Opposed were 117 Republicans and 66 Democrats.

The bill was then passed and sent to the President by a one-sided 272-133 vote.

Constitutional lawyers have argued on both sides of the question of whether Congress can lower the voting age by passing a law, and the issue will certainly come before the Supreme Court. The effective date was put off until 1971 to allow adequate time for a court test.

Almost lost sight of in the controversy over the 18-year-old vote was the fact that the House reversed itself on the basic Voting Rights Act.

The Administration had initially proposed a watered-down extension of the law. It would have removed close federal supervision in the areas with past records of discrimination and substituted a toothless bill covering the entire nation.

The House Judiciary Committee rejected this and reported out a straight five-year extension of the 1965 law. But on the House floor last December, a coalition of 129 Republicans and 79 Democrats succeeded by a five-vote margin in substituting the Administration bill.

In the Senate, a bipartisan civil rights coalition steered by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) repaired the damage. It won quick approval of an extension of the 1965 law, coupled with two non-controversial elements of the Administration proposal — abolishing literacy tests and lowering residence requirements in presidential elections.

And the addition of the 18-year-old vote — which later was to so upset the President — caused hardly a ripple of opposition. On the key Senate vote, it was supported by 38 Democrats and 26 Republicans, opposed by only nine Democrats and eight Republicans.

In a fortunate break for civil rights supporters, the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court was next on the Senate agenda, and southerners — confident of confirmation — were unwilling to risk delay or loss of votes by a filibuster.

The fight shifted back to the House where a big plus was the decision by Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel D. Celler (D-N.Y.) to swallow his personal objection to the 18-year-old vote rather than risk the civil rights bill in a conference with the Senate.

The only question was whether —after Nixon's declaration of opposition—a majority of the House would depart from custom and accept the Senate version intact.

House Speaker John W. McCormack, who is retiring at the end of this Congress, worked like an 18-year-old in rallying support for the bill. During the debate, he brought congressmen on the floor and young people in the gallery to their feet applauding when he said that nothing would make him happier on the eve of his retirement "than to see this resolution adopted."

On the Republican side, Rep. John Anderson of Illinois, a senior member of the GOP leadership team, broke with Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford to urge the House to accept the Senate bill.

The key rollcall came on what appeared to be a technicality. But the civil rights supporters who had gone from congressman to congressman in the three House office buildings adjoining the Capitol had been well briefed. In seeking commitments for support, they stressed that the procedural vote would be the one that counted. When it carried, the fight was won and the final vote a mere formality.

Heading the massive lobbying effort were the Civil Rights Leadership Conference, the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions, and the Youth Franchise Coalition.

Clothing costs were up six-tenths and housing and medical care costs up five-tenths. Food prices, which usually decline in May, were up due to a rise in fruit and vegetable prices.

The report emphasized that in one sector—consumer services—where costs have been mounting sharply and steadily over a number of years, the price increase was the smallest monthly rise since late last year and noticeably smaller than in recent months.

Contract Renewal

NATIONAL COUNCIL of Senior Citizens gives a merit award to Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) for his "powerful advocacy" of the 15 percent Social Security increase voted by Congress and for outstanding work on behalf of the elderly. Council Pres. Nelson Cruikshank, right, makes presentation to Gore, a member of the Senate Finance Committee, at NCSC convention in Washington.

Senior Citizens Back Vote for 18-Year-Olds

The National Council of Senior Citizens spoke up for America's youth at its annual convention. Major policy resolutions adopted by the 2.5 million member federation included a ringing endorsement of lowering the voting age to 18.

"A nation which allows its young men to die in distant wars should allow them to participate in the political processes that influence foreign and military policy," 1,500 delegates from retiree councils and over-65 groups in 40 states agreed at the NCSC's convention in Washington.

The delegates approved new terms for Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank and other officers and adopted a legislative program aimed at:

- Drastic action by Congress to shore up the "sagging domestic economy."
- Health insurance for all Americans as proposed in a bill by Rep. Martha Griffiths (D-Mich.). The present Medicare program, a policy statement pointed out, pays only 46 percent of the medical and hospital bills of those 65 and over.
- An additional 35 percent increase in Social Security benefits by 1972 to supplement the 15 percent increase effective last January and a House-passed 5 percent increase now pending.

Cruikshank was strongly applauded when he announced that the NCSC and the American Public Health Association are preparing a joint suit to compel the Food & Drug Administration to enforce the laws involving the effectiveness of prescription drugs.

Cruikshank said the FDA was "unresponsive" to the council's request for a report on the agency's progress in removing ineffective or dangerous drugs from the market. The drug efficacy laws are known as the Kefauver amendments to the Food and Drug Act.

The delegates, denouncing what they called "exploitation and abuse of the elderly sick," endorsed a proposal by Rep. David Pryor (D-Ark.) for the establishment of a select committee of Congress on nursing homes and homes for the aged to "ride herd" on a wide range of federal programs concerned with nursing care.

They called for federally-financed alternatives like foster homes, low-cost supervised housing and day care centers.

The convention attacked cuts in federal funds for health, welfare, education and housing for low income families to make way for the "outpouring of our resources into a military budget."

It asked Congress to buttress the U.S. economy by rationing bank loans and credit, putting ceilings on loan interest rates and requiring investment in government-guaranteed home mortgages of billions in tax-exempt funds held by pension trusts, college endowment trusts and foundations.

Convention speakers included Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging; Sen. Frank Moss (D-Utah), chairman of the same group's Senate subcommittee on long term care; Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), and Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.).

Award Winners

The convention gave special merit awards to Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) for his "powerful advocacy" of the 15 percent Social Security benefit increase voted by Congress last year; Rep. Jacob H. Gilbert (D-N.Y.), co-author with Sen. Williams of a bill to boost Social Security another 15 percent, and to improve Medicare; Vermont State Sen. Stoyan Christowe (R-West Dover) for persuading the state Board of Pharmacy to permit the sale of low-cost prescription drugs mailed from outside the state.

Alice M. Brophy, executive director of New York City's Commission on Aging, was cited for her services to older Americans. The convention gave a special award to Dave Miller, NCSC vice president and chairman of the retirees' council of the Auto Workers.

Kirkland on Panel To Study Credit

Pres. Nixon has named AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to a commission set up to study the nation's private financial system and come up with recommendations "to meet the credit needs of the U. S. economy and its people in the decades ahead."

Reed O. Hunt, former chairman of the Crown Zellerbach Corp., will head the panel.

Nixon asked for "constructive and achievable legislative proposals" from the commission by December 1971.

Last Shopcraft Pact Reached With Railroads

Wage increases ranging from 46 to 81 cents an hour and a "letter of intent" to correct job classification inequities are included in an agreement negotiated by the Firemen & Oilers for 13,000 employes of major U.S. railroads.

The union was the last of the shopcrafts to settle with the carriers as a result of wage notices served two years ago. Its next opportunity for opening notices will come again in January 1971.

President William E. Fredenberger and Sec.-Treas. John J. McNamara said a major development in the pact, just ratified by general chairmen, is the provision for settling inequities. Under it, the National Railway Labor Conference representing management will seek to persuade individual railroads to negotiate:

- The elimination and redesignation of job titles under which employes are classified and paid.
- Adjustment in rates of pay to equalize the treatment of employes doing comparable work.

Fredenberger said the final settlement agreed to by the railroads was 10 cents an hour better than the previous "final and best offer." The improvement came after the union set June 20 as a strike date, he said.

The new contract will raise pay by 2 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1969; 3 percent retroactive to July 1, 1969, plus a 5-cent hourly increase for skilled mechanics; 5 cents an hour retroactive to Sept. 1, 1969; 5 percent retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970, plus 5 cents an hour for skilled mechanics; 4 cents retroactive to Apr. 1, 1970, and a final 4 cents more next Aug. 1.

Women Mark 50th Year of Labor Bureau

The Women's Bureau of the U.S. Dept. of Labor was 50 years old this month and the occasion was commemorated by nearly a thousand women from across the nation and from every walk of life at a three-day conference in Washington.

"American Women at the Crossroads: Directions for the Future," was mostly the serious business of workshops conducted by women moderators from government, business, education and labor and participated in by delegates with expertise on laws pertaining to women and their real-life applications.

Sixty women unionists held a preconference session. They represented a dozen different unions.

The aim as expressed by Mrs. Elizabeth Duncan Koontz, Women's Bureau director, was that "women at the doctoral level get to know women who work in household employment."

12 New Union-Label Pacts Signed with Grape Growers

By Eugene A. Kelly

Delano, Calif.—Twelve more employers signed contracts with the AFL-CIO Farm Workers in the union's most significant harvest since the Coachella Valley's first union-label table grapes began ripening for market.

That brought to 25 the number of California and Arizona growers who agreed to poll their employes on whether they want the union to represent them, and to put contract terms into effect where a majority chooses the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Cesar Chavez, who has led the long struggle to establish unionism in the fields, sees the new agreements as a milestone.

The latest victory, he said, was made possible by a trade union movement that adopted the cause of the farm workers as its own and by the millions of families who insist on seeing the union label before buying grapes.

William L. Kircher, director of organization for the AFL-CIO, announced the latest agreements in a series that began Apr. 1 with a breakthrough contract signed by three Coachella growers. Eleven of them grow grapes, dates, cantaloupes and walnuts in California. The 12th is a big grape grower in the Phoenix, Ariz., area—James Macchiaroli Fruit Co.

The others, in the Coachella region, are the Melpak Co., Bobara Ranch, Hopper Ranch, Beckman & Bender, Bumagot Ranch, Mike DaPaulo, Gimian Ranch, Milton Karahabian, the Key-Kas Ranch, Charles Keene Co., and the Laflin & Laflin Co., whose ranch hands produce 98 percent of the dates grown in the United States.

All the agreements follow the pattern of the Apr. 1 settlements with Coachella growers and May

Senate Works At Night as Bills Pile Up

Working a double shift, the Senate moved towards passage of a multi-billion dollar aid to education appropriations bill and prepared to take up a backlog of House-passed legislation, including a postal pay, reorganization and collective bargaining package.

Under the two-shift schedule, the Senate continues until 5 p.m. each day a debate which began May 13th on the war in Southeast Asia and amendments to a military sales bill aimed at asserting congressional authority over the conduct of foreign affairs and military operations.

When the witching hour arrives, the legislative assembly line is started up and the Senate turns to its heavy calendar of pending bills.

The education appropriation was given top priority as part of a new effort to make funds available to school districts and colleges before the start of the school year.

The bill may set the stage for a new budget confrontation with the

Rejects 'Irresponsibility' Charge:

House Votes to Override Veto of Health Facilities Bill

By David L. Perlman

The House firmly rejected Pres. Nixon's claim that money spent to build and improve health care facilities represents "fiscal irresponsibility."

It voted 279-98 to override the President's veto of a bill authorizing a major expansion of the 24-year-old Hill-Burton Act, which has helped build or modernize most of the nation's hospitals and outpatient facilities.

The legislation, strongly supported by labor, had been passed unanimously in both the House and Senate. The veto was unexpected, and left Republican congressmen red-faced and openly angry.

Most of them reluctantly followed their leadership and voted to sustain Nixon's veto. But enough rebelled to push the vote to override 27 above the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution. Only three conservative southern Democrats broke party ranks to vote to uphold the veto.

The victory margin raised strong hopes that the Senate will do likewise—and that a presidential veto will be overridden for the first time in 10 years.

Before the House vote, the AFL-CIO urged all congressmen to override the veto.

"If Congress had failed to pass legislation providing needed health facilities, it would have been guilty of fiscal irresponsibility," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote House members. He told them that "the AFL-CIO believes adequate health care facilities merit our nation's highest priority."

Pres. Nixon vetoed the bill when he "discovered" that it would require the government to spend whatever amounts Congress appropriated for the health programs, up to the limits of the authorization bill.

That was essentially the same argument he used in January, when he vetoed education aid appropriations. The attempt to override that veto mustered only a simple 226-191 majority, far short of the needed two-thirds. But passage of the education money bill had been

Back Pay for 100,000 Fruit of '68 Court Ruling

More than 100,000 public employes have received an estimated $8 million in additional wages as a result of the 1968 Supreme Court decision upholding the extension of the Fair Labor Standards Act to some state employes, the Labor Dept. said.

The AFL-CIO and unions representing public employes were influential in getting Congress to extend the wage-hour coverage and filed briefs with the Supreme Court arguing its constitutionality.

On the second anniversary of the Supreme Court decision, Federal Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran said that while the original ruling applied only to school and hospital employes, some states have extended the minimum wage and overtime provisions to all state employes.

The case grew out of 1966 congressional action extending FLSA coverage to some state employes. The state of Maryland, along with 27 other states, challenged the constitutionality of the amendments and specifically sought to restrain Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz from enforcing them.

In a 6-2 decision on Maryland v. Wirtz handed down in June of 1968, the Supreme Court upheld a previous federal court ruling that the amendments do not violate a state's sovereignty.

The state of Maryland had agreed

Three of the government's top economic policymakers and analysts are in agreement that the unemployment rate will exceed 5 percent in the second half of 1970.

Andrew F. Brimmer, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, predicts that the jobless rate will average 5.5 percent for the last six months of the year. In May it was 5 percent.

Paul W. McCracken, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said unemployment hasn't "reached the high point" yet, but that the nation is "not very far" from it.

Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, who will take over as head of the powerful Office of Management and Budget July 1, said unemployment will probably climb above 5 percent.

If the rate were to average 5.5 percent for the next six months it would mean an additional 400,000 persons would be added to the estimated 4.1 million unemployed in May.

Atomic Trades Win Pact in 9-Week Strike

Oak Ridge, Tenn.—A nine-week strike by members of 17 unions ended when members of the Atomic Trades & Labor Council, affiliated with the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., voted 2,007 to 787 to accept an improved contract offer from the nuclear division of Union Carbide Corp.

Council Pres. B. W. Hensley said the 19-month contract gives skilled craftsmen a 16.3 percent wage hike, with raises totaling 15.4 percent for semi-skilled workers and 13.4 percent for unskilled groups.

Beginning this year, all 4,400 members of council unions will have a tenth paid holiday, Christmas Eve.

Improvements in the hospitalization plan include an allowance of $30 a day for rooms, up from $21; greatly improved maternity benefits, and coverage for dependent children raised from age 19 to 23. Major medical coverage was raised from $10,000 to $20,000 per individual.

The settlement came after intensive bargaining in meetings arranged by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Workers at AEC's Y-12 and X-10 plants struck Apr. 15 after rejecting wage increases ranging from 5 to 8 percent. The strike, for wage parity with other workers, was the first major walkout in 24 years, council representatives headed by Pres. Maywood Boggs of the Metal Trades Dept. told members of Congress in a report on the dispute.

Hatters Official In Housing Post

New York—Alfred Smoke, organizer in the hat and cap industry for nearly a quarter-century, has resigned as secretary-treasurer of the Hatters to become assistant to the president of the United Housing Foundation.

Smoke had been a member of the UHF's board of directors for several years. His new post will put him in a more active role in the planning, construction and operation of cooperative apartments.

Smoke's duties at the Hatters will be assumed by Pres. Alex Rose and his staff until a successor is chosen.

JAZZ BAND BENEFACTOR Richard Gibson receives a life membership card in the Musicians from AFM Pres. Herman D. Kenin, left, at the union's 73rd annual convention in Houston. Gibson has contributed more than $200,000 to the support of jazz music, including $125,000 for the World's Greatest Jazz Band, which entertained delegates at the convention.

Musicians Link Goals To Effective Congress

By John R. Oravec

Houston—The nation's musicians were urged to help elect a Congress that will be in tune with the social needs of the country and the goals of labor.

Delegates to the 73rd annual Musicians convention made a down payment on that objective by contributing $2,500 to TEMPO, the AFM's political and promotional arm.

"It has become a political fact of life," the TEMPO committee told the convention, "that to advance the general welfare and working standards and to gain even a better economic life for the musician, we must advance our views through the legislative halls of Congress."

The committee warned that more support is needed to defend existing programs such as the National Foundation of the Arts & Humanities "which at this time is being given a cautious view by Congress."

"This election year is vital to our interests and we must move ahead," the committee stressed as it noted that TEMPO contributions will be channeled in efforts to achieve the union's programs on a national level.

Delegates viewed a film that featured AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany discussing the 1970 congressional elections and the importance of COPE voter registration programs in electing candidates favorable to labor's goals.

The convention endorsed passage of the national health insurance bill now before Congress as a vehicle for effective health care for all Americans. It urged all AFM locals and members to write their congressmen and senators to vote for the adoption of the bill.

Delegates also called on Congress to revise the social security law "to permit larger or no-limit supplemental earnings" for beneficiaries who must work for additional income because of inflation.

The convention voted a $5,000 increase in annual salaries for both Pres. Herman D. Kenin and Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard. Kenin's income was boosted to $50,000 and Ballard's to $40,000. Salaries of the union's executive board members were raised $2,000 to $10,000 a year.

All five incumbent executive committee members were re-elected. Eight candidates were on the convention ballots. The returning committee members are A. A. Tomei of Philadelphia; Victor Fuentealba, Baltimore; J. Martin Emerson, Washington, D.C.; David Winstein, New Orleans, and John V. Tranchitella, Los Angeles.

The more than 1,000 delegates also called for a study of establishing a central headquarters for the union's president and secretary-treasurer. The two officers currently operate in separate locations: the president in New York City and the secretary-treasurer in Newark, N.J.

The AFM executive board will report on the relocation study at the 1971 convention in Seattle, Wash. Delegates selected Honolulu for the 1972 convention.

Former AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, one of the convention speakers, reported on the widening operations of Union Labor Life Insurance Co. Schnitzler noted that ULLICO now operates in 43 states and is continually expanding its services on a nonprofit basis.

Iron Workers to Train 600 From Minorities

The Iron Workers have signed a national agreement with the Labor Dept. to train 600 members of minority groups as journeymen craftsmen.

An 18-month contract for the $1.2 million training program was announced by James D. Hodgson, Labor Secretary-designate. The program is designed to bring into the trade minority group workers who have experience in the craft but are beyond the apprenticeship age.

Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers signed the contract for the union. Also signing the agreement were Hodgson and officials of two contractors associations.

The trainees, who must be at least 31 years old and physically fit, will be recruited by the union and construction firms. The Labor Dept. has agreed to contribute $2,400 for each trainee to cover orientation, on-the-job training and supplemental classroom instruction.

From the 600 men expected to participate in the training, 100 will be qualified mechanics — workers who can perform work assignments at an acceptable journeyman skill level, the Labor Dept. said.

The remaining 500 will be either advanced trainees with some experience in the trade or recruits who have no construction work experience and are above the apprenticeship age.

All trainee-workers will be paid local wage rates at least 50 percent of journeymen's wages, with higher amounts for those with experience. Workers enrolled in advanced training programs will receive a minimum of 288 hours of supplemental instruction beyond the training time spent on job sites. On-the-job training will be provided through skilled journeymen Iron Workers.

Local state employment service offices and other manpower agencies will help conduct the recruiting of the minority group trainees.

If these sources prove inadequate, the Labor Dept. said that the agreement calls for assistance from such groups as the National Urban League, the Workers' Defense League, the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for the Spanish Speaking and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

But Economic Policy Hit:

Nixon's Asia Aims Get CWA Backing

Cincinnati—The Communications Workers expressed the hope that Pres. Nixon's Southeast Asia policy will succeed in achieving a just and lasting peace, but scored the Administration's domestic economic policies for failure to stem inflation and growing unemployment while allowing productivity to slip.

The 1,500 delegates to the 32nd annual CWA convention adopted a foreign policy statement that called "on the President to lead us with a rational and orderly policy in Southeast Asia to peace that truly is just and in the national interest of the peoples in that area of the world."

"The quest for peace," the statement declared, "must remain the number one goal of this nation and its allies." It also must have the commitment of all the nation's leaders and citizens, the statement continued.

It added that "we look forward to the withdrawal of all American troops from Cambodia by July 1, 1970, an accomplishment that will leave us with a restored faith in the credibility of our government."

Delegates defeated overwhelmingly a motion that urged an immediate and unconditional withdrawal of all American combat troops from Viet Nam. Fewer than 15 delegates raised their hands in support of the amendment that would have altered the CWA's foreign policy position.

The union's foreign policy paper also called on the "political leaders in Saigon to take effective steps to broaden the political base of their support and encourage the growth of democratic organizations such as the Vietnamese Federation of Labor (CTV) to insure the freedom and inviolate rights of its people."

In its economic policy statement, the convention lashed the Administration for not meeting the challenge of inflation, tax reform and unemployment.

The Administration's "approach to inflation simply produced a depression in housing and distortions in the money markets," it said.

While profits and interest income for the wealthy have gone up, delegates noted, the unemployment rate has reached 5 percent—the highest level in five years.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told the convention that the President has failed to outline a monetary policy in his recent speech on the nation's economy.

"Mr. Nixon has once more bowed to the money interests—to those who are making money—while some 4 million Americans are in the depths of a depression, for they have no jobs," Beirne observed.

Among key resolutions adopted was a "demand that stores where our members shop stock grapes only from farms which have contracts" with the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

That resolution was amended from the floor to urge the "total and complete abolishment of all farm subsidy programs until . . . growers accept and fulfill their responsibilities in accordance with the American collective bargaining process."

The convention also approved a motion from the floor that urged CWA district vice presidents to persuade all union locals to affiliate with chartered AFL-CIO state bodies.

Sec.-Treas. Glenn Watts reported that the CWA COPE campaign has had outstanding results so far in 1970, with 361 locals achieving their quota of $1 per member. This effort has helped raise $173,963 for COPE operations, Watts noted.

The convention defeated proposed amendments to the CWA constitution which called for dropping annual conventions in favor of biennial conventions and electing union officers to four-year terms rather than for two years.

A move to provide for a mandatory retirement age of 65 for elected officers and national directors was also rejected.

Al Atkinson Dies, CWA Staff Official

Alfred V. Atkinson, legislative representative of the Communications Workers, died unexpectedly in Cincinnati shortly after the CWA convention. He was 60.

Atkinson had served the CWA on a full-time basis since his election as a division president in Richmond, Va., in 1946. He also served as an assistant director of CWA District 2 and at the CWA headquarters in Washington before he was named legislative representative in 1960.

Funeral services were held in Richmond. Atkinson is survived by his wife Delphia, two children and two grandchildren.

Full Participation Urged In 'Honor America Day'

The labor movement should "participate fully" in the Honor America Day celebrations on July 4, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged in a letter to presidents of affiliated unions.

Focus of the day's activities will be in Washington, D.C., with an 11 a.m. program at the Lincoln Memorial and a 90-minute all-star entertainment program at the Washington Monument starting at 7:30 p.m. There will be local celebrations in other areas, the Honor America Committee announced.

Meany said endorsement of the observance is not tied to support of any political program. The Honor America Day celebration, he stressed, is designed to show the world that Americans, while having "our individual differences and opinions," are united by "faith in and love for our country."

J. C. Turner, president of the Greater Washington Central Labor Council, is coordinator of labor's participation in the District of Columbia program. The Rev. Billy Graham and Bob Hope are national co-chairmen of the committee; Harry S Truman, Mrs. Dwight D. Eisenhower and Lyndon B. Johnson are honorary chairmen, and Meany is an honorary vice chairman for the observance.

Farm Workers Sign 12 New Grape Pacts

pacts in the Delano area. That pattern is for a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour, plus 25 cents a box per picker; 10 cents an hour per employe for health and welfare purposes, and an additional 2 cents an hour for the benefit of workers displaced because of age, or automation of the ranches.

Another significant feature of UFWOC contracts is protection of workers against "hard" pesticides. They bind growers not to use insect-killing sprays that will cripple or incapacitate employes working in the fields alongside spraying rigs or under crop-dusting planes.

Kircher credited a large share of the union's success to the "fantastic support" given to the nationwide boycott of non-union table grapes.

That boycott, launched more than four years ago, will continue until major growers stop refusing to allow elections or contract negotiations, Kircher said.

He reported rising sales of union-label grapes, now on sale in most major cities in the United States and Canada. He asked labor families to continue buying grapes with the UFWOC label on the wooden box, and meanwhile to avoid stores which refuse to offer them for sale.

Until April, the union had won contracts only from wine grape growers. In that month, a committee of Catholic bishops called a Los Angeles press conference where Chavez and three growers announced agreement on recognition and contract terms. Other growers then began to break away from the anti-union employers who have been fighting the union.

The bishops entered the dispute when AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked their aid in getting growers to negotiate with the union. They appointed an ad hoc committee which, with the aid of Msgr. George G. Higgins of the United States Catholic Conference, Washington, and with the support of congressmen and senators, brought growers and field hands to the conference table.

The latest contract signings bring Arizona grape acreage under union contract to the 50 percent mark.

Kircher and Chavez hope that, by the end of June they will have completed negotiations on contracts covering more than 25 percent of the U.S. grape-growing industry. Their talks with major growers on Coachella, Arvin, Calif., and Arizona ranches were continuing as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Waiting for a poll of employes on their desire to have the UFWOC represent them are members of California Imperial Distributors, a group of 33 small grape growers in the Coachella Valley. They have signed contracts which take effect when union representation is achieved.

UFWOC now represents workers on 5,000 acres of the 7,500 in the Coachella region—the two-thirds mark.

The size of the union's achievement, UFWOC said, can be measured by contracts like the one signed in May with grower Hollis Roberts. The union now represents 450 workers on the Roberts ranch but by harvest time, that number may rise as high as 4,000, according to Kircher.

The first union-label grapes to go on sale disappeared rapidly, in contrast to the slow movement of non-union grapes.

One Delano grower reported that his first 15,000 boxes of union-label grapes were immediately purchased by a San Francisco commission buyer and resold to markets by noon of the day they were delivered.

Chavez's union, chartered by the AFL-CIO in 1966 as an organizing committee, won its first contracts with wine grape growers. But until this year, it ran up against a stone wall in its attempts to get table grape growers to the bargaining table. Farm workers are not covered by the National Labor Relations Act.

BROAD SPECTRUM of labor's interests is discussed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a seminar on "The American System of Unionism" at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in Washington. It is part of a three-week staff development program.

Bakery Union Elects Oskoian To No. 2 Post

Gregory Oskoian of Cranston, R.I., an executive vice president of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers since that union was reconstituted by merger last December, has been named secretary-treasurer by vote of the union's executive board.

Oskoian, 43, succeeds Max Kralstein, who retired. Kralstein, who will be 71 on July 3, was president of the union in 1962, while it was outside the AFL-CIO. He became secretary-treasurer at the merger of the union with the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers in 1969, when ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway was elected head of the merged organization.

Oskoian, a native of Providence, R.I., joined the union in 1950 as a worker at the A&P bakery in Cranston. He was named business agent of his local union in 1957 and later became an international representative and a vice president.

NLRB Again Rules Against J. P. Stevens

The J. P. Stevens firm ran its record of unfair labor practices up to 10 when the National Labor Relations Board found it guilty of unlawful refusal to bargain with the Textile Workers Union of America.

The union won an election at the company's Black Hawk warehouse in Greenville, S.C., more than two and one-half years ago. When the regional NLRB director certified TWUA as the legal bargaining agent, management refused to negotiate.

The board ordered Stevens, a frequent winner of government contracts for textile products, to bargain with the union and to sign a contract if agreement is reached.

Stevens is expected to appeal this ruling, as it has the previous nine findings against it.

The decision followed another finding in May that Stevens unlawfully interfered with an election scheduled to be held a year ago for employes of its mill at Shelby, N.C.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the board and the courts have forced Stevens to pay more than $1 million to date to 130 workers it has illegally fired over the years for union activity.

Guild Urged to Draft Bill of Rights To Protect Newsmen from Attacks

Seattle—The drafting of a "bill of rights" to protect newspapermen from physical or legal interference and assure free access to the news was urged by Newspaper Guild Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., in his official address to the Guild's 37th annual convention here.

Recommending modernization of the Guild's code of ethics "in the light of what history and experience have suggested since it was adopted 36 years ago," Perlik said the convention and the union's executive board should draft a newsmen's "bill of rights" as "the next logical step."

As outlined by Perlik, the document would "positively and forcefully affirm the right of employes to pursue their calling without physical or legal interference, the right of unfettered access to the sources of news and the right to engage in all the outside political and social activities of a concerned citizen without hindrance by their employers."

The "bill of rights" was one of several proposals advanced by Perlik to meet the challenges posed by fast-paced social and economic changes.

He urged convention adoption of the ANG executive board recommendations for:

- Convocation of a national conference by the American Civil Liberties Union or some similar organization to establish a legal-aid fund for media employes who resist disclosure of confidential information and sources.
- A Guild conference on steps to eliminate discrimination against women in the newspaper industry and a Guild-sponsored conference embracing labor, management, government agencies and private foundations to promote the recruitment of Negroes and other minorities for newspaper jobs.
- Pursuit through Guild grievance channels of newspapermen's quest for a greater voice in the product they produce.
- Expansion of the newspaper industry's use of reprocessed rather than virgin newsprint as a step to reduce the problems of waste disposal and deforestation.

Perlik also urged a change in the union's name from American Newspaper Guild to one that would "make plain the presence of our Canadian brothers and sisters as full participating partners." The Guild's local in Victoria, B.C., has urged a change to "International Newspaper Guild."

ANG Chairman James B. Woods assailed Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew for harassing and intimidating the press.

"Clearly," said Woods, "he wants the news media to be totally subservient to the Nixon Administration." He linked Agnew's attacks on the press with what he termed a steady "invasion of the newsman's privilege to protect his sources."

Sec.-Treas. Robert M. Crocker, in a review of ANG's financial situation, noted that both the Guild's general and defense funds have been placed under a strain, the former by rising costs and the latter by the two and one-half year strike against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

But he said the Guild's history shows that it "has always been short of funds, always under attack to one or another degree and never more effective in the defense of its members and the pursuit of their welfare than when it has been both broke and under siege."

The newspaper unions' continued prosecution of the Los Angeles strike, and the accompanying boycott against Hearst, he suggested, has deterred other publishers from seeking to follow in Hearst's footsteps. Most publishers, he said, find strange indeed the rationale by which Hearst for two and one-half years has seemed willing to tumble a large and prosperous newspaper into ruins "in an effort to make a funeral mound for the unions."

"In spite of our financial troubles," Crocker declared, "this is not a losing battle."

Union Women Reject Proposed Amendment

Trade union delegates to a conference sponsored by the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. dissented vigorously from an endorsement of the proposed equal rights amendment to the Constitution.

The proposed amendment, while purporting to eliminate sex discrimination in all phases of law, "would, in fact, destroy hard-won and necessary labor standards," they charged. The statement was signed by most of the union participants at the conference and by a number of delegates from other organizations.

Many state labor protection laws apply only to women and would be nullified if the amendment became law.

The statement, made public by Ruth Miller of Los Angeles, a national representative of the Clothing Workers, and Myra K. Wolfgang of Detroit, vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, said the union participants "would support the amendment if it were to guarantee protection of labor standards."

Explaining the division among the conference delegates, the statement noted:

"The majority of women here—middle-class professional and semi-professional people—would not suffer the slightest pain from the destruction of protective legislation.

"The forgotten majority, millions of women not present today, workers in factories, fields and service industries, could almost immediately suffer a reduction in some labor standards, particularly in light of the present recession."

The union delegates stressed their active support of "the movement for equality" but warned that decent labor standards "must not so cavalierly be undermined."

Arts Groups Pick O'Neal As President

New York—Frederick O'Neal, actor and AFL-CIO vice president, has been named president of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America. He succeeds the late Conrad Nagel.

AAAA said the election was unanimous. It followed O'Neal's re-election as president of Actors' Equity, a post he has held since 1964.

Member associations of the Four A's besides Equity are the American Guild of Musical Artists, American Federation of Television & Radio Artists, American Guild of Variety Artists, Hebrew Actors' Union, Italian Actors Union, Screen Actors Guild and Screen Extras Guild.

O'Neal has won several acting awards and has received citations from the New England Theatre Conference, the Ohio Community Theatre Association, the New York City Central Labor Council, the city of St. Louis and several New York City community groups.

He received the National Urban League's EOD award in 1965, the Hoey award of the Catholic Interracial Council, 1964, and the Davis W. Petegrosky award for civic achievement from the American Jewish Congress, 1941.

Voting at 18

THE AFL-CIO BELIEVES that "all citizens of the United States ought to be permitted to vote when they have reached the age of 18."

That position was spelled out last year by the Federation's Executive Council and earlier by Pres. George Meany in 1968 in proposals submitted to the platform committees of the major parties.

The young people of America have "demonstrated the intelligence, idealism and responsibility to enter into full participation in the nation's political life," the AFL-CIO told the party committees two years ago.

That position was reaffirmed by Pres. Meany in March 1969 in testimony before congressional committees on proposals to change the method of electing the President of the United States. He declared that any change in the Constitution should "provide for universal suffrage in presidential elections and that the right to vote shall be extended to all persons 18 years of age or older."

While the AFL-CIO position has been couched in terms of a constitutional amendment, the inclusion of the vote for 18-year-olds in the renewal of the Voting Rights Act accomplishes the same goal—to involve the nation's youth in the political process of democratic government.

The AFL-CIO was a major element in the labor-liberal-civil rights coalition that scored a signal victory on the Voting Rights Act in the face of opposition from the Administration and congressional conservatives generally. And the victory was won because the coalition did not allow itself to be confused by the 18-year-old issue.

Whether younger Americans should be given the right of voting at 18 by constitutional amendment or congressional action is an entirely secondary point. The only pertinent issue is that in a time and society in which young people mature more quickly, are exposed to a great deal more education and information at increasingly earlier ages, and are asked to serve their country before achieving the legal majority of 21, the right to vote at 18 should be granted as quickly as possible.

CONGRESS RECOGNIZED this in voting through the Voting Rights Act; the President recognized this also in signing the bill, although he voices concern over the legal issue and asks for a court test.

Finally, the fact that many of our youth—age 18 and over—are not satisfied with American society as they find it and are seeking change has nothing to do with their right to vote and participate in political decision-making.

The overwhelming majority will exercise their ballot responsibly and conscientiously. The small group that practices and preaches coercion and violence should be handled within the framework of our existing laws. They should not be allowed to influence a decision as to whether the great majority of their fellows shall have the rights that a free society grants to its citizens.

Hard to Tell Sheep from Goat When Both Use Same Rhetoric

By John P. Roche

LIFE THESE DAYS is pretty complicated. From the mail that comes in, it seems that one thing we desperately need in American politics is some new recognition signals—the equivalent of IFF (identification: friend or foe) radar. For example, a reader writes: "The other night I accidentally turned on a radio program and heard someone bitterly denouncing 'Kosher Nationalism' and 'Jew imperialism.' I thought the American Nazis had seized the station, but it turned out to be a Black Panther at a left-wing rally."

Another correspondent, equally perplexed, noted that he was reading an article vigorously defending the power of the President to engage in hostilities without a formal declaration of war by Congress. He assumed it was written by Sen. John Tower, but discovered at the conclusion that in fact the author was Sen. William Fulbright—in an earlier manifestation.

Obviously something has to be done to get our contemporary categories sorted out. In every historical period there are litmus tests designed to separate the sheep from the goats. Right after World War II, for instance, we had a lot of Communist problems in the liberal movement. Disciplined party caucuses tried to infiltrate and capture various liberal organizations. If one started accusing the CP of colonization, he was immediately denounced as a "Red-baiter" and later, a "McCarthyite."

It became essential to force the infiltrators to identify themselves. For this purpose anti-Communist liberals devised an amendment which, in one form or another, could be used in virtually all situations. The party faction in a group would introduce, say, a motion condemning loyalty oaths for teachers. We would introduce a simple amendment, a preamble stating: "While we disapprove of teachers who accept totalitarian discipline from either the right or the left" . . . The condemnation of loyalty oaths would follow. Although they were crazy not to roll with the punch, the Communists were under orders that any attack on the Soviet Union had to be opposed.

The vote on this one invariably provided a hard head-count. It differentiated the cadres from the confused fellow travelers.

In 1948, when Henry Wallace provided the Communists with a sacrificial offering, one could always turn a Progressive Party meeting inside out by moving that the group support "self-determination for Macedonia."

Most Progressive Party supporters were innocents who would vote self-determination in two minutes for anybody who asked for it. They were always baffled when their Communist ideological guardians went up in smoke about the Macedonians, not realizing that "self-determination for Macedonia" was a "vicious Trotskyist, Bukharinite, anti-socialist slogan"—that is, Tito was behind it.

THERE ARE SOME recognition signals around today, but they tend to be fairly esoteric.

You can, for instance, instantly fragment a New Left youth meeting by advocating "spontaneity": This sends the orthodox Communists up one wall, the orthodox Trotskyites up another, the Castro-Maoites up a third, and the authentic crazies up still a fourth. Or, suggest that American Negroes are an "oppressed colonial people awaiting national liberation," and watch the fun.

But these are inadequate for our needs. Our basic problem is how to tell a "radical" from a "reactionary," and the old standards are clearly obsolete.

I would welcome suggestions from readers with the hope that some time in the near future a column can be used to set out the best proposals. After all, when you are not sure whether you are listening to a Nazi or a Panther, something urgent must be done.

Safety Commission's Findings:

Unsafe Products Leave a Trail Of Needless Deaths, Injuries

By Sidney Margolius

A MOTHER HEARS a horrible scream and runs to the glass entranceway to her home. There she sees her son on his hands and knees in a pool of blood with a jagged piece of glass sliding toward his head like a guillotine.

Another family turns off its color TV set and goes to bed. During the night the husband finds the living room in flames. His wife is disabled, her mother dead of the fire's effects.

A little girl scalded by the steam from a vaporizer that tipped over spends five months in a hospital enduring a series of operations. An infant is strangled by the straps of his own crib. A young man using a power saw loses a thumb when the saw kicks back. Another receives a shock from a power saw, drops it and his thigh is slashed. A boy watching a friend use a power mower is struck by a rock hurtled from the discharge opening. He now is blind in one eye.

Each year some 20 million people are injured, 110,000 permanently disabled and 30,000 killed in and around American homes by such accidents, the National Commission on Product Safety established by Congress has just reported after a two-year investigation.

As one of the seven commissioners appointed to make this investigation, I was shocked by what we found. I had reported on hazardous products often in the past 25 years: TV sets that caught fire or electrocuted people; table radios and power tools that also had electrocuted some users; amusement devices in parks that leaked electricity, and others.

But the situation was much worse than I had realized.

Every hour of the day, on the average, household hazards kill three victims, the commission finds. For every one killed, more than 1,000 suffer injuries. Injuries around schools and homes or in recreational areas add to these numbers. There are twice as many people injured at home as at work; four times as many as on the highways (although highway accidents produce more fatalities).

Many of these injuries are due to personal carelessness or to non-product home hazards such as slippery floors, torn carpets, dangerous stairways, etc.

But the undeniable fact that emerged is that a large number of the injuries are due to defective or poorly-designed products, and are entirely needless and could have been averted.

Falls from ladders, for example, usually are blamed on the user. But some of the ladders on the market are unnecessarily flimsy and inadequate. No one should stick his hand under the housing of a rotary mower or into a running washing machine or the rollers of a wringer. But sometimes children and even adults do exactly that.

Washers can have safety cutoff lids which stop the motor if the lid is lifted, as some do, and automatic releases on wringers. Vaporizers can be made more stable and even can employ a cool mist instead of steam. Rotary mowers can have baffles to deflect rocks. TV transformers can be made of non-combustible materials. Power tools can be doubly insulated. Aerosol cans can have a pressure release valve.

Despite counter-claims of some manufacturers that user carelessness is mainly at fault, there is no doubt, the commission reports, that the single most dependable step to reduce these injuries most quickly is to require that products be made safer.

At present, in most products, manufacturers design the way they want. Many times we found that some products were made to be safer than others of the same type. Among the more dangerous products, manufacturers often had given more attention to appearance, ease of assembly-line production or other factors than to safety. In other cases it was obvious that manufacturers, including foreign producers selling here, were trying to save some dollars or even dimes. In still other cases there were oversights in design due primarily to lack of adequate testing and evaluation before putting products on the market.

For some products manufacturers have attempted to set voluntary standards. But these often have tended to be low to encourage the majority of manufacturers to go along. Sometimes there has been outright foolery. Manufacturers claimed to meet industry standards. But there was no impartial third party to make sure they did, and at least some of these products were lacking in adequate safety.

The only real safeguard you have at present from unnecessarily hazardous products, besides the varying abilities and integrity of manufacturers, is the manufacturer's legal liability. He can be sued. But many people can be hurt while enough lawsuits accumulate to force a manufacturer to change or withdraw a hazardous product, or convince his insurance company to drop his liability insurance.

For that reason, the commission's main recommendation to Congress is that manufacturers be asked to set and observe standards for safe design and construction in those products shown to be especially hazardous. If manufacturers in those industries fail to establish adequate standards, on a voluntary basis, the government would step in and develop mandatory product safety standards.

For this and other needed purposes, such as stopping the sale and requiring recall of products which violate such federal safety standards, the commission recommended that Congress establish a permanent product safety commission.

What is especially upsetting is that much of this chamber of needless horrors was known long before this commission was appointed. The Public Health Service long has known about the widespread injuries from such products as power mowers, glass doors, unvented gas heaters and floor furnaces, bikes without adequate reflective material, and other hazardous products.

But the PHS never effectively brought these hazards to public attention. It did try generalized "education" to warn the public. It also spent much of its effort negotiating and discussing with manufacturers, but with neither the push of law nor the pull of aroused public opinion behind it.

Many of these hazards also were spotlighted by the original Senate Commerce Committee hearings chaired by Sen. Warren D. Magnuson (D-Wash.) which led to the product safety commission's investigation.

Labor Moves to Link Interests Of Younger and Older Workers

YOUNG PEOPLE are pressing for change today, just as they have in every generation, declared AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis in a network interview.

Unlike the past, today's drive is "accented" by a "movement that is identified as a young people's movement," Davis said.

"In the Thirties, when the trade union movement really got going, people of all ages were involved" in the specific issues of "exploitation of workers and the need to organize" unions, he noted. But then, as now, younger workers were primarily interested in "what goes into their paychecks" and older workers were more concerned with seniority, pensions and job security, he added.

Davis appeared on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Davis said the labor movement recognizes the need to "develop a link between the younger people and the older workers," and aims at that through such efforts as the AFL-CIO's Young Workers' School and conducting and encouraging internships within the federation and its affiliated international unions.

But, he pointed out, young workers motivated toward "going up the long leadership ladder" have to prove they can "cut the mustard" before their fellow union members will elect them to office. Many of them are doing this, he asserted: "We see younger people coming through all the time."

OF ALL THE SUBJECTS which one can dream up, one least likely to stir the flow of adrenalin in the average, healthy American citizen is the ceiling on the national debt.

It would be a good idea not to be deceived, though. The debt ceiling issue wraps up a good many of the most meaningful and heated national and international issues into one package.

You can take your choice—the war in Indochina, unemployment, inflation, corporate profits, high interest rates, gyrations of the stock market, defense spending, the decline of the rate of economic growth—and all of these issues are related to the national debt.

The immediate proposal before the Congress is to raise the temporary federal debt ceiling by $18 billion—from $377 billion to $395 billion.

The House has already approved the increase but action in the Senate is being held up while debate goes on over the war.

Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told the House that increasing the ceiling "makes it possible for the government to meet its financial obligations during the next fiscal year . . . whereas the government would not be able to do so without passage of this legislation."

Defense spending, of course, is a factor in the federal debt problem. Outlays in the defense area have gone up $25 billion in the past five years and a $50 billion increase in the gross federal debt in the same period. However, the entire economic program of the Administration played a significant role in the budget deficit.

Mills pointed out during the House debate on raising the ceiling that the deficit for fiscal year 1971 is not $1.3 billion, as the Administration reports, but about $10 billion. And the deficit for fiscal 1970 is $11 billion.

The Administration is using what is called a "unified budget." This includes trust funds such as Social Security and which have a surplus of some $8 billion annually. Said Mills: "The unified budget is highly misleading . . . it is not a good tool for measuring the balance or imbalance in the federal government's own operations which it carries on for others in a fiduciary capacity."

THE RATHER STARTLING deficit of $10 billion and $11 billion in the last two fiscal years is not unrelated to the Administration's own economic policies.

Take high interest rates, for example. The federal government is paying higher interest on its own borrowings than at any time since the Civil War. Over the past year, interest on three-month U.S. Treasury bills and taxable bonds have risen 18 percent while interest rates on 3-to-5 year Treasury issues have risen more than 25 percent.

Result: It's costing the federal government $1 billion more annually, just for the interest on the national debt, than it had budgeted.

Unemployment, which is now 5 percent of the work force, is costing the Treasury in several ways. One is that unemployment insurance is up $500 million over the year. More than that, an unemployment rate of 5 percent means a loss in goods and services of about $45 billion a year, according to a study by the Democratic Study Group. This costs the government enormously in lower tax receipts.

The Administration did not include full postal pay increases in its February budget for fiscal 1971. This is estimated at $1.4 billion. Altogether, the Administration budget for fiscal 1971, as estimated last February, was about $4.8 billion too low.

It seems unlikely that Congress will be willing to forego raising the ceiling. The denial of Social Security benefits, to name one very real reason, would mean too great a hardship.

The debate over the ceiling, though, has brought to light facts which too few Americans know a great deal about.

ABILITY, NOT AGE, is the path to leadership in the labor movement, AFL-CIO Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, center, said on Labor News Conference. Interviewing him on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Stanley Levey, left, of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. Labor News Conference is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Rapid Growth Cited In Fringe Benefits

Fringe benefits are the most rapidly expanding products of union-management contracts, the AFL-CIO American Federationist reports in the current issue.

All types of fringes have grown for all workers, the magazine says—paid vacations and holidays, health and welfare plans, pensions, premium pay for overtime and as shift bonuses, employer expenditures for social security and other legally required insurance programs.

The Federationist article, by Economist Rudolph Oswald and Research Assistant J. Douglas Smith of the federation's Dept. of Research, cites these developments:

- Fringe benefits for factory workers grew more than twice as fast as straight-time pay during the past nine years.
- Benefits paid in the past 30 years to all workers in the private non-farm economy soared from 5 percent of total compensation to 19.6 percent.
- In 1968 alone, fringe benefits for production and maintenance workers in manufacturing were 22.6 percent of total compensation.
- The largest increase in private fringe benefit spending by employers has been in health and welfare plans.

The authors base their findings on Labor Dept. surveys for 1966 and 1968, although 1968 figures are not complete. They note that, while the figures are national averages for groups of workers and "cannot be applied accurately to the benefit costs in a given industry or company, some significant trends and comparisons" can be drawn.

In 1968, the article says, factory workers drew an average of $3.69 per working hour in straight-time wages and fringe benefits. Of that total, 77.4 percent or $2.86 was in straight-time pay and 22.6 percent, or 83 cents, in fringe benefits that included premium pay for overtime and late shift work.

During 1969 and early 1970, many fringe benefits were liberalized. Some two thirds of workers under renewed union contracts had improved health and welfare benefits, while another two-fifths had improvements in paid vacations, holidays and pension plans during 1969.

Health, accident and life insurance benefits were provided through union contracts for more than 90 percent of all factory workers during 1968. Employers contributed 3.1 percent of hourly compensation—12 cents per working hour—for one or more benefits like medical and surgical coverage, hospitalization, sick and accident benefits, or life insurance and accidental death and dismemberment benefits.

Most factory workers, the Labor Dept. studies found, were covered by non-contributory insurance plans. Under these plans, employer contributions were about twice as large as the amounts paid to contributory plans by employers.

Private pension and retirement plans covered more than 60 percent of all factory workers during 1968. Spending for these plans averaged 10 cents an hour for all factory workers but 14 cents an hour in plants where such plans actually existed.

For all factory workers, including those without pension coverage, private pension plans accounted for 2.6 percent of total compensation.

In union plants, benefit levels for almost all items of compensation were substantially higher than in non-union plants. For example, pension plan contributions in union plants during 1966 were double those in non-union plants — 10 cents vs. 5 cents per working hour.

Plants in which a majority of workers were covered by union agreements accounted for some 60 percent of production and maintenance workers in manufacturing in 1968.

As a result, the authors report, compensation practices for all factory workers have been heavily influenced by collective bargaining settlements.

VIETNAMESE LABOR MEDAL is presented to Fernand E. Audie, right, by South Viet Nam's Labor Minister Dam Sy Hien. Audie was decorated in recognition of his two-year tour of duty as the South Vietnamese director of the AFL-CIO Asian-American Free Labor Institute program.

Steelworkers Press Federal Health Plan

A federal health insurance program was termed by Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers "the only way that all American people can have access to adequate medical care."

Abel told the USWA Washington conference on the Crisis in Medical Care that the high cost of present inadequate coverage can no longer be supported on a voluntary basis.

"Medical care is a basic human right," he declared. "Every person regardless of his race, economic station or where he lives, is entitled to receive all the medical care he needs to keep him well and healthy."

Medical care services are becoming more difficult to get and costs continue to rise, Abel noted. And as usual, the poor bear the greatest burden of this disaster, he added.

"In this worsening situation, and despite his own pleas for action, the President insists on cuts in the federal government's budgets for health activities," Abel stressed.

Abel said in his opening remarks to the conference that the Administration and the labor movement are "poles apart" on how government-sponsored health insurance programs should be financed. This became evident with the Administration's recent proposals on welfare reform, he noted.

"We welcome any effort to relieve the financial burdens of welfare recipients and the medically indigent," he said but added "it is impossible to see how forcing the medically indigent to pay up to $500 per year for medical care insurance can be considered as providing them any financial relief."

Abel noted that the Steelworkers at their first convention in 1937 passed a resolution that health for members and their families was one of the union's most important goals—and that those goals remain just as important and urgent today.

"The union's first task was to see to it that Steelworkers could pay for their families' health care," he said. "Its second task was to assure that health care would be available wherever Steelworkers lived and worked. These basic goals have never changed."

Continued support must be given to developing prepaid group practice plans, Abel stressed.

"These plans are essential even in the absence of a national health insurance plan. They will be equally essential as one important means of delivering medical care under a national health insurance plan," he declared.

Abel warned of the effects of cuts in federal health care budgets and rising medical costs.

"Unless these trends are reversed fast," he said, "it is difficult to see how serious social conflicts will be avoided."

Court Ruling On Wage Law Aided 100,000

to hold overtime pay in escrow during the court test and state employes subsequently received it as back pay. Moran now estimates that in the two years, a total of $8 million in back wages has been paid by 41 states and Puerto Rico.

The provisions of the original FLSA amendments called for a minimum wage of $1 an hour effective in 1967 and rising in steps to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1971. The present minimum is $1.45 an hour.

"The need for this coverage by employes of state and local governments has been amply demonstrated," Moran said. "For example, our investigators found one case in which laborers in public hospitals and schools were being paid as little as $150 per month. Many of them were working 48 or more hours per week."

The overtime provisions of the 1966 amendments also came in steps, but have now reached maturity, requiring time and one-half pay for all hours over 40 worked in a week. The overtime provision reduced the number of hours required from 44 the first year to 42 in 1968 and 40 in 1969, or 80 hours over two weeks for hospital workers with erratic schedules.

At the time the Supreme Court decision was handed down, it was held that "it is clear that labor conditions in schools and hospitals can affect commerce." The court cited the state of Maryland's own admission that it spent as much as 87 percent of its $8 million school supply budget in interstate commerce.

In summarizing the activities of his department in the two years, Moran said that most states have willingly accepted the federal regulations.

A few states are still not in compliance with the law, however, and Moran said that the Labor Dept. "may" seek enforcement action against them.

Stone, Glass Unions Urge Import Curbs

Seven unions representing 250,000 workers in the stone, glass and clay industries urged restrictions on imports to prevent serious damage to the U.S. economy.

Howard P. Chester, testifying at House hearings on behalf of the AFL-CIO Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee, cited the fate of the U.S. pottery industry as an example of the impact of low-wage imports.

Since 1954, Chester told the House Ways & Means Committee, 21 pottery plants have shut down and employment has dropped from 12,000 workers to 3,600. He said similar cutbacks of U.S. employment have hit the glassware, sheet glass, cement and ceramic tile industries.

The U.S. trade policy, he urged, should be geared to achieve "maximum employment and healthy industries." Chester proposed that the U.S. invoke a section of the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade that enables a member nation to impose restrictions on imports "to prevent a serious decline in its foreign exchange reserves and maintain equilibrium of its balance of payments."

The seven-union committee is headed by Pres. Lee W. Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers. Its other affiliates are the Flint Glass Workers; Potters; Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers; Glass & Ceramic Workers; Stone Workers, and Window Glass Cutters.

ILO Approves $700,000 Subsidy To Continue Skill Training Center

Geneva—Worker delegates won a major victory at the International Labor Organization's annual conference when $700,000 was voted for a vocational training center in Turin, Italy, which was threatened with extinction for lack of funds.

By a vote of 289-45, with 32 abstentions, the conference voted the subsidy to allow 2,500 trainees from developing countries to continue training at the center.

The U.S. labor delegation, led by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, helped rally support for the action.

Similarly, the conference adopted a resolution calling for training programs to give young persons "the necessary skills to adapt to the pace of a changing society and take an active part in the development of their country." Miles Stanley, president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, served on the committee which drafted the guidelines on youth employment and training.

Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, defended the trade union movements in South Viet Nam and Israel against attacks made on them by delegates from Communist countries.

Faupl said that despite a war in their country, South Viet Nam unions are "certainly more independent" than those in the Communist countries. Faupl said similar attacks on Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, were "outrageous" because Histadrut is the "foremost example in a developing country of a vigorous, democratic, progressive trade union movement."

Faupl also called on the 1,100 participants from 121 member states to rededicate the ILO to the principles of freedom and justice on which it was founded.

Labor Fights Bias

Faupl, a member of the Machinists, said the American labor movement has been involved in the war on poverty and "one way we in the AFL-CIO have fought poverty is in our unflagging struggle to wipe out any remaining vestiges of racial and religious discrimination in our country."

Faupl praised the election of Joseph Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, as chairman of the ILO worker delegates. "No one is more dedicated to the improvement of the welfare and the freedom of workers all over the world," Faupl said of Morris.

In other actions, the three-week conference adopted a document calling for updating of the ILO's work in the field of occupational diseases; urged an international pact among governments to set minimum wages "with force of law" and called on the ILO to back worker education institutions which are operated by trade unions or have their full support.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman was on the committee on occupational diseases. That report called for measures to protect workers subject to deafness from excessive noise on the job.

Isadore Katz Dies, Noted Union Attorney

Great Neck, N.Y.—Isadore Katz, lawyer who once served as counsel to the former Hosiery Workers, the Textile Workers Union of America, the United Textile Workers and other unions, died at Long Island Jewish Hospital after a long illness. He was 68.

Katz was TWUA general counsel from the union's founding in 1939 until 1952. Later he entered private practice and represented a number of labor clients.

Safety Commission Cites Product Perils

Home safety hazards that kill 30,000 Americans every year, cause 20 million injuries and cost the nation $5.5 billion can be reduced at very little cost, the National Commission on Product Safety told Pres. Nixon and Congress.

The commission, headed by New York attorney Arnold B. Elkind, went out of business after recommending all-inclusive federal safety legislation and a permanent separate government agency to deal exclusively with product safety.

Elkind was the first witness to testify before the Senate Commerce Committee on a bill by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) and others the day after the final report was made

Magnuson told the press "this is one national commission whose recommendations will lead" to "prompt, adequate congressional action."

The Elkind commission, which included labor consumer columnist Sidney Margolius, made a two-year study of home safety hazards. (See Margolius article on Page 5)

It named 16 categories of products found to be unreasonably hazardous; cited the failing in industry's present voluntary system of setting safety standards; examined federal, state and local laws on product safety; described new techniques in reporting product-related injuries, and advocated federal authority for mandatory safety standards with a wide range of penalties for violators.

The commission's final report said preventable hazards "must be controlled and limited, not at the option of the producer but as a matter of right to the consumer."

Elkind told newsmen that home accidents cause the death of four times as many persons as highway accidents.

The 167-page official report, plus a 33-page copy of a proposed Consumer Product Safety Act, lists product groupings in which "some types and models were found to be unreasonable hazards:"

Architectural glass (shower enclosures, sliding glass doors, storm doors etc.), color television sets found to be prone to fire hazards, fireworks, floor furnaces "which are gas-fired and reach searing temperatures," glass bottles, high-rise bicycles, hot water vaporizers, household chemicals, infant furniture, children's toys, ladders, power tools, protective headgear, rotary mowers, unvented gas heaters, wringer washing machines.

The report says "studies of state and local laws reveal confusion. It is possible for manufacturers to sell a hazardous product" in some states but not in others. There is "no comprehensive authority within the federal government to protect the consumer. Too, there is confusion of jurisdiction."

The commission's recommendations are highlighted by the proposal that Congress pass legislation:

- Creating an independent Consumer Product Safety Commission as a federal agency concerned exclusively with the safety of consumer products.
- Empowering that agency to develop and set mandatory safety standards when necessary.
- Giving the commission power to enforce compliance with federal safety standards.
- Authorizing the agency to seek court injunctions against the sale of products which present unreasonable hazards or violate federal standards.

Other recommendations would give the commission authority to recall dangerous products; establish an injury information clearinghouse to report on product injuries and deaths; permit appointment by the President of a Consumer Safety Advocate or public ombudsman; accredit private testing laboratories and permit independent testing of risky products.

One proposal would permit injured consumers to file individual or class actions for treble damages in U. S. District Courts against manufacturers who intentionally violate federal safety standards.

The commission, established in 1967 by Pres. Johnson with the consent of Congress, had no authority to investigate automobile or transportation safety hazards. Elkind said he personally would favor giving the new agency such authority.

Backlog of Bills Puts Senate on 2 Shifts

President. He had asked $3.8 billion for all education programs for the fiscal year starting July 1; the House raised this to $4.1 billion; the Senate Appropriations Committee proposed a $4.5 billion figure, and pending amendments sought to add additional funds.

In one of its first actions on the legislation, the Senate knocked out by decisive margins a series of House amendments which civil rights groups charged would cripple federal efforts to achieve school desegregation.

One such amendment, struck from the bill by a 53-27 vote, would have prohibited use of federal funds for carrying out any desegregation plan that went beyond so-called "freedom of choice." The Supreme Court has knocked out as unconstitutional freedom of choice plans it found to be subterfuges to maintain racially segregated school systems.

When the Senate takes up the postal legislation, it faces a filibuster threat from Sen. Paul J. Fannin (R-Ariz.). He has served notice that he will insist on "extended debate"—a euphemism for a filibuster—unless the bill is amended to prohibit postal unions and management from negotiating a union shop.

The House adopted such a restriction, but the bill approved by the Senate Post Office Committee closely follows the original agreement negotiated by the Administration with the AFL-CIO and the seven unions holding exclusive bargaining rights for the nation's postal workers.

Under the version passed by the House, postal workers would receive a retroactive 8 percent raise but their bargaining authority would be less than in the original plan. However, the House did improve on the legislation drawn up by its Post Office Committee by making the issue of area wage differentials subject to bargaining.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, Senate leaders had not yet decided whether to try to schedule the postal bill for action before the Independence Day recess.

In other congressional developments:

- For the fifth year in a row, the House voted to deny funds to begin construction of the Dickey-Lincoln public power project in Maine.

New England pays the highest electric power rates in the nation—and private utilities have fought to block the project which has been endorsed by both Democratic and Republican administrations and strongly supported by the AFL-CIO and state central bodies in the New England states.

Once again, opposition was led by Rep. Robert Giaimo (D-Conn.), one of the few New England congressmen opposing cheaper power.

- The House approved a $1 billion appropriation to help clean up the nation's waterways through construction of waste treatment facilities. However, it voted down an amendment to raise the amount to the full $1.25 billion that Congress had authorized to be appropriated for the program.
- The House Banking Committee approved a bill authorizing $5 billion in federal assistance to city mass-transit systems over the next five years. If enacted, it would represent a major expansion of the program and would enable cities to make long-term plans to improve transit facilities. A somewhat smaller program has already been approved by the Senate.
- Adding $800 million to the Administration's legislative proposals, the House Commerce Committee approved a package of bills that would authorize $2 billion over the next three years to improve the delivery of health services. Included are expansion of mental health programs and centers, and research and medical training in the treatment of major diseases including—for the first time—kidney diseases.

House Votes To Override Veto by Nixon

preceded by an open veto threat, while the health facilities veto had not even been hinted in advance.

The veto was timed so as to ensure that it would receive skimpy press coverage. It was overshadowed by the simultaneous announcement that the President had signed the Voting Rights Act, leaving it up to the Supreme Court to pass on the constitutionality of the provision lowering the voting age to 18.

Republicans had joined with Democrats earlier this month to hail unanimous enactment of the health facilities bill, which made the veto doubly hard to swallow for GOP congressmen. They were being asked to confess that they had been irresponsible in voting for legislation which they had told their constituents was vitally needed to overcome a critical shortage of health facilities.

One of the new features of the bill would encourage construction of comprehensive health care facilities, such as those operated by prepaid group practice plans. Under the previous law, most health facilities eligible for federal aid had to be hospital-linked.

The Administration had sought to replace the grant program with a loan guarantee program.

Congress, instead, built on to the existing program an improved version of the Administration plan.

Despite the rebuff by the House, White House sources have been quoted as indicating that more presidential vetoes can be expected when Congress exceeds the Administration's spending proposals.

Democrats Pick Goldberg, Ottinger In Key New York Primary Races

New York Democrats have selected Arthur Goldberg to oppose Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and Rep. Richard L. Ottinger to oppose Sen. Charles Goodell. The New York primary also saw the defeat of three veteran Democratic congressmen.

Goldberg, 61, former Secretary of Labor, Supreme Court justice and UN ambassador, won the nomination with 52.4 percent of the vote over Howard Samuels, an assistant secretary of commerce in the Johnson Administration.

Ottinger, 41, won handily over Paul O'Dwyer, Theodore Sorenson and Rep. Richard D. McCarthy. Sorenson, a former aide to Pres. John F. Kennedy, had the "official" endorsement of the party's state convention, but finished third behind O'Dwyer.

State Sen. Basil Paterson, 44, became the first Negro to be nominated for statewide office in New York when he won the lieutenant governor's race over Jerome A. Ambro by the biggest margin of any candidate.

Adam Walinsky, 33, a former aide to the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, was nominated for attorney general and State Comptroller Arthur Levitt, the only Democrat holding statewide office, was unopposed.

The three Democratic congressmen defeated in the primary were Adam Clayton Powell, Leonard Farbstein and Jacob H. Gilbert.

Powell, 61, was defeated by some 200 votes by Charles Rangel, 40, a Democratic state assemblyman who also has the Republican nomination. Powell had represented the Harlem district for 24 years and recently regained his seat by court decision after being ousted by a House vote for misuse of funds. Until stripped of his seniority, he had been chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee.

Farbstein, 67, was beaten in Manhattan by Bella Abzug, a founder of Women Strike for Peace and also an activist in the women's liberation movement.

Gilbert lost to fellow congressman James H. Scheuer when redistricting put them together in the 22nd district in the Bronx. In the new district, Herman Badillo became the first Puerto Rican-born candidate to be nominated in a congressional race. Badillo, 40, is a former Bronx borough president.

Another incumbent, 66-year-old John J. Rooney, survived a strong challenge from 37-year-old Peter Eikenberry in a race in which students and peace groups had made Rooney a particular target.

The victory by Goldberg gives Rockefeller his first nationally-known Democratic opponent in his 12 years as governor. The Goldberg-Paterson ticket will also have the nomination of the Liberal Party.

Ottinger, who conducted a well-financed television campaign, will face both Goodell and Conservative Party candidate James L. Buckley, brother of conservative columnist William F. Buckley, in the fall. Goodell has the Liberal Party nomination.

Nixon Names Silberman to Hodgson's Post

The Labor Dept.'s top lawyer—Solicitor Laurence H. Silberman—has been nominated by Pres. Nixon to become Under Secretary of Labor.

Silberman was named to take over the No. 2 spot in the Labor Dept. from James D. Hodgson, who will become Secretary of Labor July 1 when Sec. George P. Shultz moves to the new post of director of the Office of Management & Budget.

Silberman, 34, has been the department's solicitor since May 1969. Earlier, he was a lawyer with the National Labor Relations Board in Washington.

Before coming to Washington in 1967, Silberman specialized in labor-management law in Honolulu as a management lawyer.

Moving up to solicitor will be Peter G. Nash, 33, who has been associate solicitor.

Farm Union Wins New Grape Pacts

Drive Gains 37 Contracts In 3 Months

Bakersfield, Calif.—The AFL-CIO Farm Workers quickly followed up their recent historic breakthrough by winning contract benefits at 12 additional table grape ranches in California and Arizona, including some of the region's biggest producers and best-known brands.

The new crop of agreements—bringing the total to 37 since April—means that the organizing drive begun five years ago by Cesar Chavez and the AFL-CIO has put the union label on 25 per cent of all the eating-grapes produced in the two-state area.

AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher reported that four days of 14-hour-a-day negotiations produced these latest UFWOC achievements:

- Two of the new contract signers own well over 1 million acres of California and Arizona farmlands—the largest growers yet to agree to union terms.
- One signer holds the largest diversified acreage in the two-state area.
- Close to 12,000 union members will be working in table grapes during the 1970 harvest.
- For the first time, growers in the San Joaquin Valley signed union contract agreements for agricultural workers on 13,000 acres of rich fruitland. Other contract signers farm 6,000 acres in the Coachella Valley and 2,000 acres around Phoenix.

Business Week magazine reported the breakthrough as "A Harvest Nears for Cesar Chavez," declaring that the union has "begun to succeed" even though "growers who opposed the union so bitterly for so long can hardly believe it."

The magazine quotes the owner of a 50,000-acre farm who signed with the UFWOC after having bitterly fought organization as saying, "Sooner or later, most farm workers will be working under union contracts."

He sat down with Chavez for the first time, Business Week reported, after the UFWOC struck his peach orchards and "we just could not get people to cross those picket lines and thin peaches."

Kircher told the AFL-CIO News that the first thing growers are asking when they sign the union con-

Meany Asks Solidarity on Civil Rights

"The alliance between the civil rights movement and the labor movement must be made stronger and more effective than ever," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged.

In a message to the 61st annual convention of the NAACP, Meany said "there is no time for further delay or experimentation if we are going to put America back to work." He called on the Administration to arrest the downhill slide of the U.S. economy.

Citing some of the gains made by the combined efforts of the labor movement and civil rights groups, Meany cautioned that "our common task is far from finished."

"To recognize progress is not to indicate satisfaction," Meany said. "Much more remains to be done."

Health Care Facilities Bill Passed Over Nixon Veto

WHEN CAN we get the bird? That's the question western growers are asking as they sign contracts with the United Farm Workers. The "bird," is the union label thunderbird insignia which consumers have been insisting on. More than one million acres of farmland are represented in contracts being signed here. ## 76-19 Vote By Senate Is Clincher

Congress overrode a presidential veto for the first time in 10 years to insist that more federal money be spent to build and modernize hospitals, outpatient clinics and other medical care facilities.

The President had termed the labor-backed legislation "fiscally irresponsible," claiming that it would force him to spend whatever Congress appropriated for key health care programs and upset the Administration's budget priorities.

The Senate, in a stinging 76-19 vote to override the veto, said in effect that was exactly what it intended to do. Only 19 Republicans voted to uphold the President, while 23 Republican senators joined with a solid Democratic contingent to repass the bill over the President's objections.

Earlier, the House had voted 279-98 to override the veto. Both the House and Senate votes were well over the two-thirds majority required by the Constitution. (House rollcall on Page 6; Senate rollcall on Page 7.)

The legislation authorized up to $2.79 billion in grants and loans over a three-year period. However, the money must still be appropriated in separate legislation and Congress frequently appropriates less than the ceiling set by the authorization bill. Actually, the White House claim that language in the vetoed bill compels the President to spend the full amount took some senators and congressmen by surprise, since the power of Con-

'Right-to-Work' Amendment Beaten:

Senate-Approved Postal Bill Retains Union Shop Rights

The Senate soundly defeated a "right-to-work" amendment and passed a postal pay, reorganization and collective bargaining bill that gives postal workers and management the right to negotiate a union shop.

The legislation is now scheduled to go to a conference committee, to be reconciled with the version passed by the House in early June.

Both bills provide an 8 percent raise for postal workers, retroactive to Apr. 16, establish a largely autonomous postal service in place of the present Cabinet department, guarantee that postal workers will be able to move from their starting pay to the top salary step in not more than eight years, and provide for collective bargaining and disputes-settling procedures.

The Senate version is somewhat closer to the agreement that the AFL-CIO and seven postal unions negotiated with the Administration in April.

While the original legislation specified that the 8 percent raise would become effective when the bill became law, the Senate joined the House in backdating the increase to compensate for the legislative delay. A 6 percent pay raise for all federal employes, including postal workers, was enacted earlier this year, retroactive to late December of 1969.

Under the negotiated agreement, collective bargaining in the new United States Postal Service was to follow as closely as possible the practices in private industry. That meant that a union shop could be negotiated for all states which do not have "right-to-work" laws making the open shop compulsory.

The House knocked out this provision and Senate opponents of the union shop sought to do the same.

It was soundly beaten on a voice vote.

Earlier, the Senate had a rollcall test on the same issue. It came when a labor-opposed motion was pending to substitute the House bill for the bill sent to the floor by the Senate Post Office Committee.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) proposed to amend the House bill by restoring the language permitting negotiation of a union

Court Asked to Flunk Job Test on Proverbs

What's in a proverb?

Nothing that has anything to do with an industrial worker's job qualifications, according to the Steelworkers.

The U.S. Supreme Court, at the union's urging, agreed to review a lower court decision which found that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was wrong when it ruled that an ability test must be job-related. The commission said a "general intelligence test" used by the Duke Power Co. at Draper, N.C., was discriminatory.

In a friend of the court brief, the Steelworkers backed up the complaint filed by a group of Negro employes by citing this question on the Wonderlic Personnel Test used by the company:

"Two of the following proverbs have similar meanings. Which ones are they?

"1. Perfect valor is to do without witnesses what one would do before the world.

"2. Valor and boastfulness never buckle on the same sword.

"3. The better part of valor is discretion.

Enforcement Of Safety Laws Urged in Idaho

Lewiston—The Idaho State AFL-CIO called for strict enforcement of existing state safety laws so as to provide increased on-the-job protection of workers. Delegates to the federation's 12th annual convention also urged that salaries of state safety inspectors be increased.

Congressional passage of federal occupational health and safety legislation was termed vital to all the nation's workers as the convention adopted a resolution calling for Idaho senators and congressmen to support the measures.

The convention also endorsed passage of the proposed constitutional amendment that would provide for the direct election of the President.

Needed improvements in the Idaho public transportation system were urged by delegates. They called for development of "an adequate and modern basic rail passenger service system" and integrating schedules and fares with bus and airline transportation.

The convention voted to enlarge the federation's executive board from four to six members, effective with the next year's convention when two additional members will be elected. Officers and board members serve two-year terms.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Robert W. MacFarlane reported that the federation has increased its membership since the 1969 convention by 1,500 members. The current membership is more than 17,500.

Delegates opposed a move in Idaho that calls for cutting the $200 monthly salaries and per diem allowances of state legislators. They also opposed an attempt to cut back the length of the legislative sessions.

Negro Leaders Ask U.S. Jets, Aid for Israel

More than 60 national Negro leaders have urged the United States to send jets to Israel and called on black Americans to support Israel's right to exist "for the same reasons that we have struggled for freedom and equality in this country."

They signed a statement backing the struggle of Israel on an appeal from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph. The statement appeared as an advertisement in the New York Times and the Washington Post.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of A. Philip Randolph Institute which sponsored the advertisement, noted that the "traditional Negro-Jewish alliance for social justice still prevails . . . despite certain false notions to the contrary."

In addition to urging the United States to provide Israel with the full number of jet aircraft it has requested, the black leaders called on the U.S. government "to use its great influence to help bring the Israelis and the Arabs to the conference table where they can work out among themselves a just and negotiated settlement."

Stage Employes Elect New Vice President

New York—Board members of the Theatrical Stage Employes voted to name Paul G. Robertson of Miami, Fla., a vice president of IATSE. He fills a vacancy created by the election of former Vice Pres. John A. Forde as secretary-treasurer last August.

Robertson is business agent of Operators Local 316, and formerly was that local's president. He has been a delegate to IATSE conventions also since 1962.

UNION-LABEL GRAPES are distributed at the Newspaper Guild convention in Seattle by Dale Van Pelt, area grape boycott director for the United Farm Workers. Accepting a bunch is Stella Roberts, chairman of the ANG's resolutions committee, which reported out a resolution urging support of the UFWOC boycott of nonunion grapes and the purchase of union-label grapes.

Hospital Strike Averted By $30 Wage Increase

New York—Nonprofessional workers came within minutes of picketing 33 hospitals and nursing homes when the League of Voluntary Hospitals, representing management, offered pay hikes of $30 a week and other benefits in a new two-year contract.

A committee of 1,000 union delegates, waiting overnight in a nearby hall, voted to approve the offer and cancel the strike call. Members of Drug & Hospital Employes Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, they sent the offer to a referendum of the local's 25,000 members.

The union, which won its first $100 minimum two years ago, had sought a $140 wage floor. The settlement was reached on the basis of a first-year increase of $18 a week or 15 percent, whichever is higher, and an additional $12 or 10 percent a year hence.

That would raise the minimum wage to $130 by next July 1 for the lowest-paid worker. Technical, professional and clerical workers will get raises as high as $60 over the term, the union said.

The $30 raise equaled the total wage won by the union 11 years ago when hospital employes got their first minimum.

The new pact calls for a cost-of-living bonus if the Consumer Price Index rises by more than 6 percent in the first contract year. It provides for employer payment to 2 percent of gross payroll into a dental and drug prescription plan, in addition to the 5 percent now paid into a medical expense fund.

Also offered were 12 paid holidays including the late Martin Luther King's birthday anniversary; and improvements in the night pay differential, vacations, severance pay and sick leave.

Management agreed to grant a voluntary payroll deduction for sums owed the employes' credit union, and to continue unchanged its 5 percent contribution toward the pension fund.

The agreement was reached with the assistance of State Mediation Board Chairman Vincent D. McDonnell.

Negotiations on a new contract began Mar. 30. When the July 1 deadline approached without much progress, nearly 20,000 union members staged orderly demonstrations in front of their own places of work during their lunch period.

The hospitals made a new offer of a 6 percent pay hike in each year of a three-year contract. Union negotiators rejected it, and the employers then proposed a two-year pact with an 8 percent increase the first year, 7 the second.

Union members prepared picket signs and were assigned to strike stations when the final offer was made. A New York state law prohibits strikes by hospital workers, and the last minute settlement avoided a court battle over the issue of an injunction.

Minority Hiring Spurred:

Guild Votes Drive To End Sex Bias

Seattle—The Newspaper Guild's 37th annual convention mobilized the union for an intensified effort to end discrimination against women in the newspaper industry and to promote the recruitment and training of Negroes and other minorities.

The convention authorized a national Guild conference in the fall on sex discrimination and a Guild-sponsored conference on minority hiring in the spring in which management organizations, other employe groups, government agencies and private foundations will be invited to participate.

It also approved new bargaining proposals to help protect newsmen faced with efforts to force disclosure of their sources, notes or film, and authorized ANG officers to invite the American Civil Liberties Union to convene a conference of media management and employes' organizations to establish a legal-aid fund for subpoenaed newsmen.

John de J. Pemberton, Jr., executive director of the ACLU, said in an address to the convention that the civil liberties group would welcome such an invitation.

The convention adopted a resolution calling on Congress to "come to grips with its constitutional responsibilities" and "take immediate action to bring about a just peace as quickly as possible in Southeast Asia, including an immediate withdrawal of U.S. armed forces."

And adding a new dimension to the Guild's bargaining program, the convention recommended that locals pursue employes' quests for a greater voice in the product of their work through contractual grievance channels.

Delegates voted to intensify long-standing Guild programs aimed at racial discrimination in the newspaper industry and to extend the Guild's fight against sexual discrimination along a wide front.

They directed Guild officers and locals to conduct an aggressive campaign to open press-club memberships and press boxes to women, urged protests against irrelevant sexual as well as racial allusions in news stories and upgraded nondiscrimination clauses from bargaining recommendations to mandatory bargaining proposals.

But the convention rejected a proposal for the appointment of a woman and a minority-group member to coordinate efforts to eliminate discrimination in each area. The proposal went down, 277 to 94, in a rollcall vote.

In other steps, the convention raised the Guild's wage goal to $400 for key experienced employes in editorial, advertising and circulation departments and to at least $200 for other adult classifications. And it increased the ceilings on the Guild's minimum-dues and assessment schedules, raising payments in higher salary brackets.

The convention reaffirmed support of the two and one-half year strike against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, noting that "for the first time in months, actual bargaining appears to be in prospect." And it urged locals to support the Farm Workers' boycott of nonunion grapes while promoting the purchase of union-label grapes.

Other resolutions called for increased use of recycled newsprint to curb waste and resulting environmental pollution and urged adoption of a national health-insurance program.

Responding to an appeal by the Guild's Victoria, B.C., local and ANG Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., the convention directed the International Executive Board to study suggestions for a new name that would reflect "the truly international composition of the American Newspaper Guild and its comprehensive coverage of workers in the various news media and related fields." The IEB was directed to make a firm recommendation on a new name to next year's convention.

ILO Finds Civil Liberties Essential To Exercise of Trade Union Rights

Geneva—The annual conference of the International Labor Organization ended its session here by calling for action to insure "full and universal respect for trade union rights in their broadest sense."

The assembly of worker, employer and government delegates from 111 ILO member states declared that the absence of civil liberties "removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights."

Adopted by a unanimous conference vote, the action resolution called on other UN agencies to recognize the "relationship which exists between trade union rights and civil liberties."

The normal exercise of trade union rights is possible only when workers are assured such democratic hallmarks as free speech, the right to assemble, freedom from arbitrary arrest, guarantees of a fair trial and the right to "seek, receive and impart information and ideas," the conference said. It also spelled out a number of guarantees from the right to strike to the protection of union funds and assets "against intervention by the public authorities."

Greek government delegates walked out of the conference when the resolutions committee demanded that the Greek military regime free the "many trade unionists and workers (who) have been imprisoned in Greece, some without a fair trial, owing to their trade union activities."

Greek government spokesmen charged that the committee was guilty of a "flagrant violation" of Greek internal affairs when it found that "under present conditions the principles and standards of the ILO concerning freedom of association are no longer respected in Greece."

Endorsed in committee under a weighted voting system, the conference approved the resolution by a favorable 100-to-0 vote with Rudolph Faupl, head of the U.S. worker delegation, and other free workers giving it their unanimous support. But the measure was not officially listed as adopted because a sufficient number of government and employer delegates abstained in the vote to prevent a quorum from being reached.

A delegation of U.S. trade unionists, led by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, served on key ILO committees which drafted resolutions and action programs for the conference.

Continuing the ILO's traditional work of upgrading minimum worldwide standards, the conference adopted a new international accord guaranteeing at least three weeks' vacation with pay to anyone on the job for one year.

It also prepared a draft of an accord on the "protection and facilities" of trade union representatives at the shop level. The draft, to be approved in final form by next year's conference, is to insure that shop stewards "enjoy effective protection against any act prejudicial to them, including in particular dismissal."

In other action in the concluding days of the three-week session the conference set out an ILO program to provide job protection to older workers. Senior workers are faced by a "grave employment problem both in countries undergoing technological changes and in those now beginning their development," the conference found.

At a meeting following the conference's close, the ILO Governing Body elected Simeon O. Koku of Nigeria as its chairman for one year. A ministry of labor official, the new chairman succeeds Hector Gros Espiell of Uruguay. Joseph Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, was re-elected as the worker vice chairman of the 48-member committee.

The 'Bird' Goes to Market:

Farm Union Signs New Crop of Pacts

tract is, "When can we get the bird?"

The "bird" is the UFWOC thunderbird insignia, the union label that consumers insist on seeing before buying grapes at their local markets.

The union's success brought a proposal from Gov. Ronald Reagan (R), staunch friend of the growers, for a moratorium in the worldwide boycott of non-union grapes while his State Mediation Dept. works out "election procedures" with growers who have been battling the union since 1965.

At UFWOC headquarters in Delano, Calif., Chavez said the boycott of non-union grapes will continue until union contracts are signed by the holdout growers. Farm workers, he said, well remember the governor's hostile treatment of them down the years and the growers' subterfuge in refusing to deal with the union or to allow union members to vote in supervised elections.

The latest contract agreements, signed by Chavez for the union and Kircher for the AFL-CIO, incorporate the provisions of the three-year pact signed a week earlier with the James Macchiaroli Fruit Co. of Arizona.

Like the contracts previously signed with 25 table grape producers, they call for a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour, plus incentive pay per box; 10 cents an hour additional for the union's health services, medical clinic and welfare fund, and an additional 2 cents an hour or more into a severance fund for workers displaced because of age, health or ranch automation.

The growers likewise agreed to protect field hands against the use of "hard" pesticides which the workers consider dangerous.

The parties to the contracts agreed to drop all pending lawsuits. They agreed to hold representation elections among covered employes.

It was agreed that representatives of the Catholic bishops' committee, which brought the parties to the bargaining table last winter, may witness elections at the request of either party.

Kircher identified the signers of the latest agreement as the Kernland Farming Co., Heggblade-Marguleas Co. for its Arizona properties known as Rancho El Dorado, and also for its California properties; and the S.A. Camp Ginning Co., another fruit grower.

The agreement signed with this group in Bakersfield covers cultivators and harvesters of table, wine and commercial grapes immediately, and on Dec. 1 of plum field hands.

Others who signed are Coachella, Calif., Vineyards; Cy Mauradeck & Sons; Henry Maccharioli, Phoenix; and these table grape growers in the Arvin-Lamont areas of California:

Eugene Nalbandian Co., El Rancho Farms, William Mosesian Corp., Leo Gogosian Co., Elmco Vineyards, Poplar Grape Growers.

UFWOC said negotiations with the Bagdasarian Ranch in Coachella are close to completion.

Meany Warns Of Extremism, Hits Violence

New York—The great and critical issues which this country faces must not be settled in the streets, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a testimonial dinner to Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery here.

"We'll meet these problems, we'll keep on the pressure but not by going into the streets for violence," he asserted, adding:

"We have sympathy for the fact that our young people are not satisfied. But we won't place our faith in violence, for violence begets violence. Peaceful dissent is not the right to interfere with others or to riot in the streets."

Meany was introduced at the dinner by Peter J. Brennan, president of the New York State Painters and of the New York Building & Construction Trades Council. In his tribute to Raftery, Meany said the Painters president "represents the highest type of leadership—the type that will be demanded of labor in the months ahead."

Building Trades Score Wage Freeze Demands

Wage controls proposed by the Council of Construction Employers would be "an exercise in economic futility" without controls on profits and a price rollback, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. declared.

Haggerty gave his department's views after leaders of six contractors' associations urged Pres. Nixon to freeze construction wages at their Jan. 1, 1970 level "to control the wild inflation in this industry."

The employers called construction wage increases "a threat to our economy which has been building for several years." They proposed that "an appropriate tax be placed" on contractors' domestic operations "to prevent any windfall profit by the employer." They also proposed a national stabilization agreement containing a no-strike pledge, with arbitration of wage disputes.

Haggerty noted that he and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany "for many months have stated that organized labor would accept wage controls if and when corresponding limitations are simultaneously placed on all prices, profits, executive compensation and other incomes, as well as wages of workers."

Pointing out that no one is more severely hurt by inflation and unemployment than building tradesmen, whose unemployment rate is now nearly 12 percent, Haggerty said:

"We have urged the President to impose credit controls," along with income controls, "as a matter of top priority. Such controls are absolutely essential to provide an increasing flow of funds at reasonable interest rates into necessary construction activities."

Unless interest rates are reduced rapidly, it will be impossible, Haggerty said, to achieve price stabilization in construction. He concluded:

"The contractors' proposal for an 'appropriate tax' on their domestic operations is no substitute for price control, and would be ineffective in preventing windfall profits accruing to employers as a result of a wage rollback."

Labor Press Editors Win Praise For Keeping Pace With Changes

Milwaukee—Labor editors who are constantly re-evaluating their publications and watching trends elsewhere in journalism are doing the best jobs, the judges in the 1969 journalistic awards contests of the International Labor Press Association declared.

They pointed out that some of the "most vigorous and interesting labor publications" are those published by unions where "great changes are going on," especially in the field of public employe unionism.

Their point was reflected in the top awards for editorial excellence which went to publications of the Teachers and State, County unions. Public employe publications were well represented also as winners and runners-up in other contest categories, all announced at the annual ILPA conference here.

The ILPA conference focused major attention on the 1970 elections. There were workshops dealing with issues and candidates, geared to developing techniques for labor publications.

The nature of the election, the make-up of the electorate, the key issues were discussed by Al Barkan, director of COPE, Richard Scammon, director of Election Research Center and Andrew J. Biemiller, AFL-CIO legislative director.

The conference also heard 1970 candidates for national, state and local office discuss their problems and the issues as they see them at various levels. These included Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), Howard Metzenbaum, Democratic senatorial candidate in Ohio, Pat Lucey, Democratic candidate for governor in Wisconsin and Manny Brown, a candidate for re-election to the Wisconsin State Senate.

In addition there were workshop sessions on publication problems including one on page design and layout by Howard B. Taylor of Copley Newspapers and another on measuring readership and developing response, led by Bob Kalaski of the Machinists.

The ILPA Executive Council, at meetings prior to and during the conference, named two vice presidents to fill out the unexpired terms of Sam Marshall and Don Harris who have left the council because of job changes. The new vice presidents are Jim Steel, of the Laborer, publication of the Laborers and Gene Klare of the Oregon Labor Press.

The council also re-elected ILPA Pres. Kenneth Fiester, who has changed jobs but remained eligible for the office under the provisions of the ILPA Constitution.

Judges in the 1970 contest were Joseph A. Loftus, special assistant to the Secretary of Labor; Norman Walker, public affairs officer of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and Julius Duscha of the Washington Journalism Center.

Winners in the category for editorial excellence are:

The Public Employe, for international newspapers of 150,000 or more circulation.

Changing Education, for international magazines of 150,000 or more circulation.

The Allied Industrial Worker, for international newspapers of 50,000 to 150,000 circulation.

International of the Seafarers for international magazines of 50,000 to 150,000 circulation.

Guild Reporter for international newspapers of 50,000 or less circulation.

Air Line Pilot for international magazines of 50,000 or less circulation.

Focus of the Ohio AFL-CIO for central body publication of 10,000 or more circulation.

Minnesota Public Employe of the State, County & Municipal Employes Council 6 for central body publications of 10,000 or less circulation.

The 1199 Drug & Hospital News for local publications of 25,000 or more circulation.

Overture of Musicians Local 27 for local publications of 15,000 to 25,000 circulation.

The FLM Tempo of the New York Joint Board of the Fur, Leather & Machine Workers for local publications 5,000 to 15,000 circulation.

The Steel Gauntlet of Steelworkers Local 6166 in Thompson, Manitoba, for local publications under 5,000 circulation.

The award for the best original cartoon was presented to Changing Education for a drawing by Robert Osborn.

A tie for the best original photograph resulted in a contest with awards going to the Public Employe and the Air Line Pilot.

The St. Paul, Minn., Union Advocate was the winner of the best editorial award. The Ohio AFL-CIO Focus won the best feature story award and the international publication Machinist was given a special award for unique performance.

Unions in Canada Reject Wage Guideline Proposal

Ottawa—The executive council of the Canadian Labor Congress reaffirmed the position taken by the recent CLC convention that the government's guidelines for a 6 percent limit on wage increases are "totally unworkable."

The government policy to hold down wage increases "amounts to the most regressive form of taxation imaginable," the CLC declared. It further noted:

"It recognizes no mercy, no compassion for millions of Canadian wage and salary earners who, in the face of continued increases in prices, struggle along to provide themselves and their families with a modest standard of living.

"The 6-percent-or-less program is a gun in the back of government employes, many of whose wages and salaries lag far behind those paid for similar work in the private sector of the economy," CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald said.

Although much attention has been paid to wage increases negotiated this year, the CLC pointed out that little notice has been given the 27 percent increase in operating profits of the nation's seven largest banks and 24 percent boost in dividend payments by companies.

America's Roots

SIX YEARS from the date of this issue of the AFL-CIO News the United States will mark its 200th birthday. There is a commission at work planning a proper celebration and all sorts of ideas flying around on how best to mark the occasion.

Given the American talent for throwing a good party, the actual celebration is not a matter of real concern. But even now, six years ahead of the event, it is obvious that there is a real and continuing need for putting our current problems in some sort of perspective—to look at them perhaps in terms of 200 years.

Earlier this year the News noted in an editorial that it is becoming more and more evident that not everyone in the country understands that America's nearly 200 years of democratic experience "are mankind's most splendid achievement of self-government, and that accordingly destroying it would be mankind's most unspeakable desecration."

We must, in the years before the 200th anniversary put an ever-increasing stress on the achievements of American democracy—the evolution and extension of freedom and liberty from a well-intentioned but shaky beginning to the legal, economic and political social institutions of today.

The tremendous progress in building a nation in a democratic framework with strong and meaningful guarantees of civil liberties has been marked by continual struggle. These past few years have not been the first when our basic rights and freedoms have been called into question by extremists of the right and left who would best serve their own means by abolishing democracy as we have known it and under which we have survived and grown and prospered for nearly 200 years.

BUT PERHAPS the most significant perspective of our nation's history and traditions is to go back to the roots—in this case the essential principles set out in the Declaration of Independence:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

"That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

"Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, when evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. . . ."

To these principles the signers of the declaration pledged "to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor." On this Fourth of July, and the 200th anniversary Fourth to come in a few years, we must unitedly reaffirm that pledge to keep democratic government alive in the face of all enemies.

Nixon's Passion for Committees Reflected in White House Maze

By John P. Roche

FOR THE LAST couple of weeks, the great pastime in the nation's capital has been comparing "flow charts." Pres. Nixon began it with a monumental reorganization of the Executive Office of the President, which in complexity is beginning to resemble the Holy Roman Empire.

There is a "Domestic Council" that is supposed to think deep thoughts, an "Office of Management & Budget" that is charged with policy implementation, and, of course, the National Security Council off in its own corner.

The charts featured in the papers and magazines vary on a number of questions, though one thing seems to emerge clearly: Mr. Nixon really does not want to talk to his Cabinet.

Frankly, I can't say that I blame him—it is a rather dull collection—but he had better be careful. Nothing is more dangerous than a Cabinet Secretary with a wounded ego. And the instrument for revenge is so simple: a man who thought until May 1 that Cambodia was a French cheese will rise to announce that he has been bitterly opposed to the war in Indochina since 1950.

The intriguing thing about this reorganization is Pres. Nixon's passion for committees, councils, boards and the like. Whenever this Administration is confronted with a policy problem, the wheels turn and out pops another committee. They have invented a sausage machine which, instead of turning out sausages, turns out sausage machines.

Take, for example, the President's speech on inflation. Aside from boats and docks, what does one recall? One commission, one board, and some economic air raid wardens to sound "inflation alerts."

However, Mr. Nixon does deserve credit for one long overdue innovation. For years the United States has needed an equivalent to the British House of Lords, a way in which men who have failed as administrators can be simultaneously awarded status and removed from the line of fire.

They cannot be dismissed: their loyalty merits a reward, and besides they know where the bodies are buried. In England, they are made barons, earls or viscounts. In Washington, they are now created "Counsellors to the President." This is extremely clever and, I confess, I wish we Democrats had thought of it.

SERIOUSLY, what can one make of these incredible charts? If the system, God forbid, were to work, the result would be total chaos, Parkinsonian paralysis.

Let us try to track a policy through the bureaucratic labyrinth.

Stage 1: an Assistant Secretary submits a proposal to his Secretary, the Secretary has it "staffed out," i.e., his boys go over it.

Stage 2: the Secretary submits it to the "Domestic Policy Council," the DPC chairman has it "staffed out."

Stage 3 (assuming favorable results): the DPC chairman submits it to the "Office of Management & Budget," the OMB chairman has it "staffed out."

Stage 4: The OMB submits it to the President—and I'll bet you 6 to 1 the President hands it to somebody else to make sure it has been "staffed out." Probably John Mitchell.

No wonder the White House staff is rapidly moving up in size. As best I can figure it out, they have replaced Joe Califano and his four top assistants with about 76 people.

This is known as bringing "business skills to government." Of course, it does eliminate the kind of "personal" power that Lyndon Johnson relied on to get results. Rather than calling the Secretary of HEW and gently inquiring "what are you doing about . . .", the President (perhaps after counseling with Lord Moynihan) will send a memo to the OMB asking that the Domestic Council check with the Secretary of HEW. . . .

Now this is preposterous. Power, like water, finds its own level and generally the more complex the table of organization, the more short cuts there are. The first question any bureaucrat asks when he looks at this Rube Goldberg creation is: "Who's got the bag?" That is, who controls the budget? The answer is still unclear, but as soon as I find out, I'll report back.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

308 Million by Year 2000:

Population Continues to Grow But Rate of Increase Declines

The following is excerpted from an article "Trends in U.S. Population" by Frank Pollara, which appears in the June 1970 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE POPULATION of the United States will grow at a rate about half as fast as world population in the next 30 years. By the year 2000, U.S. population is predicted to be 308 million, a growth of 102 million over projected population for the year 1970. This growth is almost as much as the total population of the United States in 1920.

However, the rate of growth has declined. It was more than 30 percent each decade until 1860. In the next five decades the rate of growth ranged from 21 to 27 percent. In the five decades ending in 1960, the rate of growth hovered around 15 to 19 percent each 10 years except for the depression years of the 1930s, when the growth rate plummeted to 7.4 percent.

In the decades to come, population is projected to grow at a rate of 14 to 15 percent, which is below the historical rate. Yet there are some who believe that even this rate overstates population growth and a more likely growth rate is 11 or 12 percent.

The high rate of growth in the early years of this country was largely affected by immigration. In the 1800s, the immigration rate generally ranged from 6 to 10 percent and continued at that level until the immigration law of 1924 took effect. As a result of that law the rate of immigration declined to under 1 percent during the 1930s and 1940s and averaged 1.5 percent in the 1950s, the rate at which it is expected to continue. Total immigration is expected to be about 400,000 annually in future years. While this is a sizable number, it is less than one-fifth of the total U.S. population growth.

Just the increase in numbers of itself creates problems. It means a proportionate increase in food and drink (unless dieting and teetotaling become ways of life) and a proportionate increase in clothing (unless we all become nudists). It means more factories and more offices, more houses, more automobiles and more highways. It means more depletion of our natural resources. The list is almost endless.

However, we must not forget that we have lived with population growth. Somehow the schools have been built, factories have turned out the goods, hospitals have sprung up and food has been grown to take care of the population growth. Maybe not as well as we would have liked, but nevertheless the needs of a growing population have been met.

THIS SHOULD NOT lead, however, to a feeling of complacency. Growth will have an extraordinary impact on environment. Problems of air, land and water pollution and the disposal of waste will double and triple and there will be an increasing strain on resources.

Yet growth has its compensations. More people produce more wealth, even if there is no increase in per capita wealth. And certain costs remain relatively fixed—it costs no more to send a man to the moon whether we have 200 million or 300 million people. Thus a bigger share of a bigger pie becomes available to tackle such problems as race, pollution, housing, poverty and crime. Whether that extra wealth will be used to combat these domestic problems is a question for the American people to decide.

Perfectly stable population is not such an ideal thing, either. A non-growing population tends toward stagnation. Wealth growth would be slowed. We would have a much older population with the median age between 35 and 40 instead of the current median of 27.6.

America is not overcrowded and it will not be in the near future. Currently there is an average of 58 people per square mile. By the year 2000, density may increase to 87 per square mile. Holland has a density rate of almost 1,000 people per square mile; Japan has 700; West Germany 600; Switzerland 400.

IN THE LONG RUN, growth transcends all other aspects of population in importance. But in the long run, we'll all be dead. Of more immediate urgency are the questions of where will they live and who will they be.

Birth and death rates are pretty much the same in all parts of the country. Despite the excess of births over deaths, some areas decline in population because of people moving out.

Prior to 1955, the population was shifting from the South to the Great Lakes region. But that migration has abated and both the South and the Great Lakes areas are expected to grow at rates close to the national average in the future.

The center of U.S. population has been moving steadily westward since 1800, when it was midway between Washington and Baltimore. It is expected to be 40 miles south of St. Louis in 1980.

Negroes have been moving out of the South in large numbers. More than 75 percent of the U.S. Negro population was concentrated in the South in 1940 but by 1968 that percentage was down to 52. The percent of Negroes living in the North rose from 22 to 41 percent and in the West from 1 to 7 percent in that period.

This trend out of the South will continue, but at a much slower pace. By 1985, the percent of Negroes will decline to 49 percent in the South and to 37 percent in the North and rise to 14 percent in the West.

Coinciding with the movement of Negroes out of the South has been the vast migration from rural to urban areas. In 1790 only 5 percent of the U.S. population lived in the cities; by 1920 it was a little more than 50 percent and today about 67 percent. By 1985, urban residents will constitute 71 percent of the total population.

Almost all of the recent growth in metropolitan areas has been in the outer ring, or suburbs. While it may be too early to predict that today's central cities will be tomorrow's ghost towns, the decline of the central cities is real and, unless positive efforts are made to reverse the slide, the situation could become hopeless.

After Wage Gains:

Union Negotiators to Press For Improved Fringe Benefits

RISING LIVING COSTS will keep the focus of first-year contract settlements on wage gains, but unions will continue to search for new ways to improve fringe benefits in the longer term, AFL-CIO economist Rudolph Oswald predicted.

The Seventies will see "the same sort of innovative ability to provide for workers' needs" that developed 30-year pensions, supplemental unemployment benefits, dental care and other new fringe benefits in the Sixties, said Oswald, a member of the Federation's Dept. of Research.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Oswald pointed out that the Steelworkers are pointing for a four-day week in next year's negotiations in the steel industry, and that other unions will be working toward that same goal in the years ahead.

He added that while the four-day week may not be widely established in the next few years, it "will be common in certain industries . . . in another decade."

The labor economist said that earlier retirement and the shorter work week will expand the "opportunities for workers to step up to more responsible jobs" and make it possible for more workers to "live a full life, rather than die on the job." He said that experience with retirement after 30 years service, regardless of age, has proved that the costs involved are not prohibitive.

OSWALD TURNED ASIDE the claim that the recent decline of productivity has been caused by wage and fringe benefits improvements. He said that the lag is the result of Administration policies that have curtailed the economy and "decreased the utilization of plants and equipment."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

MORE THAN 30 years ago, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in calling for a Federal Fair Labor Standards Act, declared:

"Goods produced under conditions which do not meet rudimentary standards of decency should be regarded as contraband and ought not to be allowed to pollute the channels of interstate commerce."

The President's use of that word "pollute", now so much in the news, has led the U.S. Dept. of Labor—perhaps stretching things a bit—to lay claim to the federal government's first "anti-pollution" agency—the department's Wage & Hour Division now observing its 32nd anniversary.

Signed by Pres. Roosevelt on June 25th, 1938, the Fair Labor Standards Act now takes in more than simple enforcement of minimum wage rates and overtime provisions of the act, though these in themselves are formidable.

The law currently covers 46 million jobs, many of which have different minimum wage and overtime pay requirements. It has been estimated that the Wage & Hour Division must enforce well over 100 different minimum wage rates alone.

In addition, the agency has had many additional tasks assigned to it by Congress over the past 32 years. Enforcement of the law against age discrimination is one of them; only the other day Congress assigned another—enforcement of the new law limiting the garnishment of workers' pay and the right of employers to fire workers who over-extend themselves in the installment markets.

All in all, Wage & Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran reports, his division is now responsible for the enforcement of some 63 different federal laws dealing with wages and hours. Not the least of these, he says, still playing on the word "pollution," is enforcement "of labor standards in construction of federal facilities to restrict environmental pollution."

During the year the division collected $31.7 million for 272,000 workers in back pay that was due them. Yet, the division estimated that on the basis of its investigations, some 477,434 workers had been cheated out of $89 million in wages and overtime payments.

Optimists in the division said that much of the $57,000,000 not collected probably would be recovered through lawsuits, since underpayments may go back as long as two years before the books are closed.

That the Wage & Hour Division works under severe handicaps cannot be overlooked. The division had 980 compliance officers last year. It now has only 950 despite the fact that its case load has been growing steadily. Nixon Administration economies plus a shortage of trained compliance officers are cited as reasons for this shortage of personnel.

ORGANIZED LABOR has long been deeply disturbed by the "unconscionable" dereliction of far too many American employers in paying their workers the wages that are due them, either under the minimum wage or under overtime provisions.

On top of that, however, is the clear evidence that enforcement of wage laws for which labor has fought so hard, has scarcely been up to the level of the need. The AFL-CIO, for example, has called on Congress to increase by a third the Wage & Hour Division's investigative staff.

It noted that in 1968, reported under-payments had amounted to $80,000,000, and that this figure had grown to $87,000,000 in 1969. It is unlikely to find the situation any better when the fiscal 1970 figures are announced this summer.

It is a cliche to say that laws are only as good as their enforcement. This is particularly true in the case of laws designed to help the weakest members of our society—those workers who must be legally protected against the cruelest kind of exploitation—substandard wages.

INNOVATIVE ABILITY that union negotiators demonstrated in the Sixties will win new and stronger fringe benefits for workers in the Seventies, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned on the AFL-CIO produced program, broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio, by Tom Joyce, left, of Newsweek magazine and Don Finley of United Press International.

First Time in 10 Years:

Health Facilities Bill Enacted As Congress Overrides Veto

gress to compel funds to be spent has been considered a debatable, still undecided constitutional issue.

The AFL-CIO had strongly urged both the House and Senate to override the veto. It would have really been "fiscal irresponsibility" if Congress hadn't provided for "urgently needed" medical facilities, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller stressed.

Under the new law, up to $1.26 billion could be appropriated over the next three years for the basic Hill-Burton program of federal grants for construction and modernization of hospitals.

The legislation also sets up a new $500 million-a-year program of loan guarantees, with the government paying 3 percent of the interest cost. The Administration sought the loan guarantees, but not the interest subsidies.

It moves the program in new directions urged by the AFL-CIO. Thus, it increases funds for outpatient health services and encourages construction of comprehensive health care facilities, such as those operated by group practice plans.

For the first time, non-profit community groups which do not own a general hospital, will be eligible for grants to construct outpatient clinics.

And a new priority written into the bill gives preference in allocation of funds to both urban and rural poverty areas.

The Senate, in one of several post-midnight sessions needed to catch up on legislation sidetracked by the Cambodia debate, approved a $4.8 billion education appropriation bill.

The measure provides some $800 million more than Pres. Nixon's budget request—setting the stage for a possible new confrontation over spending priorities. The President's only other veto—which Congress was unable to override—came early this year on an education spending bill.

A more immediate confrontation, however, will come in a House-Senate conference committee on the bill.

The House had tacked on to the appropriations bill several restrictions on school desegregation policies strongly opposed by civil rights groups. One would protect so-called "freedom of choice" plans which some school districts have used as a means of nullifying desegregation orders.

The Senate rejected all such amendments and a group of House liberals sought to have the House instruct its conferees to accept the Senate position on the issue. But the motion was beaten, 191-157.

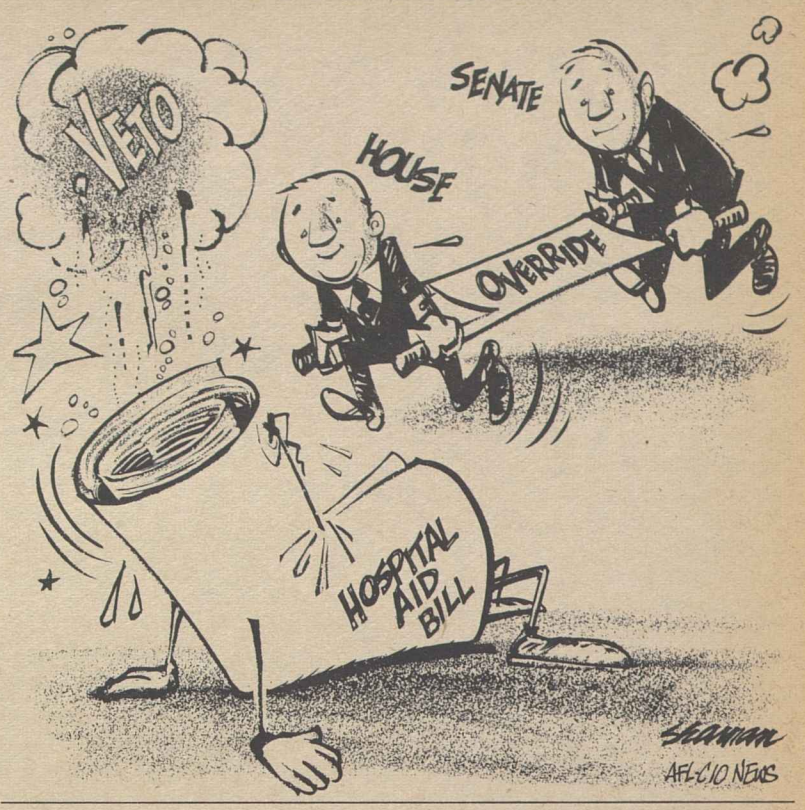
This has been a perennial area of conflict and in past years House-Senate conferees have agreed on "compromise" language which both sides acknowledged had no legal impact.

In other congressional developments before the House and Senate recesses for the Independence Day weekend:

- The Senate Commerce Committee approved House-passed legislation aimed at building at least 300 modern merchant ships in U.S. yards over the next 10 years—and sending them to sea flying the American flag.

It added one important change which had been strongly urged by labor — retention of a provision in present law requiring that ships built with federal subsidies be constructed with American-made components. The House bill had watered down this requirement by limiting it to "major components of the hull and superstructure" and exempting other components, such as generators.



- The House voted 342-2 for a three-year expansion of the 1968 Crime Control & Safe Streets Act.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, authorizes $3.1 billion over the three years in matching grants to help states and communities combat crime. Cities with high crime rates would get first priority.

One change in the new legislation would reduce the matching funds required by state and local agencies from the present 50 percent to 25 percent. It would also require states to pay one-fourth of a city's contribution.

- The House voted 262-78 approval of an Administration-supported bill doubling the authorization for federal aid to the arts and humanities to $40 million for the fiscal year that started July 1. Conservative efforts to cut back the spending ceiling were soundly beaten.

Rollcall Vote in Senate To Override Nixon Veto

The Senate on June 30 voted 76-19 to override Pres. Nixon's veto of the hospital construction, medical facilities bill.

Labor strongly supported the position of the 53 Democrats and 23 Republicans who voted to override the veto. Voting to sustain the veto were 19 Republicans.

The Railway & Airline Clerks announced that its members on Northwest Airlines will strike at 1 a.m. local time, July 8, unless agreement is reached in the union's contract dispute with the carrier before then.

BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis said the strike date was being announced well in advance so that the public would be aware of the possible walkout in time to make travel plans to avoid personal inconvenience.

CERTIFICATE IN LABOR STUDIES is presented to Laverne A. Rolle of the staff of State, County & Municipal Employes District 37, at the first graduation of Cornell University's two-year Labor & Liberal Arts Program in New York City. She also received a full scholarship in the university's New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations. From left are Dr. Lois Gray, metropolitan director of the labor relations school; Dr. Robert F. Risley, an assistant dean of the school; Miss Rolle, and Dr. Harry Kelber, director of the Labor & Liberal Arts Program.

2-Year Labor Program Graduates 64 in N.Y.

New York—The first class of 64 students has graduated from a unique two-year labor and liberal arts program that Cornell University conducts in New York City.

The graduates were part of the 225-student enrollment in the evening class program that offers a mix of both labor studies and traditional college courses to trade unionists.

Sharing the pride of the graduating class was the faculty of the pioneering school. Several of them said they had learned as much as the students in the classroom discussions and seminars.

Many of the students hold full-time positions in the labor movement and about two-thirds of the group exercise decision-making responsibilities in their unions and local organizations.

Included are 20 local union presidents, three international union vice presidents and a large number of business representatives and local officials.

The curriculum is designed to train the students in special skills needed by labor leaders at all levels and to provide them a wide-ranging foundation in the liberal arts.

Most of the students, the university reports, had little or no formal study in the liberal arts before enrolling in the two-year program. Some had attended college, others had never gone beyond elementary school.

The age span of the students ranges from age 18 to 67. About one-third of the students represent minority groups—mainly Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

"Bread-and-butter" courses on labor topics include collective bargaining, contract enforcement, organizing, mediation and arbitration, strikes, political action, union administration, labor law, community relations and other subjects.

The diverse occupations and labor organization backgrounds of the students enrich the class discussions, the university notes. A session on the problems of automation, for example, may elicit the experiences of longshoremen, printers, department store employes, seamen, bakers, and members of many other unions.

In the program's Survey of the Arts course, the students are introduced to a number of works by modern and contemporary writers, poets, painters and composers. The course includes visits to museums, the theater and concerts.

The program is conducted by Cornell's New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations. It is assisted by a grant from the David Dubinsky Foundation of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Court Asked To Bar Test On Proverbs

"4. True valor lies in the middle between cowardice and rashness.

"5. There is a time to wink as well as to see."

Asking the Supreme Court to review the case, the Steelworkers commented:

"These questions perhaps might have utility on a law school aptitude exam. As a measure of ability to fill jobs in an industrial plant they are ludicrous. And as a barrier to Negro advancement they are vicious—the more so because employers are growing increasingly enamored of these kinds of tests."

While stressing that unions have had some success in getting rid of irrelevant tests through collective bargaining, the Steelworkers brief notes that millions of workers do not have union protection and the equal employment opportunity law is their only recourse.

"And even collective bargaining can do the job only where the employer agrees, or where the employes' bargaining strength is sufficient to exact such an agreement," the union noted.

Task Force Cites Needs:

National Insurance Health Plan Urged

The American people should get more and better health care, and the federal government must take the lead in seeing they get it, a 27-member panel reported to the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

Walter J. McNerney of the Blue Cross Association, who headed the panel, told newsmen that he believes some form of national health insurance is vital, and that HEW should start now to find ways to finance a workable NHI system.

The task force, appointed a year ago by former HEW Sec. Robert H. Finch to study Medicaid, recommended as the next step that the new secretary, Elliot L. Richardson, appoint a high-level body "to undertake promptly a study" of the best way to pay for a system of national health insurance.

The panel, which made 125 recommendations for revamping health care, included AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman. He called its report, made after a year of debate and deliberation, consistent in many ways with the objectives of the AFL-CIO. One of those objectives is national health insurance.

Seidman added: "I hope Sec. Richardson really means it when he says this is one report that will not gather dust on a shelf."

Under the exis'ing health care system, the panel's report said, "millions of consumers get care on a hit-or-miss basis; millions more lack access to medical care except in medical crises."

Among its recommendations were these:

- All consumers should have access to health care without hardship or humiliation, and with a voice in how it is planned and furnished.
- Medicaid should be converted from a multitude of federal-state programs to one program with a single minimum level of health benefits financed 100 percent by federal funds.
- The federal government should provide leadership and funds to create and support systems of health care including comprehensive services and continuity of care; defined population groups which contract for services; integrated fiscal and managerial responsibility; sharing of the cost through prepayment, especially prepaid group practice.
- Legislation should be enacted to use 5 percent of federal Medicaid appropriations each year to develop and improve health care services.

Other recommendations were that disabled social security beneficiaries should be included under Medicare; consumer representatives should sit on all groups advising policy-making officials; health service agencies should have information programs for new board members; all agencies receiving federal support must have continuing health education programs for consumers.

The task force said "it is a central conclusion . . . that money is needed but that money alone will not guarantee" effective performance.

"There isn't enough money, and there aren't enough doctors to provide the needed care just on a fee-for-service basis; thus any solution will require new options, new goals and new attitudes.

"Without these, the health system cannot move forward to meet its growing responsibilities; with them, the recommendations . . . can show the way toward achieving . . . better health care for all Americans."

Medicaid reached about a third of the poor in 1969, and will serve about 13 million persons in the coming year, the report estimated. It says "Medicare, on the other hand, has removed much of the burden of acute health-care expenses for nearly all" the over-65 group. Nevertheless, it adds, "Medicare in 1969 covered less than half the health care expenses of the aged."

The report points out that even with major recent federal programs, "serious needs and inequities continue to exist" among the poor, aged and children. It defines the poor as those living in poverty (on $70 a week, average, for a family of four), and the near-poor—about $90 a week. Both groups total about 40 million, or one-fifth of the population, the report says.

Besides a greater role for consumers, panelists stressed the need for developing programs such as prepaid practice, and comprehensive health care systems that might include preventive medicine.

Panel members represent a "cross section" of society as to age, geography, profession and consumer interest. Besides being from labor and business, they reflect the viewpoint of consumers, social science, and health institutions and services.

Meany Asks Solidarity on Civil Rights

"Labor is not tired and it is not finished with the struggle. We have pledged to continue the fight, shoulder-to-shoulder with our allies in the civil rights movement, until the nation has achieved its promise of liberty and justice not only for all, but for each," Meany said.

But all of the combined goals of the AFL-CIO and NAACP are threatened, Meany pointed out, by a national economy in which production has dropped below 80 percent of capacity, the unemployment rate has soared "far beyond what the Administration predicted as an average for the entire year" and real earnings continue to decline while the cost of living rises.

"What that means is that one out of every 20 Americans who need and want jobs can't get them," Meany said. "And the burden will inevitably fall, as always, far more heavily on blacks, than on whites."

Meany said the economic situation was especially detrimental if it curtailed the effectiveness of such programs as Operation Outreach to recruit and prepare black youngsters for apprenticeships and upgrade the skills of older minority-group workers in the building trades.

Meany cited the Senate's rejection of two Supreme Court nominees as an example of cooperation between labor and civil rights groups.

In that connection, Meany paid special tribute to Clarence Mitchell, the NAACP legislative representative, "whose activities on Capitol Hill reflect great and continuing credit to the NAACP."

Virginia GOP Names Opponent to Sen. Byrd

Sen. Harry Byrd will have a Republican opponent in Virginia this fall and Connecticut will have a wide-open summer of primaries as a result of state conventions.

Virginia Republicans nominated Ray L. Garland, a 36-year-old state assemblyman, as their candidate for the seat held by Byrd, who quit the Democratic party in March to run as an independent.

National Republican leaders attempted to get the convention to leave the Senate nomination open as a tacit acceptance of Byrd. Both Republican National Chairman Rogers C. B. Morton and White House aide Harry Dent attended the convention, but delegates voted down the motion to leave the nomination open by 643-419. Recently-elected GOP Gov. Linwood P. Holton strongly urged the convention to endorse a candidate.

Republican strategists argued that Byrd would be more likely to vote with the GOP to organize the Senate if he were not opposed. And they warned that a Republican candidate might split the conservative vote and enable a liberal Democrat to win the Senate seat.

Virginia Democrats will select their Senate nominee at the July 14 state convention, with two liberals considered strong contenders.

In Connecticut, both parties were assured of August primaries to determine candidates for major offices.

Connecticut Democrats endorse Rep. Emilio Q. Daddario, a six-term congressional veteran, for governor and he will not have primary opposition. But Alphonsus J. Donahue, the convention's Senate choice, will have two primary opponents.

Donahue, a 53-year-old Stamford businessman, will be opposed by Edward Marcus, majority leader of the state senate, and Rev. Joseph E. Duffey, national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action. Donahue received 488 convention votes, or just over 51 percent of the total, to 231 for Duffey and 221 for Marcus. Duffey and Marcus each drew over the 20 percent of the convention vote necessary to get on the Aug. 19 ballot.

Both Republicans endorsed by the party's state convention will face opposition in the Aug. 12 GOP primary.

Rep. Thomas J. Meskill will be opposed in the gubernatorial primary by state Sen. Wallace Barnes and Rep. Lowell P. Weicker, the convention's choice for senator, will be opposed by John Lupton, another state senator.

The Connecticut Senate race is for the seat held by Thomas J. Dodd, who withdrew from the Democratic race and said he will run as an independent in the fall. The incumbent governor, John Dempsey, had announced earlier that he would not seek re-election. He made the nominating speech for Daddario at the Democratic convention.

In Rhode Island, a Roman Catholic priest running as a "peace candidate" won the endorsement of the Republican State Central Committee to oppose incumbent Democratic Sen. John O. Pastore in November.

Although the Rev. John McLaughlin faces a primary election Sept. 15, he still has no opponent in that race. Pastore, who has represented the state for the past 20 years, was re-elected in 1964 with 83 percent of the vote.

2 Birchers in California Win Congressional Seats

Two members of the John Birch Society have been elected to Congress in special elections in heavily Republican California districts.

Republican John Rousselot, a congressman for one term in 1961-62 and a former national officer of the Birch Society, defeated Democrat Myrlie Evers, widow of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers to fill the vacancy created by the death of Glenard Lipscomb. Rousselot drew 62,558 votes to 29,121 for Mrs. Evers in the 24th district, which encompasses a suburban segment of Los Angeles County and part of San Bernardino County.

State Senator John Schmitz, a Republican and the California assembly's only avowed Bircher, defeated college professor David Hartman, 67,077 votes to 27,176. The vacancy was created by the death of James Utt.

Schmitz' district, the 35th, covers conservative Orange County, a part of San Diego and includes San Clemente, where Pres. Nixon is a registered voter. Rousselot's district includes part of the district which Nixon represented when he was in Congress in the 1940s.

Union Shop Bargaining Retained in Postal Bill

shop. After a motion to table the amendment was beaten, 50-40, the Senate then voted by a solid 52-38 to restore the union shop authorization.

As it turned out, the Senate stuck closely to its own committee version of the bill rather than buy the House-passed package. The committee bill included the union-shop authorization and Fannin's amendment was an effort to substitute language giving postal workers an unqualified "right to refrain" from joining a union.

Apart from the collective bargaining area, a main difference between the House and Senate bills is the approach to the setting of postage rates.

The House version would permit either the House or Senate to veto any change in postage rates within 90 days. The Senate insisted on complete autonomy in rate-setting for the new postal service, without congressional interference.

In another area, the Senate provided a permanent 10 percent federal subsidy of postal service costs to take care of below-cost public service categories of mail. The House bill would require the postal service to become completely self-supporting after a transition period.

Both the House and Senate bills are fuzzier than the negotiated agreement on the procedures for collective bargaining and the role of minority unions that do not hold exclusive national bargaining rights. Senate committee leaders said they hope to work out some of the problems in conference with the House.

Job Picture Still Gloomy At Midyear

Halfway through 1970, the nation's economy remained in a severe slump, with the number of unemployed continuing to rise.

Unemployment during the first six months of the year averaged 3.7 million workers, or 4.5 percent of the labor force. In June, the number of unemployed rose to 4.7 million, an increase of 1.3 million from May.

After seasonal adjustments, the unemployment rate dropped from 5 percent in May to 4.7 percent in June, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. This, however, reflected fewer people coming into the labor force rather than an upturn in the economy.

The decline in the jobless rate occurred entirely among adult women, the BLS noted, with the rate for adult men holding at the May level of 3.5 percent. The jobless rate for adult women fell to 4.5 percent after rising sharply in May to 5.1 percent.

The seasonally adjusted decline in the unemployment rate is the first month-to-month drop in six months. The rise in the number of unemployed in June was smaller than usual and resulted in a seasonally-adjusted decline of 206,000.

Since the nonfarm employment rose slightly less than usual, it totaled 70.7 million, a decline of 215,000 after seasonal adjustments.

BLS Assistant Commissioner Harold Goldstein warned against over-interpretation of the decline in the jobless rate last month, noting that the decline in jobs was "of considerable economic significance."

While the unemployment rate for all of 1969 averaged 3.5 percent, it has been on an increase in the first two quarters of 1970, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger pointed out. The first quarter rate was 4.1 percent and rose to 4.8 percent in the April-June period.

Nonfarm payroll employment last month showed declines in all industries except transportation and public utilities, which recorded slight advances.

Manufacturing employment dropped by 120,000 in June to 19.6 million and contract construction was down by 34,000 jobs to 3.5 million, the BLS reported.

The decline in factory employment occurred mainly among the durable goods industries where 110,000 jobs were lost. These included 21,000 in nonelectrical machinery, 24,000 in transportation

4 More Cities Hit by Severe Unemployment

Four more cities of the nation's 150 major manpower centers were added to the Labor Dept. list of areas with an unemployment rate of 6 percent or more.

This makes 20 areas now suffering from "substantial" unemployment. In June 1969, only six centers were classified in that category.

The four new additions are Brockton, Mass.; Jersey City, N.J.; Kenosha and Racine, Wis.

At the same time, the Labor Dept. shifted 11 major labor areas from the low unemployment category—jobless rates of 1.5 percent to 2.9 percent—to the moderate unemployment category—3 percent to 5 percent.

The Labor Dept. also reported that Muskegon-Muskegon Heights, Mich., has been reclassified into an extreme unemployment category with a jobless rate of 9 to 11.9 percent.

Workers Jobs Not Pawns In Game to Cool Inflation

WRONG TACTICS being used to stop inflation are sacrificing jobs of American workers without curbing prices, I. W. Abel tells the Joint Economic Committee of Congress. Abel, testifying as chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee, is accompanied by Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger, right.

Abel Assails Cold Policies On Job Loss

The American worker is not a cold statistic or expendable item in the fight against inflation, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, chairman of the federation's Economic Policy Committee, told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that the American worker "has a right to expect—I would say demand—that another way be found to harness inflation" other than making him pay for it with unemployment.

"What deeply disturbs me and my colleagues in the labor movement is this detached, unconcerned, coldly analytical assumption that the American worker is expendable—that unemployment is the price that has to be paid," Abel said.

"Inflation and unemployment concern human beings. Unemployment means hardship, privation and perhaps some suffering," Abel said. "It is economic nonsense and unjustifiable to ask the worker, who has not shared in the profit boom and whose real earnings have lagged, to make further sacrifice of joblessness in order to cool the inflation he did not cause."

Abel, who is also president of the Steelworkers and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., was accompanied by Nat Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's call for the President to use the emergency powers Congress gave him last December to impose interest-rate ceilings and expand credit for needed housing, public facilities and regular business operations.

The Administration's continued failure to act has brought the U.S. economy into a recession while failing to stem inflation, Abel said. As a result, he said, the mood of the nation's workers today is one of "uncertainty, frustration and anger

48 Contracts Signed:

11 New Grape Ranches Join Growing Union-Label Ranks

Delano, Calif.—Eleven more grape growers signed union contracts to broaden the United Farm Workers' sweep into the once-closed field of California table grapes.

Union negotiators moved from ranch to ranch to consolidate the spread of union-won conditions to additional thousands of field workers.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez and Larry Itliong, his second in command, continued to press for meetings with more growers, and to make arrangements for elections at the signed-up ranches. They look to a breakthrough soon in the hard-core of Delano area growers who have been resisting the union under the leadership of Giumarra & Son, the biggest holdout.

Large employers signing union contracts included John J. Kovacevich of Arvin, and Bagdasarian & Co., which markets Mr. Grape, Pasho and Bagdad brands, grown on more than 1,000 acres in the Coachella area.

Other growers signing up were: F. & M. Co., Fresno marketer of grapes under the F & M and Supreme labels; Sammy LoGreco, producing grapes in the Arvin-Lamont area and using such labels as Camelot and Galliano; Tony De Mallo, Fresno; Tony George and Galderas & Son, both of Orosi, near Fresno; the American Produce Co., Los Angeles; Edward G. Camderian, Coachella; the Castellani Co., Fresno, and Ben Mardian, Phoenix, Ariz.

Five other growers are still discussing contract terms and election procedures. After the grape harvest, the union plans to follow the crops into other areas of the highly productive California and Arizona fruit and nut country.

All the contracts have the standard provisions contained in the first pioneering agreements signed by UFWOC negotiators and growers in the series that began Apr. 1 at Coachella.

They provide a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour, plus a bonus payment of 25 cents a box for pickers; 10 cents an hour additional per employe for the union's health and welfare fund; 2 cents more per box for the UFWOC Economic Development Fund, and protection against the use of "hard" pesticides in spraying the fields against insect infestation.

The Economic Development Fund will, as the union plans it, protect members against layoffs or retirement because of age, physical disability or automation of the ranches.

All the contracts bind the growers not to use insect-killing sprays or powders that may cripple or incapacitate employes working in the fields alongside spraying rigs or under crop-dusting planes. Union members have testified to the danger from uncontrolled use of "hard" poisons.

A key inducement to growers is the "bird" that consumers insist on seeing before buying grapes. The bird is the union label or "thunderbird"—an Aztec eagle that has been designed by UFWOC for use on every box of grapes produced under union contract.

Food markets across the country report continuing heavy sales of union-label grapes. In some cities, the arrival of UFWOC label grapes

Rail Strike Halted on First Day By Court and Presidential Orders

Presidential intervention ended a railroad strike on its first day—after management threatened a nationwide lockout if a walkout against three railroads were allowed to continue.

The United Transportation Union had called a strike against three lines in an effort to bring management into "meaningful" direct bargaining over the long-smouldering issue of the size of engine crews.

But before the day was over:

- Owners of the nation's 125 major railroads said they would shut down completely unless the strike were halted.
- A federal judge issued a temporary restraining order directing the strikers to return to work.
- Pres. Nixon agreed to the request of railroad management to name a presidential emergency board—an action which prohibited any strike for 60 days.

The UTU's limited strike came after years of negotiation had failed to budge management from its refusal to allow locomotive engineers to have a helper in the cab, a job rail labor contends is necessary for safety reasons even though the locomotive "fireman" no longer shovels coal.

Pres. Nixon named Frederick Livingston, a federal mediator who had tried in vain to bring about a negotiated settlement, as chairman of the three-member emergency board which will hold hearings on the dispute and make recommendations to both sides.

Livingston had withdrawn from the dispute on June 11, after bargaining talks were broken off.

Union Pres. Charles Luna charged

After the 19 combos and bands marched down Euclid Avenue, they put on a three-hour concert at the city's Public Square. The event was held just to help people forget the troubles of the world for a few hours, said AFM Local Pres. Anthony A. Granata. "It's our way of thanking the city, merchants and citizens for supporting our efforts to bring live music to downtown Cleveland," he added. The musical blitz was financed by the Musicians Performance Trust Fund.

Rhode Island Labor Moves Ahead With Group Health Care Program

Providence—The Rhode Island AFL-CIO has signed an agreement under which doctors will provide 10,000 union members and their families with a prepaid group practice program of comprehensive medical care at two hospitals here.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown describe the program, due to start next March, as the first ever sponsored by a state labor federation.

The agreement, signed by the Rhode Island Group Health Association and trustees of St. Joseph's and Our Lady of Fatima hospitals, clears the way toward a medical care program to be paid for by a schedule of rates now being worked out. Policastro heads GHA as well as the federation.

Details of the program began to take shape three years ago. For the last year, the sponsors sought to overcome problems of hospital services. When the two hospitals finally agreed to grant hospital privileges to GHA doctors, a three-year contract was signed by the state labor group, the Group Health Association and the Most Rev. Russell J. McVinney, bishop of the Catholic diocese of Providence, on behalf of the trustees of the two hospitals.

Highlights of the agreement are:

- Fatima Hospital will build a one-story annex with about 13,000 square feet of space to serve as a temporary treatment center for ambulatory GHA members.
- The association will lease the building until a permanent larger facility is built at St. Joseph's.
- The new building will be equipped and furnished by GHA. All movable items will later be transferred to the permanent care center.
- To avoid duplication of service, GHA will buy from the hospitals such equipment for treatment of ambulatory patients as X-rays for diagnostic and treatment purposes, laboratory tests, physical therapy, electrocardiograms and occupational therapy devices.
- Physicians who join GHA's medical panel will join the staff of the hospital involved if they are not already staff members, the agreement provides.

Brown said the plan to be used here is similar to prepaid group health plans like the Kaiser Foundation plan. It will, however, be the first in the U.S. to combine the resources of a consumer-oriented group, an established community hospital and the teaching program of a medical school—in this case, that of Brown University, he said.

Union Shop Foes Win In House Postal Vote

"Right-to-work" supporters won a House victory in their effort to scuttle a section of the postal reorganization legislation that would permit collective bargaining over the issue of a union shop.

The Senate had voted to follow the agreement reached by the Administration with the AFL-CIO and seven postal unions. It provided for collective bargaining in the new U.S. Postal Service on virtually all issues that are negotiated in the private sector—including union security. (Senate rollcall vote on Page 7.)

Earlier, the House had stricken the authorization for union shop negotiations from its version of the postal bill.

Before the bill was sent to a House-Senate conference committee, "right-to-work" supporters moved to instruct the House conferees to hold firm for a ban on union shop agreements in the new postal service.

Supporters of the right to negotiate union-security provisions sought to table the motion to instruct the conferees. They lost, 238-153.

The motion to direct the conferees to uphold the "right-to-work" ban on a union shop then carried, 225-159.

Even though the Administration had endorsed the collective bargaining provision, including the right to bargain for a union shop, Republicans in the House voted overwhelmingly to forbid it.

The issue still remains alive in conference, depending on the position taken by Senate conferees and efforts to reach a compromise over the House and Senate versions of the bill.

Clerks' Strike Stops Flights At Northwest

Minneapolis—Northwest Airlines canceled the vast majority of its flights as 3,500 ticket agents and office employes went on strike nationwide for wage parity with other airline employes.

Picket lines of the Railway & Airline Clerks at company locations from Florida to Alaska and the Northwest were being observed by the Machinists, Transport Workers and other unions.

The strike was called when Northwest management refused to match wages and conditions for comparative jobs on other U.S. airlines, the union said.

Negotiations opened last year and continued after the contract expired Nov. 1.

BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis announced the July 8 strike deadline well in advance to avoid inconveniencing travelers, the union said.

In 3 More Cities:

Trades Sign Pacts On Minority Jobs

Area-wide agreements to bring an increasing number of black workers and other minority-group members into the building trades have been signed in three more cities—Boston, Denver and Los Angeles.

The plans, similar to earlier agreements worked out in Chicago and Pittsburgh, provide for recruiting, counselling and placing of minority-group members at all levels of the building crafts.

All three plans call for preapprenticeship training and apprenticeship entry, but also for upgrading to journeyman status for older workers with some experience in a craft.

In each instance, the agreement was signed by representatives of the local Building Trades Council, the contractors association and representatives of minority organizations.

In Boston, the signatories included the Workers Defense League, one of the original groups which set up Apprenticeship Outreach, a three-year-old program which has placed over 6,000 apprentices in more than 60 cities. Outreach was subsequently expanded to include upgrading to journeyman status.

All three of the new agreements established boards to oversee the program.

In Los Angeles, the board will consist of 20 members, four each from the building trades and contractors association and 12 from minority-group organizations. Those 12 are broken down to four spots for Negroes, four for Mexican-Americans, three for Asians and one American Indian.

Similarly, the Boston agreement established a 9-man board, three each from union, contractors and minority groups. The Denver plan has a 12-member board, including six from minority organizations.

In Boston, the board in turn created a non-profit organization which will use a $500,000 grant from the Dept. of Labor to administer the program. The Los Angeles agreement calls for each craft to establish an operations committee which will classify applicants for jobs at the appropriate level—apprentice, trainee or journeyman.

The Los Angeles agreement was signed at a meeting of the full city council with press coverage. John A. Cinquemani, executive secretary of the Los Angeles Building and Construction Trades Council and one of the signers of the agreement, told the press that "one important ingredient is missing—jobs" and urged the council to take "bold steps to create jobs in the city."

All three agreements will span five years. The original Boston agreement is for one year, renewable annually for a total of five years overall. Denver set up an 18-month program originally, also with extensions to five years, and the Los Angeles agreement is for five years, with year-to-year extensions on a self-renewing basis after that.

Air Controllers Merge with MEBA

A nationwide referendum among members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Association resulted in a 92 percent majority in favor of joining the AFL-CIO Marine Engineers.

PATCO Pres. John Leyden said he was "greatly enthused" by the vote to ratify proposals previously approved by the organization's convention.

The merger "brings us new resources, including MEBA's very considerable experience in labor-management relations for professional people," he said.

MEBA Pres. Jesse Calhoon said he expects both groups will find "great dividends" in the affiliation.

PATCO, formed some three years ago, has 7,300 members.

Railroad Strike Halted As Nixon Names Board

that management had forced the breakoff in negotiations by rejecting ground rules proposed by the mediator.

The strike was initiated against the Baltimore & Ohio, the Louisville & Nashville and the Southern Pacific railroads.

The former Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen initiated the bargaining back in 1965, after a compulsory arbitration award allowing railroads to abolish most contested jobs had expired. After the Firemen merged with three other unions to form the United Transportation Union, the new organization took up the case.

To the union, there are two major principles involved. One is the merits of the case itself. And the other is the conviction that railroad management will avoid the give-and-take of collective bargaining secure in the belief that Congress will impose compulsory arbitration before allowing a shutdown of rail services.

In calling the strike against only three railroads, Luna said the UTU has made "every effort" to settle the issue and has sought to avoid inconveniencing the public. But, he added, "railroad management, in its destructive determination to acquire compulsory arbitration by going back again and again to Congress over bargainable issues, now has forced us to exercise our economic strength."

Unlike other segments of industry, which has generally opposed compulsory arbitration, railroad management has long lobbied for a prohibition against strikes and has used threats to shut down the entire railroad system as a bludgeon to compel government intervention in strikes against a part of the industry.

During the brief period the walkout was permitted to take place, the strike was 100 percent effective as members of other railroad unions respected the picket lines of the striking UTU members. Some 78,000 railroad workers in 16 states were affected.

Top Editorial Award Won by United Paper

United Paper, the newspaper of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, won the top award for editorial excellence in the journalistic awards contest of the International Labor Press Association among international newspapers of 50,000 to 150,000 circulation.

The July 4 issue of the AFL-CIO News incorrectly listed the runner-up publication in that category, the Allied Industrial Worker, as the winner.

Labor's Stand Upheld:

Court Curbs NLRB On Jurisdiction Rifts

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia told the National Labor Relations Board to stay out of jurisdictional disputes over construction work when the unions involved have agreed to arbitrate the dispute.

Upholding the position of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., which filed a friend-of-the-court brief, the 2-1 ruling by a three-judge appeals panel was that Congress did not intend the employer to be a party to a jurisdictional dispute within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.

Therefore, the judges ruled, the NLRB had no right to decide the dispute, since the unions contesting the issue had previously agreed to let it be settled by the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

The decision, according to the department's general counsel, Louis Sherman, is important to construction unions and employers. Sherman said it gives "added status" to the role of the Joint Board in ruling on disputes.

"The Joint Board often reverses an employer's assignment of work to a particular union," Sherman declared. "The labor board usually takes the employer's way out."

The appellate court judges set aside a 1968 NLRB order and denied enforcement of a finding that Plasterers Local 79 committed an unfair practice by picketing two Houston, Tex., tile firms in protest against an award of work by the NLRB to a tile setters' affiliate of Bricklayers Local 20.

The court majority said "the NLRB may not properly proceed to determine a jurisdictional dispute" under Section 10(k) of the labor act "when the disputing unions have agreed to settle their dispute through binding arbitration."

A new method of setting tile raised a question of union jurisdiction over the work. When the two unions disagreed over the issue on construction of an addition to the University of Houston library, the dispute was submitted to the Joint Board.

The Joint Board awarded the disputed work to the Plasterers, with certain exceptions. Shortly afterwards, the NLRB held a hearing to settle the dispute, rejecting the Plasterers' claim that the notice of hearing should be quashed because the unions had agreed on a method of voluntary settlement. It ruled that the tile setters were entitled to do the work in dispute.

The appeals judges declared "in our view the NLRB erred in claiming authority" under the labor law to settle a dispute between two unions when the unions had "agreed on a method for binding arbitration."

This was the position taken by the Building Trades Dept., which told the court that the jurisdiction dispute machinery—which dates back to 1948—has "resulted in thousands of job decisions and the rapid elimination of many work stoppages."

"The stability of this system, which is essential to the maintenance of industrial peace," it said, "is being threatened by the NLRB ruling which encourages forum shopping and the effective withdrawal of jurisdictional disputes" from the scope of the private settlement machinery.

The department took the position that the NLRB has no legal right to hear any dispute where there is a binding agreement among unions to settle it privately.

Citizens Group Backs National Health Drive

Strong support for enactment of national health insurance has been added by a 100-member citizens group which announced a plan to be introduced in the Senate.

The plan is similar to the bill introduced in the House earlier this year by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

Both plans would call for a comprehensive national health program which would be financed with a combination of federal funds and employer and worker contributions. It would replace Medicare and Medicaid as well as private hospitalization insurance.

The new plan was announced by the Committee for National Health Insurance, headed by Leonard Woodcock, president of the United Auto Workers. The group was founded by the late UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther.

In announcing the program, Woodcock described it as "identical in its substantive features" to the Griffiths bill.

Leaders of the panel were optimistic about the chances of enactment of national health insurance, calling it "an idea whose time has come."

Dr. Michael E. DeBakey, president of the Baylor College of Medicine, and a member of the group, said he "has found a sense of urgency in the medical profession concerning the health care of all the people" and predicted that the opposition of organized medicine to national health insurance might be less than expected.

Committee member Dr. I. S. Falk of Yale University, predicted that opponents of national health insurance might be able to delay its passage but not defeat it.

Piano Plant Qualifies For Trade Act Relief

Piano workers left jobless by rising imports will receive federal assistance under the Trade Expansion Act. And another group of workers, hurt by cutbacks in U.S. production of barber chairs, have been declared eligible for federal benefits.

In both cases, unions representing the workers have fought for years to reverse trade policies that were exporting thousands of jobs—and to convince the U.S. Tariff Commission that workers adversely affected were entitled to federal help under the 1962 law.

Eight AFL-CIO unions representing piano workers presented an appeal to the Tariff Commission last November on the impact of foreign piano imports.

The first breakthrough came when the Labor Dept. certified workers at the Story & Clark Piano Co. at Grand Haven, Mich., members of the Allied Industrial Workers.

All 280 workers at that plant are on temporary leave without pay until July 27 when the plant is expected to reopen. About a dozen have been laid off permanently.

The AIW piano workers who lost their jobs after May 13 are eligible for assistance — higher unemployment compensation, plus retraining and relocation expenses if necessary.

Eligible workers will receive a cash adjustment allowance equal to 65 percent of their weekly pay with a maximum payment of $85 a week.

Duration of the payments is normally limited to 52 weeks, the Labor Dept. noted, but up to 26 additional weeks may be allowed for workers to complete approved training courses. An additional 13 weeks may be allowed for those who were over 60 when they lost their jobs.

Pres. Nixon's authorization for assistance to members of another union, the Furniture Workers, came after the Tariff Commission split evenly—3 to 3—on whether the domestic barber chair industry was seriously injured by imports.

In cases where the commission is equally divided, the President can accept the finding of either side. In this case, which affects workers at the Emil J. Paidar Co. of Chicago, he accepted the finding of serious injury and authorized extension of adjustment assistance.

Health-Safety Fund Set As Oil Contracts Goal

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers will stress health and safety provisions and effective wage increases in contract negotiations with oil companies in coming months.

The union's national oil bargaining policy committee said it will ask oil companies to spend one-tenth of 1 cent for each barrel of petroleum refined to finance research on health and safety hazards encountered by workers.

The OCAW will propose this research fund as a condition for renewing about 435 contracts with oil companies that expire next Dec. 31, union Pres. A. F. Grospiron said. The fund would be jointly administered by the union and the industry.

Other proposals union negotiators will be working for when bargaining opens about Nov. 1 include:

- General wage increases of 50 cents an hour effective next Jan. 1 and another 50 cents an hour on Jan. 1, 1972.
- Substantial improvements in pensions.
- A uniform hospitalization-medical insurance program with costs paid by employers. Currently, such insurance coverage varies from employer to employer and employes generally pay the first $15 a month of the costs.
- Three additional paid holidays each year.
- Agreements to cover workers in case of total or partial shutdown of plants by offering jobs to affected employes in other company facilities or provide them severance pay or early retirement benefits.

The union's national chemical bargaining committee also proposed a research fund for health and safety. It would be funded by a levy of 2 cents per hour per worker, Grospiron said.

OCAW negotiations with chemical firms take place at different dates during the year.

AFTRA Locals Ratify New Network Contracts

New contracts between the Television & Radio Artists and three broadcasting networks have been ratified by AFTRA members in five network cities—Los Angeles, New York, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco.

AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff said an "overwhelming majority" of members voted at meetings in the five cities to approve offers by NBC, ABC and CBS managements for increased wages and improved working conditions for 20,000 union members.

Hazard insurance for newsmen was won at the same time in new agreements for staff newsmen and staff announcers on radio stations of the Mutual Broadcasting System in New York and Washington. Wolff said these also provide improved rates, fees and guarantees, and better vacation benefits.

The AFTRA settlements with the three networks affect members in these categories: announcers, newsmen, network correspondents, transcriptions, recorded commercial announcements, network sustaining and two others.

The networks agreed to raise their pension and welfare contributions from 5 percent of salary to 6.5 percent. The base pay of network staff newsmen was raised from $350 a week to $375 retroactive to last Nov. 16, with raises to $400 next November and to $410 a year later.

Won for the first time was pay for the re-use of commercials made in the United States and used in other countries.

Besides the network settlements, AFTRA reached agreement with managements in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles on local TV and radio codes and on new contracts covering staff newsmen in those cities.

Coast Naval Unit Picks Metal Trades

Long Beach, Calif.—The Long Beach Metal Trades Council, AFL-CIO, defeated an unaffiliated union to win exclusive bargaining rights for more than 400 blue collar workers at the Long Beach Naval Station.

The vote, in a representation election conducted under federal Executive Order 11491, was MTC 175, National Association of Government Employes 139.

The council said the winning of exclusive recognition is a "significant victory" for the affiliated organization which already is the exclusive bargaining representative of 6,000 wage board workers at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard. The campaign was directed by the Cooperative Committee on Organizing Federal Employes, created by affiliates of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

New York City Cracks Down On Landlords

New York—City officials began cracking down on holdout landlords who have refused to sign contracts negotiated with the Service Employes.

The city obtained a court injunction ordering landlords to stop endangering public health and welfare by withholding essential services from apartment tenants.

SEIU Local 32B, representing maintenance and service workers, struck more than 200 landlords who balked at observing a contract agreement reached several weeks ago. The landlords charged that increases voted by the City Council for rent-controlled apartments were too small.

After the strike started the city sent notices instructing balky landlords to reduce rents to compensate tenants for lack of services. Then it asked for court injunctions.

In June the union negotiated a three-year agreement with building operators represented by the Realty Advisory Board. The contract provided wage hikes of $40 a week over the contract term, and other benefits to 25,000 union members serving 5,000 apartment buildings in Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens.

Workers Rediscovered

IN THE PAST FEW MONTHS political leaders, writers, television executives and others whose views set in motion a "new trend" have rediscovered the American worker.

There have been lengthy magazine articles, some TV shows, Sunday newspaper features—all mostly dealing with the "blue collar worker," the "lower middle class" or other sociological designations.

The political analysts have chosen to describe the rediscovered group in the somewhat wider term of "Middle America." But it all boils down essentially to the same thing: the millions of Americans who make up what economists call the "labor force," who do the nation's work and who to a very large extent do not have it "made" in economic or social terms.

A number of newspapers recently carried stories about a private document prepared for the President by the Labor Dept. dealing with the problems of blue collar workers. Columnist Joseph Kraft says that the report covers a group of 70 million persons or 40 percent of the electorate and that the chief finding is that blue collar work has a "dead end" quality, that the ordinary worker in the $5,000 to $10,000 bracket has trouble making ends meet as his children grow older.

But the really basic point made by the study, according to varied news reports, is that there are few if any government programs aimed directly at helping the ordinary worker; that many of the current or proposed programs bypass or ignore the very real problems of this great bulk of Americans who make the country go.

THE AFL-CIO has hammered away at this problem since its founding. It has worked hard for tax justice geared to an honest break for the ordinary worker who has no loopholes or gimmicks to fall back on.

It has pushed for federal aid to education that would aid all Americans, including the children of American workers. It has sought community college aid so that workers' children can attend college more easily; it has fought for scholarship aid so that lack of funds will not prevent higher education for those who are qualified.

And there has been the unrelenting fight for improved social security and Medicare and disability coverage and health care that meets workers' needs and is economically possible. There is the drive for housing for all at a price workers can afford.

These programs and countless others tied in with the basics of organizing and bargaining, are what the AFL-CIO is all about. And they are designed for all workers, all Americans, not only those who belong to trade unions.

The AFL-CIO has long known and understood what the media is now discovering—the problems of American workers and the very marked limitations of what has been called the "affluent society."

The trade union movement's program for America in the 1970s is the foundation for any approach to improve the lot of America's workers, blue, white or gray collar, skilled or unskilled, of whatever color or national origin or religion.

Hard-Learned Lesson of Past Ignored by 'New' Isolationists

By John P. Roche

EVERYONE HAS PROBABLY on one occasion or another had a variation of the solipsistic nightmare. He (or she) alone is vividly aware of impending disaster, but all efforts to alert others fail. One screams at the top of his lungs, grabs bystanders, but they do not hear. There is a total failure of communication.

Sometimes life seems to resemble this bad dream. Arthur Koestler once wrote a poignant essay on his efforts to convince pre-World War II Englishmen that Nazi atrocities were real. They would listen in rather embarrassed fashion to this obviously paranoid account and then, on one pretext or another, nervously scuttle off.

The narrator, aware that he is being sized up for a straitjacket, gets more and more compulsive and shrill and is likely to end up screaming with frustration. Which, of course, confirms the suspicion of his audience that he is a nut and his "facts" are lunatic fantasies.

Our greatest problem with intelligent young people today arises from this kind of communications gap. A while ago an old friend and I spent an evening discussing foreign policy with a group of talented students. By a curious coincidence, we had both emerged from the socialist, anti-World War II movement—and we were both endowed by our Creator with extraordinary memory-banks.

When the discussion—which was cordial but utterly inconclusive—ended, we sat musing. In essence, we had been talking Gaelic to them, and the students had been replying in Greek; we just never met on the same level of discourse. However, what struck us both was they reacted to the world precisely as we had back in 1940-41.

They have their "military-industrial complex;" we had our "merchants of death," the "munitions barons" who started wars to drum up trade.

They talk about the "unrepresentative, repressive regime" in Saigon; we denounced "Polish colonels," "French imperialists," and British colonialism.

THE RHETORICAL PARALLELS are singular. Listen, for example, to this: "intervention [in the European war is] a fantastic moral proposition . . . out of the devastation and hatred of wholesale war does not come any promise of a fair peace . . . the basis of all our beliefs—the respect for the inherent value and dignity of the individual—would be lost the world over in the impersonal brutality of war. . . . We are young. In the light of a greater inspiration or a higher wisdom we are ready to change our ideals or our conclusions. But we shall be shamed out of neither." (Atlantic Monthly, September, 1940)

Kingman Brewster of Yale who like most of us was in the anti-war camp, changed his conclusions, not because of "greater inspiration" or "higher wisdom," but because we were attacked at Pearl Harbor.

Right down to Dec. 7, 1941, we fought passionately against intervention—in the summer of 1941, we almost eliminated the draft (it was extended by a vote of 203-202 in the House).

But what is important here is that, like the young militants today, we were totally immune to rational argument. Like them, we were not unpatriotic or cowardly—nor were we the high moralists we pretended to be. We were prepared to fight for our own turf, but not to protect somebody else's.

Recently Ithiel de Sola Pool, the distinguished MIT political scientist, prepared an analysis that cut to the heart of the problem.

"What none of our last three Presidents has recognized," Pool says, "is that serious as the political consequences may be, a democracy cannot without internal disintegration use war as a means until it is so thoroughly provoked and badly abused that the innate pacifism of its people is overwhelmed by a sense of imminent and absolute danger."

If Pool is right, it would take a Pearl Harbor to rally real support for an active internationalist foreign policy. But a nuclear Pearl Harbor is far too high a price to pay for educating the post-war generation, and our second-strike capacity should deter such an attack in any case. So we are left with the question: Will the post-war generation ever emerge from its isolationist cocoon? If not, the relatively stable international sytem that has existed since 1945 could slide into chaos.

Sellers Use Fine-Print Clause To Seize Cars, Keep Payments

By Sidney Margolius

THUG-LIKE TACTICS, personal abuse, threats of embarrassment, loss of job and jailing, seizures of cars, homes and other property, are just some of the devices used by collectors to harass debtors who owe even small amounts or have been forced to delay payments.

Sometimes the same cars will be repossessed over and over again. Often cars are repossessed even after the buyer has paid more than the real worth. Tardy debtors even have lost their homes for default on small debts.

These are just some of the scandalous collection practices going on in the United States today as revealed by recent hearings of the new National Commission on Consumer Finance.

The commission was established to investigate such practices as part of the recently-enacted "truth in lending" law. "Truth in lending" requires that lenders and sellers tell you the annual percentage rate they charge for time payments. The new law also provides some safeguards against garnishment and door-to-door selling abuses. But the heroic Congresswoman Leonor Sullivan was determined also to probe the widespread reports of unfair collection methods.

The Consumer Finance Commission already has opened a can of worms, and one of the biggest and crawliest is the tactics used in car repossessions.

WHEN YOU BUY a car on time, and also often household equipment, there usually is a fine-print clause buried in your contract stating that the creditor has the right to repossess the property if you default. Usually the contract says he can do it without your permission, even if he has to enter your premises.

Lawyers call this "self help repossession." Many self-help repossessions involve "trespass, deceit, fraud and even perjury," Ralph Stone, a St. Louis Legal Aid attorney and a former auto dealer himself, told the Consumer Finance Commission. Sometimes the car dealer actually avoids payment because he'd rather get the car back.

One St. Louis workingman, a returned veteran, bought a car and made a substantial down payment. When the first payment came due he mailed a money order for it. But the dealer said he didn't get the money order. When the second payment came due the buyer mailed a second money order. But the dealer told the buyer that he was a month in arrears and demanded payment immediately. The buyer explained that he had mailed the first money order and offered to show the stub as evidence. But the dealer repossessed the car from the street in front of the buyer's house.

The young worker thought his car had been stolen. The police, who often get such reports when cars are suddenly repossessed, found what had really happened. The buyer, even though his union local was out on strike, offered to borrow to make up the lost payment and get his car back. The dealer refused. The St. Louis Legal Aid Society repeated the offer in writing, and had the buyer visit the dealer and tender the payment. The dealer still refused.

In another case a man bought a new car for over $2,000. It was financed by the factory's own finance company. Because of circumstances beyond his control he fell behind in just one installment. Even though he had kept in touch with the finance company, when the second installment came due the car was repossessed. He then offered to pay both installments plus repossession costs and late charges. The finance company refused and said they had sold the car back to the dealer. The dealer denied that he had re-bought the car.

Later the dealer did admit that the finance company had returned the car to him. But he refused to give it to the buyer and take his payments and expenses to date. Stone points out that the dealer now had both the down payment and the car and still could sue the buyer for a deficiency judgment.

One of the most revealing cases is that of a laborer who bought a 1962 Pontiac for $800 in 1969. I would estimate that this model, that old, if in operating condition is worth about $250-$350 at normal depreciation rates. Stone believes this exorbitant price really was a way of evading the "truth in lending" law. The dealer told the buyer he would not charge any finance charge. But instead of a finance charge of normally about $120 on this sale, the dealer overcharged $400 or more for the car itself.

This incident should serve as a warning to compare both the price of a car and the finance charge. Other sellers also are using this loophole in "truth in lending," Stone reports. While such practices are a violation of the "truth in lending" law, they are hard to prove.

In this case the buyer made a $100 down payment. He could not even get the car home. It stopped halfway there.

He pleaded with the dealer for another car or repair of the one he had. He was told that there was no warranty, and that he owed another $50 due that day. He did not pay it. The very next morning the car was repossessed.

Stone points out that the authority to repossess is buried in a maze of small print, and "the average person neither understands nor reads that far in the contract, nor is given time to do so if he should wish to."

Resale of repossessed cars nearly always result in deficiencies for which the buyer's wages are garnished or his home and other property taken at a sheriff's sale, Prof. Philip Shuchman of the University of Connecticut told the Consumer Finance Commission. Debtors often get credit for only about half the actual retail value of the repossessed cars.

One car had been bought for a net cash price of $2,605. The following year the buyer defaulted after having paid a total of $1,835. The finance company repossessed the car and resold it to the original dealer for $400. The car then had a quoted retail value of $850-$900 and a wholesale value of $700. It was then resold for $995, even though the first buyer got a credit of only $400 against his deficiency.

Extension of Voting Rights Act Hailed as Key to Negro Gains

TEAMWORK by labor, civil rights and church groups led to extension of the Voting Rights Act this year—"the most effective civil rights law passed by Congress"—AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Young declared.

"More than 1 million Negroes have registered" and voted in the South since enactment of the original law in 1965, said Young, pointing out that some 400 Negroes have also been elected to political office there during the same period.

He said that while there hasn't been a "total overturn . . . of the political establishment of the South . . . southern politicians are becoming more responsive to minority groups and to more liberal groups."

Young cited the "decline of George Wallace's strength in Alabama" as an example of the change brought about, in large measure by the Voting Rights Act. Young appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Young said that the renewed and expanded law, which now includes a nationwide ban on literacy tests, uniform residency requirements and the 18-year-old vote, will aid formation of coalitions between Negro and young voters to elect more moderate and responsible officials.

HE CREDITED passage of the new Voting Rights Act, despite strong White House opposition, to an effective combination of civil rights, church and union efforts in Congress, as well as the hard work of "a number of influential Republicans," including Representatives McCulloch of Ohio, Anderson and Railsback of Illinois and Robinson of New York.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE NATURAL RESOURCES of a country are its heritage and its future.

The late Gifford Pinchot, probably the most noted U.S. conservationist, once said: "A nation deprived of liberty may win it, a nation divided may reunite, but a nation whose natural resources are destroyed must inevitably pay the penalty of poverty, degradation and decay."

Most of our natural resource reserves—minerals, coal, oil, wildlife, timber, for example—are found on public lands. Some 755 million acres or one-third of the total land area of the United States is public land.

Currently the responsibility for the administration of public lands is placed on a number of federal agencies. The largest is the Bureau of Land Management within the Dept. of Interior, responsible for 62 percent of public lands. The Forestry Service of the Agriculture Dept. administers 25 percent, the Fish & Wildlife Service and the Defense Dept., 4 percent and the National Park Service, 3 percent.

The other day a 19-member commission, named by Congress in 1964, completed a five-year, $7 million study on public lands policy and submitted it to the President and the Congress.

The report, touted as the first comprehensive study of public land use undertaken in the last two centuries, made some 350 recommendations.

The President received the report in the White House Rose Garden from Rep. Wayne N. Aspinall (D-Colo.), commission chairman. While the chief executive stated that the report would have an enormous impact on public land policy, others raised questions.

From the public viewpoint, one of the most significant recommendations was the spelling out that the public domain must not fall into private hands.

This is a considerable advance over some of the top advisers to Pres. Eisenhower who openly stated that they believed the federal government should figure out how fast it could get rid of public lands and its invaluable resources.

Nevertheless, there was general agreement that the report went out of its way to satisfy the interests of oil, mining, mineral, grazing and timber interests.

Public lands are not to be kept by the federal government just for the sake of some principle. Wise administration provides that natural wealth must be utilized carefully but not exploited and that whenever possible, rehabilitated for future use.

CONSERVATIONISTS expressed concern that the report contained no deeply meaningful projections of the use of natural resources. There was little emphasis on the need for reseeding, for reforestation, restocking of streams and improving water flow.

Most authorities welcomed the recommendation for modernization of public land laws. There are some 3,700 separate acts on the books dating back to 1792 and the period that followed which encouraged rapid settlement and development of frontier country.

Also, the idea of merging the Bureau of Land Management and the Forestry Service was considered sensible. But the crying need has always been for adequate funds for both agencies.

On the other hand, a proposal that Congress—particularly the Senate and House Interior Committees—act on a day-to-day basis in administering the public lands program was not considered very practical by some observers.

Chairman Aspinall and the majority of his committee could not be called conservationists in the historical sense. Most of the members have either been a part of—or acted on behalf of—various private interests. Perhaps, as one observer said, this is the best report we can get out of this committee.

To many concerned about the future of our public lands, the great disappointment is that the rare opportunity to define clearcut policies and safeguards on public lands, and project out needs over the long range, was largely lost.

RENEWAL of the highly effective Voting Rights Act was a major victory for the civil rights coalition and will help elect more responsive public officials in the South, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Kenneth Young, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News. The AFL-CIO produced program is broadcast nationwide on Mutual radio.

NATIONWIDE ORGANIZING DRIVE of the Office & Professional Employes to bring union representation to thousands of workers in the banking industry gets an assist from two members of the OPEIU executive board in San Francisco. Here, Vice Presidents J. Oscar Bloodworth, left, and Edward P. Springman join members of OPEIU Local 3 in passing out handbills. The union's executive board was in San Francisco for its semi-annual meeting.

Metrics Study Enlists Workers' Cooperation

Organized labor will have a major voice in deciding whether the United States should convert to the metric system for weights and measures.

The National Bureau of Standards is currently undertaking a study of the metric system and preparing its recommendations for the Congress.

The bureau has established a National Metric Study Advisory Committee, which has asked presidents of unions in virtually every industry for their advice and opinions on a changeover to the metric system.

A three-page questionnaire has been received by union officials seeking their views on the advantages, disadvantages, problems and estimated costs of converting to metrics in industries employing their members.

Among the questions being asked are those relating to worker-owned tools and equipment that would become obsolete and the cost of replacing them with metric-measuring tools.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has written to the union presidents urging that they participate fully in the committee survey. He notes that the AFL-CIO supports the metric study legislation and calls the work of the advisory committee "very comprehensive."

Meany added that the advisory committee needs assistance on its final assessment of a metric program for the nation. Labor was represented on the advisory panel by Vernon Jirikowic, research director of the Machinists, and James Noe, who was research director of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers until his recent death.

The question has become particularly urgent in recent years because the United States is now the last large industrial nation to keep the old system of British pounds and inches.

Japan completed its conversion in 1968 following a ten-year period in which tools, books, maps, roadsigns and other measuring devices were changed gradually.

Britain started its changeover in 1965 and hopes to be "mostly metric" by 1975.

Younger Workers Unaware of Benefits

Young workers are largely unaware that social security works for them as well as retirees, the Social Security Administration found in a recent survey.

The survey showed that 83 percent of workers aged 18-29 didn't know about survivor benefits and 69 percent didn't associate social security with disability benefits. In fact, of the 25 million persons drawing social security, 6 million aren't retirees at all—they're disabled workers and their wives, young widows or minor children and students.

As a result of the survey, the Social Security Administration is conducting a public information campaign to inform all Americans of the important insurance protection they and their families receive under social security before reaching retirement age.

D.C. Stores Paying $2 Minimum Wage

A minimum wage of $2 an hour went into effect July 1 for 45,000 retail store employes in the District of Columbia, 40 cents more than the federal minimum wage.

Workers in department stores, liquor stores and other retail business must be paid at least $2, an increase of 20 cents over the minimum wage set for the retail trade by the D.C. Minimum Wage and Industrial Safety Board last July under the district's minimum wage law.

The retail order, one of eight supervised by the board, also requires overtime rates for hours worked in excess of 40 a week.

The only exceptions from the wage order are for workers under 18, apprentices and adult learners, who may be paid 20 cents less than the new minimum, and handicapped workers, whose rates are set by the board on application.

Urban League Staff Gets Labor Briefing

Eleven Urban League staff members recently took a three-day course at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in an effort to broaden their knowledge of the labor movement to help them in their work in the black community.

The program was developed jointly by Center Director Fred K. Hoehler, Jr. and Urban League National Director of Labor Affairs N. B. Johnson, II, and was under the direction of Otto Pragan of the Center.

Class subjects were selected to answer the immediate needs of the new field representatives who will implement the Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program (LEAP), in St. Louis, Atlanta, Los Angeles, Akron and New York City.

They will work with local central bodies, building trades councils and the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute to seek, train and find jobs for the young and the hard-core unemployed from the black community.

This down-to-earth purpose was put in perspective in classes led by Pragan, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman and Education Dir. Walter Davis; Thomas Hannigan, director of research and education for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; and Edmund Ayoub, assistant director of research for the Steelworkers.

After its Urban League alumni have had several months of actual experience in the field, the center plans to invite them back, listen to their progress reports and incorporate useful features into the regular Staff Development Program for the benefit of union-member students.

URBAN LEAGUE staffers hear N. B. Johnson, II, national director of labor affairs for the league, sum up results of the group's three-day orientation and training program held at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. Objective of the jointly-administered program was to equip field representatives with trade union knowledge to enable them to work with the federation's Human Resources Development Institute, local central bodies and building trades councils in job recruitment and training.

Carl McPeak, 65, Dies; Battled 'Right-to-Work'

Carl A. McPeak, who fought state "right-to-work" proposals vigorously wherever they appeared, died July 4 after a long illness. He was 65.

McPeak was an AFL-CIO staff representative who, down the years from 1958, worked effectively with state and local central body leaders to defeat legislation aimed at preventing unions and employers from negotiating union shop agreements.

He was as successful in putting out anti-union brush fires as he had been in halting oil fires in his early days as an engineer in the Oklahoma oil fields. In one year alone—1958—he stumped six states to help defeat five of six R-T-W proposals.

Later in Indiana, working with the National Council for Industrial Peace as well as trade union groups he helped bring about repeal of the state's "right-to-work" law. Equally important were his efforts to block repeated attempts to ban the union shop in states such as Oklahoma.

CARL A. McPEAK

McPeak was born in Parsons, Kan. He became a union member when the depression struck the oil fields, and joined the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers. He was president of OCAW Local 283, of the union's 5th District Council and of the former Oklahoma CIO Council before becoming a CIO organizer and CIO-PAC director in six Southwest states.

He played an active role with the CIO's Southern Organizing Committee, as state CIO director for Texas, and then as assistant to the CIO executive vice president.

When the AFL and CIO merged in 1955, McPeak was named assistant director of organization in the West and Southwest. He was "loaned" to the federation's Special Committee on State Legislation in 1957, and since then had worked with COPE and other groups in legislative and political action fields.

Per Capita Hike Voted By Upholsterers Union

Los Angeles—A 50-cent increase in monthly per capita payments was approved by delegates to the 36th quadrennial convention of the Upholsterers here. The increase will come in two steps of 25 cents each—the first next Sept. 1 and another Sept. 1, 1972.

UIU members belonging to locals serviced by their own business agents currently pay $1.25 in per capita dues and for locals which are serviced by UIU international representatives the dues are $1.35 a month.

Revenues from the per capita increase will be used for additional operating costs of the union and for an expanded educational program, the UIU reported.

Delegates also renewed a 25-cent monthly levy—which is used to finance the union's organizing programs.

UIU Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann noted that the union's organizing efforts resulted in enrolling 5,629 workers in 84 shops in the United States and Canada since the last convention.

But Hoffmann said in his keynote address that the potential is greater and urged the union to continue to press for organizing the unorganized as its prime obligation.

Among the newly organized workers, more than 2,400 are in the South.

"Southern states continue to be the lowest in the percentage of organized workers and the lowest in the average weekly wages of industrial workers in the United States," Hoffmann told the 140 delegates.

"The gains we have made," he added, "were made in the face of persistent, continuous and vicious anti-union hostility and practices of employers inspired, encouraged and back-stopped by anti-labor laws of recent years."

Hoffmann, who has served the UIU as president since 1937, was re-elected to another four-year term.

Leon Forman, business manager of UIU Local 500 in Los Angeles, was elected secretary-treasurer to succeed R. A. Albarino, who retired.

Two new positions, vice presidents at-large, were filled by Jess Gonzales, Los Angeles joint board business agent, and Wardell Lamberson, business agent of Philadelphia Local 404.

Donat Thireault was elected vice president of the union's Canadian division. He succeeds Victor Valin, retired.

To help solve legal problems in the Canadian province of Quebec, the UIU adopted a French name "Union Internationale des Rembourreurs de L'Amerique Du Nord" to be used in addition to its English name.

In a three-way race for vice president of the union's bedding division, Bob Beck of Munster, Ind., was elected over Al Severino of Boston and Edward Tomalavage of Elizabeth, N.J. Beck replaces Hubert Bell, who resigned.

11 More Growers Sign Farm Union Contracts

beginning with the first harvest in June has been announced in full-page newspaper ads.

Union committees in more than 50 cities are helping promote the sale of union grapes while continuing to push the nationwide boycott of non-union grapes declared by UFWOC in 1967 and supported by the AFL-CIO and its unions ever since.

The farm workers credit the boycott with moving growers to end their refusal to meet with the union and to bargain contract terms with it for the members it represents. They give credit also to workers who refuse to cross union picket lines.

First contracts negotiated by the UFWOC were with wine grape growers in California. This year the union broke new ground in winning contracts with table grape ranchers who previously had refused to sign. To date, 48 contracts have been signed.

At the same time, the union has been chosen as bargaining agent for farm hands at every ranch where a poll has been taken, either by secret-ballot vote, by a check of membership cards against the payroll or by some other method.

The first polls were supervised by a committee of three clergymen, selected by the union and by ranch owners. Since then, the method has varied from ranch to ranch. But in every case the choice of the union was free and enthusiastic, according to AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher, who has taken part in many of the key negotiations.

Pay Protection Held Issue on Penn Central

Congress must act to protect railroad employes and the public against possible banker manipulation of the bankrupt Penn Central Railroad, the Railway Clerks told the House Interstate Commerce Committee.

Leslie E. Dennis, BRAC executive director, testified that many employes have had trouble cashing their pay checks, even after a court order issued July 2.

"If that happens again, there will be no one to run the railroad," Dennis testified when asked about the possibility of an employe work stoppage.

Dennis charged that Penn Central, which became the nation's biggest rail carrier on its recent creation by merger, has been withholding deductions from pay for U.S. savings bonds but some employes have received no bonds for two or three months.

The witness said the public is not aware of the fact that Penn Central management recently voted a 5 percent salary increase for top officers, effective this month after the railroad filed a bankruptcy petition.

Dennis said "we feel this committee must take immediate steps to protect the public interest, and the interest of the employes of the Penn Central."

If Congress were to postpone action until after a full investigation has been made, "it would simply be too late," Dennis declared. Besides Penn Central, other railroad managements may be unable to meet their payrolls, he said.

The BRAC spokesman concluded with a plea for "immediate transfusion of cash," followed by "some type of legislation" that will assure a national rail passenger system. Any loans, however, should spell out the railroad's obligation to honor its labor agreements and should prohibit any dividends until the loan has been completely repaid, the witness said.

Ford Urges Joint Efforts On Shipping

House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford urged maritime management and labor to keep their promises if the Merchant Marine Act of 1970 is to succeed and "help to put this industry back on its feet."

The Nixon Administration's proposal to revitalize the American-flag fleet in the next decade passed the House 307-1 and is now awaiting Senate action.

Speaking at a luncheon sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., Ford said:

Shipyard owners and workers must "keep prices and wages at reasonable and realistic levels" and must streamline operations to "cut the cost of American-built ships, without cutting their quality."

The shipping industry must "introduce innovative new concepts" to speed up "the loading and unloading of cargo," Ford said.

He called on the merchant marine to put an end to the "self-defeating warfare" between the subsidized and unsubsidized segments. The new legislation will treat all American operators "fairly and equally" and will make "possible a unified industry" to fight "foreign competition," Ford declared.

In Surprise Action:

Senate Votes Ceiling On Farm Subsidies

Huge corporate farms which have been receiving federal crop subsidy checks of hundreds of thousands of dollars—millions in some cases—may find the money well going dry.

In a surprise move, the Senate voted 40-35 approval of an amendment to the Agriculture Dept. appropriation bill to place a limit of $20,000 on the amount the government will pay a grower under any federal crop control program.

It was a stunning reversal of past performance. For the last two years, it was the House which voted for a subsidy ceiling and the Senate which balked at any payment limitations. Then the pattern was that House conferees—made up of Agriculture Committee members who supported farm subsidies—would bow to their Senate counterparts and the limit on payments would be deleted from the final version of the bill.

This year, the House did not amend the appropriations bill to impose a subsidy limitation, so the conference picture is reversed.

Sen. Ralph T. Smith (R-Ill.), who led the bipartisan move to set a subsidy limitation, told the Senate that some $500 million a year is paid to less than one-half of 1 percent of the nation's farmers—under a New Deal program originally intended to help family farmers.

If the subsidy limitation is scuttled in the final version of the appropriations bill, a strong effort is expected to write a dollar ceiling into the general farm legislation currently being drafted by the House Agriculture Committee.

The AFL-CIO position, spelled out in a resolution adopted by the 1969 convention, is that farmers are entitled to government help to obtain "a fair return" for their crops. But, the federation stressed, "a reasonable ceiling should be placed on the amount of federal aid paid to any farm. Excessive payments to large and profitable farm enterprises cannot be justified."

In another labor-supported move, the Senate amended the agriculture appropriations bill to add $500 million to the $1.75 billion requested by the Administration and voted by the House for the food stamp program.

The added money was proposed by Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.), chairman of a Senate panel which investigated hunger in America. It was approved by a 43-28 vote.

In House action, a bill opposed by unions and favored by newspaper publishers, was passed by a 292-87 margin and was just one step from final enactment.

The legislation would exempt from antitrust laws the combined operations of supposedly competing newspapers, including joint advertising and profit-sharing agreements. The Senate had earlier passed a similar bill and a House-Senate conference committee is expected to quickly reconcile differences between the two versions.

Administration Backs Textile Import Quotas

The Nixon Administration has called for passage of legislation to regulate imports of textiles and apparel following a breakdown in efforts to negotiate voluntary quotas with Japan.

In May, the presidents of four unions—the Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Textile Workers Union of America and United Textile Workers—called for enactment of the limitations on imports as the only way to prevent the loss of thousands of jobs.

A bill introduced by Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the House Ways & Means Committee would permit quotas on textiles, apparel and shoes to the average of imports on these products in 1967 and 1968.

Sec. of Commerce Maurice Stans, described for the committee the U.S. government's negotiations with Japan, which collapsed after three days of talks in Washington. He said Japan proposed only a one-year voluntary limit on exports of textiles to the United States with a requirement that there be no extension of the agreement. The U.S. proposed a five-year limitation.

Stans said Japan's plan would have allowed increases of up to 15 percent in imports of synthetic textiles and 1 percent for woolens above 1969 levels. He said the United States would have let imports increase annually in proportion to increases in American consumption.

Federation Updates Civil Rights Booklet

A new AFL-CIO publication on civil rights dealing with all aspects of organized labor's program and record is now available from the federation.

The 24-page illustrated pamphlet "Equal Rights for All . . . the AFL-CIO Program" is a completely rewritten and updated version of an earlier federation pamphlet that was widely distributed as part of the AFL-CIO unceasing fight for human rights and social justice.

In a foreword to the new publication AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany writes that the federation has devoted a large part of its resources "to the struggle to wipe out discrimination in every area of life and to win equal access for every man woman and child to every kind of activity, institution or service that can serve to lengthen, broaden or deepen the meaning of human life."

"Equal Rights for All," AFL-CIO Publication No. 133, is available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Single copies are free; up to 100 the price is 10 cents each; in larger amounts the price is $7.50 per 100.

Abel Hits Policy Keyed To Expendable Workers

. . . a mood that is neither good for the workers or the nation."

Abel said that dissatisfaction was based on the "well-founded feeling" that they have been victimized "both by inflation that shrinks their buying power and cuts in working hours that shrink their earnings."

Abel refuted charges that wage increases have played a major role in the nation's economic difficulties. The root cause is a "profit inflation" brought about by "corporate greed," he said.

"The accelerated rise in living costs came first, long before the push for larger wage settlements," he pointed out. "From 1960 through the first half of 1969, corporate profits after taxes were up 93 percent, but the after-tax weekly earnings of the average non-supervisory worker were up only 34 percent. And in terms of real buying power, the gain for the worker was only 10 percent."

The record is plain, he said: "Workers have not shared fairly in the record prosperity of the 1960s through equitable wage adjustments. Consumers have not shared fairly in such prosperity because industry did not hold the price line when it could well have afforded to do so and still make substantial profits. If the facts on increased profits and take-home wages had been reversed, then only could the finger be pointed at unions."

Tight-money policies aimed at reducing inflation have placed crushing burdens on workers, consumers, small business and state and local government, Abel said, but they have had little effect on the rich or on blue-chip corporations.

In the face of all this, the Administration has stuck to its "game plan," which Abel called a "rather inept and calloused phrase for what it entails."

If the nation is ever going to overcome its crisis of confidence in its institutions, Abel said, "there must come from those who hold the economic, political and legislative power and authority, a general resolve to bring equity and stability to the economy without making the worker the fall guy.

"Not until this is done, not until the economy works for those who need it most—the old, the aged, the jobless, the untrained—can it be said that the economic system is meeting the needs of all Americans," he stressed.

"We think it can be done. We will continue to insist that it be done," Abel added. "And we will continue to take the position that the only correct policy regarding unemployment is one of full employment."

To assure full employment, the government must act as the employer of last resort, Abel said, and once full employment is achieved, it must be accompanied by an expanded supply of money at reasonable interest rates and full funding of federal appropriations for such socially vital needs as housing, education and health care.

In short, Abel said, "the national economy needs a fiscal stimulus, not continued fiscal restraint."

equipment and 25,000 in electrical equipment.

Since a peak last September, jobs in durable goods were down by 700,000. Most of the decline came in autos and aerospace.

In nondurable goods last month, employment was off 10,000 from the May level. While the largest declines came in foods and kindred products, down 12,000, and textiles and chemicals, each down 10,000, gains were reported in rubber and plastic products, up 26,000.

The economic slowdown in recent months also has been gradually lengthening the average duration of unemployment, which rose to 9.5 weeks in June from 9 weeks in May. It was at 8.4 weeks in June 1969.

The number of workers out of a job 15 weeks or longer rose again last month to 685,000 from 612,000 the month before. Those without jobs 15 weeks or more in June 1969 totaled 385,000.

The factory workweek remained at 39.8 hours seasonally adjusted—the lowest since September 1961 and nearly 1 hour under highs reached last year. Although factory overtime rose one-tenth of 1 hour to 3 hours, it was close to the lows set in 1964.

The workweek for nonsupervisory employes in all occupations edged up one-tenth of 1 hour from May to 37.2 hours seasonally adjusted. Hourly earnings rose 1 cent to $3.21 and were 5.6 percent above a year ago—but the smallest year-to-year change in more than two years.

Weekly earnings of nonsupervisory and production workers rose $1.65 to a record $120.05, up 4.2 percent from June 1969. But this was less than the increase in the cost of living over the same period.

While the unemployment rate for white workers declined last month to 4.2 percent from 4.6 percent, the jobless rate for Negroes rose to 8.7 percent from 8 percent. The rise in Negro unemployment was almost exclusively among teenagers with the rate climbing to 34 percent, the BLS reported.

Signalmen Elect Bates to No. 2 Post

Chicago—R. T. Bates is the new secretary-treasurer of the Railroad Signalmen. A vice president since 1967, he was named by the union executive council to succeed P. T. Drummond, who resigned recently.

Bates formerly was the union's general chairman on the Southern Pacific Co. Lines. His place as vice president was taken by J. T. Bass, grand lodge representative here. Elections for full terms will be determined by convention action at Las Vegas the week of Aug. 17.

Power Named New President Of Plasterers

Joseph T. Power has been named president of the Plasterers & Cement Masons following the resignation of Pres. Edward J. Leonard because of ill health.

The union's executive board accepted Leonard's resignation and named him president emeritus. Power, who is 50, had been executive vice president since 1959.

The new president joined Chicago Local 5 as an apprentice before World War II. He became a journeyman after five years in the armed forces, and was elected vice president, then president of Local 5. Appointed an international vice president, he became executive vice president at the union's Washington convention. He has served since 1961 as a member of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

Leonard became president in 1958 after 16 years as vice president.

Major Drive Aims For Job Safety Bill

Fight Looms To Pass Key Legislation

The House Labor Committee has approved a strong occupational safety and health bill, and the trade union movement is mobilizing a major drive to win congressional enactment this year.

Purpose of the bill, the committee stressed in its report to the House, "is to reduce the number and severity of work-related injuries and illnesses."

To do this, it would give the Secretary of Labor the power and duty to set and enforce federal safety and health standards, subject only to appeal to the courts.

Each employer would be obligated by law to provide a "safe and healthful" workplace and working conditions.

A massive two-day legislative conference has been called by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. to lobby for the bill. The conference will be held July 27-28, shortly before the legislation is expected to reach the House floor for a showdown vote.

To combat the labor-supported committee bill—named after its sponsor, Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.)—the Administration, most House Republicans and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce are seeking to substitute a substantially weaker measure.

Twelve of the Labor Committee's 15 Republican members said they will seek to substitute a proposal rejected by the committee which would set up an independent board to hold hearings and—eventually—promulgate standards, and a separate commission to conduct formal hearings on alleged violations.

The GOP committee members stated in their minority report that, "We strongly object to the com-

Conferees Agree:

School Aid Funds Top Nixon Limits

Senate and House conferees have agreed on a $4.4 billion federal aid to education bill, an increase over last year and $453 million more than the Administration requested.

The conference committee also removed one of two amendments which would hamper school desegration efforts, both inserted in the House and opposed by labor and civil rights groups.

The amendment which was removed was by Rep. Charles R. Jonas (R-N.C.) and was an effort to retain the "freedom of choice" plans designed to perpetuate dual school systems. The Supreme Court has declared such plans unconstitutional.

An amendment by Rep. Jamie L. Whitten (D-Miss.) on school busing was retained, but in a much altered form from the wording which was originally in the House bill and removed by the Senate. The original amendment provided that no federal money could be used to bus students to achieve racial balance.

But the version approved in conference "would have no legal effect," according to Administration sources who had asked that it be stricken because it would add only confusion to the bill.

The $4.4 billion final package for the 1970-71 school year was a compromise between the $4.1 billion approved by the House and the $4.8 billion voted by the Senate. The total is $606 million more than was voted for aid to education last year.

The bill also retains full funding of $1.47 billion under Title I of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, the section which provides special aid to 16,000 school districts with concentrations of poor children. The AFL-CIO made repeated efforts for retention of Title I in the basic law when a re-writing of it was threatened in House committee.

The $1.47 billion for Title I funding was a slight cut from the $1.5 billion approved by the Senate and an increase over the $1.3 billion in the House version.

The $1.5 billion which Pres. Nixon had sought for emergency school desegregation programs in the next two school years was cut in half, to $750 million. That cut was not considered severe since there were doubts that the money could be usefully spent by the time school opens in September.

Farm Workers Gains Continue In California

Delano, Calif.—The AFL-CIO Farm Workers signed their 50th grape rancher to a union contract in their increasingly successful drive to organize the industry in California, Arizona and Texas.

While union staff men kept up the union's organizing and negotiating momentum, a group of holdout growers in the Delano area announced that a majority of members are ready to pursue negotiations.

The announcement by Pres. Philip J. Feick, Jr., of the Western Employers Council, may signal a breakthrough into the ranks of the biggest ranchers.

"We are negotiating every day, and things are changing every minute," said Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. "We are willing to talk with any grower who is sincerely interested."

The latest signers are Al Missekian, who grows 350,000 boxes of grapes a year in the Delano area, and Guidera Farms of Edison, Calif., 100,000 boxes. Both will be voted on by the employes.

In all the union has signed agreements for workers engaged in nearly 100 percent of grape production in the Coachella Valley, 50 percent of Arizona and Arvin, Calif., production, and more than 25 percent in the Delano area.

A few growers have signed for San Joaquin Valley ranches, but Delano is the major objective since its workers produce about 50 percent of the California grape yield.

All UFWOC contracts follow the same standard outline—a three-year agreement with a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour now, plus an incentive payment of 25 cents per box picked; an additional 10 cents an hour per employe for the UFWOC health and welfare fund; 2 cents more per box for the fund protecting workers against layoffs; and controls on the use of "hard" pesticides used in spraying crops.

Chamber Opens Attack On Consumer Proposal

A battle over consumer protection legislation loomed in Congress after continued activity on a variety of consumer measures brought an "urgent" appeal from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to its members to help block the way.

The Chamber message, reportedly sent to 1,100 state and local affiliates, called specifically for stopping Congress from establishing an independent federal Consumer Protection Agency.

Instead, the Chamber supports keeping consumer affairs under White House control by making the President's adviser on consumer affairs a permanent post. The Administration has also proposed a White House office rather than an independent agency as advocated by labor and liberal groups.

The Chamber newsletter said an independent agency's "potential for growth and for business harassment would be virtually unlimited" and urged members to notify Congress of their opposition. The newsletter warned that the legislation is "likely to receive early floor action."

A bill to create an independent consumer agency, which would have power to speak for the consumer in the federal courts and before regulatory agencies, has been approved by a Senate subcommittee and by the full Government Operations Committee in the House.

Other consumer legislation which is progressing steadily through Congress includes a requirement that a manufacturer repair any defect within a reasonable limit of time on any product costing more than $5 or else designate the warranty as "partial." That measure, introduced by Sens. Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) and Frank Moss (D-Utah), has been passed by the Senate and sent to the House.

Also, the Senate Commerce Committee has approved "class action suits" through which one person can represent a group of consumers. An even stronger measure has been introduced in the House by Rep. Bob Eckhardt (D-Tex.)

A stiffening of penalties for violating federal flammability standards was also approved by

The House Labor & Industry Committee voted down a proposal to ban union-shop agreements by a 5-3 vote, thus killing a "right-to-work" bill for the second year in a row.

Since the union shop ban was repealed in 1956, the State AFL-CIO noted, Louisiana has prospered along with the state's labor movement and industrial growth "far exceeded" that of most states with so-called "right-to-work" laws.

Big City Poverty Areas Register Jobless Rate Rise to 7 Percent

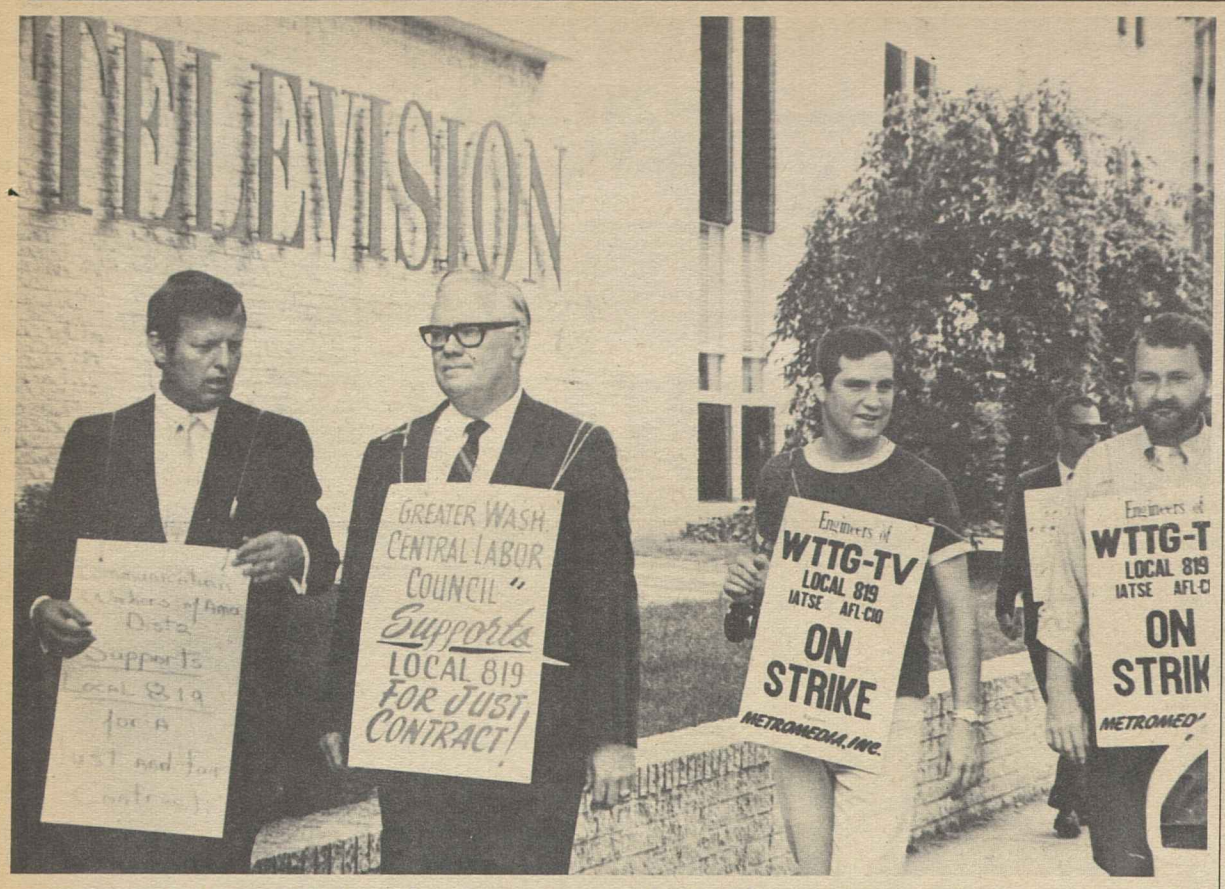
Unemployment in the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's big cities rose to 7 percent in the second quarter of 1970, the Dept. of Labor reported.

That 7 percent compares with 5.7 percent in the same period of 1969, an increase of 23 percent over the year. The rate was 6.6 percent for the first quarter of 1970.



While the increase was decisive, the Bureau of Labor Statistics pointed out that the unemployment rate for the entire nation, now 4.7 percent on a seasonally-adjusted basis, rose by 38 percent in one year compared to the 23 percent in poverty neighborhoods.

The bureau said a large proportion of workers in the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's 100 largest cities are concentrated in lower-skilled and service-related jobs, which have not been as hard hit by the recent economic decline.

The unemployment increase in poverty areas hit hardest among adult males, both white and Negro. The rate for all males 20 years of age and older jumped to 5.9 percent in the first quarter of 1970 from 3.4 percent a year ago. For whites the climb was from 2.8 to 5.2 percent and for blacks it was from 4.3 to 7.2 percent.

30.5 Million Women Job-Holders Employed in Nation's Labor Force

Women workers in the nation's labor force rose to 30.5 million last year, an increase of 1.3 million from 1968, the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. reported.

Women represented 38 percent of all the workers in the labor force. And 43 percent of the nation's women 16 years of age and older were holding down jobs.

Of the 40.9 million women who were not a part of the labor force, 32.5 million were not working because of home responsibilities, the bureau said in its newly-updated publication, Background Facts on Women Workers in the United States.

The study included summary data on age, marital status, educational attainment, occupations, earnings and unemployment of women workers.

Earnings of women continue to lag behind the wages of men. In 1968, the last year for which full statistics were available, the median earnings of women who were employed full-time the year-around were $4,457. This was only 58 percent of the $7,664 median earnings for full-time men workers.

The report also noted that while 20 percent of the women workers received less than $3,000 a year in 1968, only 8 percent of the men workers were in this wage bracket. At the upper end of the scale, only 3 percent of the women and 28 percent of the men earned $10,000 or more in 1968.

Of the 29.9 million women workers age 16 and older in March 1969, nearly 60 percent were married and living with their husband. Among the others, 22 percent were single, 8 percent widowed, 6 percent divorced and 5 percent were married but not living with their husband.

The largest single occupation group of employed women last year was clerical workers — nearly 10 million, with 3.4 million working as stenographers, typists and secretaries.

The next two largest groups were service workers, 4.7 million, and operatives, 4.5 million. Another 4 million women were employed in professional and technical fields, including 1.6 billion teachers and about 1 million in medicine and health work.

About three quarters of the women workers in non-agricultural industries in 1969 held full-time jobs. This compares with nine-tenths of the men workers. Most women who worked part-time did so voluntarily, the bureau said.

Almost one-fourth of the 3.2 million families headed by women workers were classified as poor — where their income fell below the government's poverty level.

Other data on women workers in 1969 covered by the report noted:

- The median age was 39.
- Nearly half of all women 18 to 64 years were in the job force.
- Highest labor force participation was among 20 to 24 and 45 to 54.
- 11.6 million women workers had children under age 18.

FAA Employes Vote NABET At Three Sites

The Broadcast Employes & Technicians union has won exclusive recognition bargaining rights at the three Federal Aviation Administration installations in the Chicago metropolitan area by a 3 to 1 margin over the National Association of Government Employes.

The three FAA installations involved are the Airways Control Center in Aurora, Ill., the O'Hare Airport and the Midway Airport in Chicago. The 135 electronic technicians and wage board employes voted in a secret ballot election conducted by the Labor Dept.

This victory is a first effort by NABET in organizing in the federal service. There are some 6,500 electronic technicians and wage board employes employed by the FAA in the United States and its possessions.

Negotiations for a contract covering the FAA members in Chicago will be coordinated by George Maher, special assistant to the NABET Pres. Timothy J. O'Sullivan.

Melvin Welles Named NLRB Trial Examiner

Melvin J. Welles, a member of the National Labor Relations Board staff since 1946, has been named a trial examiner.

He has served as a legal assistant to board members, a member of the general counsel's staff, and from 1965 until recently as chief counsel to former Board Member Sam Zagoria.

Service Workers Strike at Brown

Providence, R.I.—A dispute over wages put 350 members of the Service Employes on strike at Brown University for the first time in the 25-year history of SEIU Local 134.

The strike began July 1 for building and grounds workers and maintenance employes when contract negotiations collapsed. Major issues besides wages are a union shop and improved fringe benefits.

Pickets at the university have been joined at various times by members of SEIU Local 580, Rhode Island Alliance of Social Workers.

Higher Wages Set For Puerto Rico

The Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division has ordered increased minimum wage rates for two industries operating in Puerto Rico. The orders are based on recommendations of two industry commissions acting under the Fair Labor Standards Act provisions.

In the electrical, and electrical instruments and related products industry where $1.60 an hour minimum wages rates had applied to all but three classifications, two of these classifications were raised to $1.60 level. The third was hiked to $1.56½ cents.

For three classifications in the metal, machinery, transportation equipment and allied products industry, the commission order called for $1.60 minimum hourly rates. These classifications had minimums below that rate before the 1966 amendments to the FLSA.

Clerks Hold Line In Airline Strike

St. Paul—Strike-bound Northwest Airlines tried but failed to break a walkout of 3,500 members of the Railway & Airline Clerks, the union reported here.

The big air carrier sought to maintain service with strikebreakers, but a time table published during the second week of the strike showed service down to 25 domestic flights a day compared to a normal schedule of 229 flights.

Union members walked out July 8 when management refused union proposals for a new contract providing improvements on a par with those now in existence on competing air lines.

BRAC posted picket lines in all the 38 U.S. cities which Northwest normally serves. The Machinists, who represent mechanics and other ground personnel, stayed away from work as soon as the strike started. So did the Transport Workers, with many stewardesses refusing to walk through picket lines.

At Twin Cities Airport, miniskirted pickets from reservations and general offices helped provide some of the swingiest picket lines seen in years. Within the passenger terminal, the pickets had a sing-in to serenade supervisors working at Northwest ticket desks.

From the roof of the big Northwest office building, special detectives took pictures of the pickets and refused shouted invitations to "jump, jump."

When airport management opened a special "crash" gate on an access road for construction workers building a new hangar for Northwest jets, two BRAC pickets showed up before dawn one morning. The building tradesmen decided to work somewhere else that day.

In Honolulu, at two hotels, 20 stewardesses who refused to cross BRAC picket lines were evicted from their rooms by Northwest. The Transport Workers, who represent the stewardesses, arranged to place them in rooms at another hotel.

The walkout started after BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis and other officers pressed management for substantial pay increases. The company refused to improve its original offer and on June 12 Dennis told Northwest, and the public, to expect a strike after the July 8 deadline.

Airline management has made no change in its rejected offer despite continuing negotiations.

Economics Group Appoints Kaczor

Lafayette, Ind.—Dr. Ralph S. Kaczor, professor of economics and community relations officer at Kent State University in Ohio has been named executive director of the Clergy Economic Education Foundation succeeding Dr. Olin W. Davis of Purdue, its founder.

Dr. Davis, who was honored at a retirement luncheon, remains as president of the board of directors of the foundation which is moving its headquarters from Purdue to Kent State. The foundation organizes statewide conferences to bring to clergymen of all faiths a factual and comprehensive analysis of the American economic system. Its board of directors includes labor, business, farm and university experts.

The AFL-CIO cooperated in establishing the foundation and Federation Pres. George Meany praised its achievement in a telegram expressing good wishes to Dr. Davis on his retirement and looking forward "to a continued fruitful relationship" under the new leadership

Rubber Union Ratifies Pact at General Tire

Akron — Final agreements have been negotiated, ratified and signed with the Big Five of the rubber industry by the Rubber Workers for 77,000 employes.

The fifth firm to accept the pattern agreement was General Tire & Rubber Co. for 4,000 employes at two plants.

It took a 50-day strike before Goodyear came to terms with its 22,000 employes at 16 plants. A 39-day strike brought agreement with Goodrich covering nine plants and 11,000 workers.

Other pacts were signed without strikes at Firestone with 19,000 employes at 13 plants and Uniroyal, 19 plants and 21,000 workers.

The only major holdout currently is Armstrong Rubber, struck since July 1 by 4,000 members of the union at plants in Des Moines, Iowa; West Haven, Conn.; Natchez, Miss. and Hanford, Calif.

A URW spokesman said that Armstrong "has not accepted the economic provision of the pattern, has offered no proposal for occupational health and safety and, generally, seeks to weaken the present contract."

The pattern agreement calls for an 82 cents an hour increase across the board in three years, major programs to eliminate health and safety hazards, cutback of wage differentials, improved pensions and other fringes.

Rawlings Wins Bid in Virginia To Face Byrd

Virginia Democrats have nominated George C. Rawlings for the Senate, but the voter turnout was so light that it heartened supporters of conservative incumbent Harry Byrd, now an independent.

Less than 150,000 of the state's 1.7 million eligible Democrats voted in the Senate primary, which was a close battle between two liberals, Rawlings and Clive L. DuVal.

Nearly complete returns gave Rawlings 45.5 percent of the vote to 44.8 percent for DuVal, a margin of just over 900 votes. Milton Colvin, a college professor, trailed far behind.

Virginia law would allow DuVal to seek a runoff since Rawlings got less than 50 percent of the vote, but indications were that DuVal would not do so. Republicans nominated Ray L. Garland earlier in their state convention.

Barring a runoff, Rawlings, a 48-year-old Fredericksburg attorney, will face both Byrd and Garland in the November general election. Byrd announced this spring that he would leave the Democratic Party to seek re-election as an independent.

The nomination of Garland came despite the efforts of some national Republican leaders to get the convention to leave the GOP spot vacant as a tacit endorsement of Byrd.

Sharp Battle Shapes Up:

Union Conference Called To Back Job Safety Bill

mittee bill's sweeping general requirement that employers furnish safe and healthful working conditions."

And six of the committee Republicans went even further in their denounciation of the legislation, charging that the job safety-health problem has been overblown by "excessive emotion" over occupational casualties.

In fact, they contend that thanks to the voluntary efforts of American businessmen "the average American is safer at his workplace than he is at home, on the highway, or at play."

Therefore, they argue, "any federal legislation (should) be a cautious and reasonable effort genuinely tailored to strengthen our present safety system through incentives and cooperation."

IUD Pres. I. W. Abel, in summoning the legislative conference, warned that "it won't be easy" to defeat efforts to weaken the committee-approved bill.

"The Daniels bill is opposed by the Chamber of Commerce," he noted, "and selfish employers who would rather lose workers' lives than spend a few of their own dollars on safety."

Similar legislation had been proposed in the Johnson Administration and strongly supported by former Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz. But a scare campaign generated by the Chamber of Commerce proved so effective that the legislation never reached the floor.

The chamber's anti-safety bill campaign included a wild-eyed account in its Nation's Business magazine of what businessmen could expect if federal legislation were enacted.

"A young man barges in," the article predicted. "You recognize him as a man you once refused to hire. He had no education and no potential talent you could use. His main experience consisted of cashing welfare checks."

But then he pulls out a card that shows he's now a Labor Dept. inspector "and he threatens to padlock your gates . . . if you don't do as he says."

Furthermore, the scare story went, he "tramps through your plant" and orders "costly steps to improve safety and health."

And the poor businessman couldn't even forget his troubles at a football game because some Secretary of Labor might decide to use his powers to "cancel any professional football game should he decide, say, that tag football would be safer and healthier than tackle."

In the face of such fantasies, the House Labor Committee cited the grim toll of more than 2 million persons each year disabled through job-related accidents, of occupational health hazards leading to chronic illness and death—and of the unwillingness or inability of states to protect workers against these hazards.

One chemical, the committee noted, was so toxic that the state of Pennsylvania "banned its use, manufacture, storage or handling in the state." But, said the committee, "production of this lethal chemical has begun in another state where legislation is inadequate." It added:

"Clearly, the life of a worker in one state is as important as a worker's life in another state, and uniform standards must be required to protect all workers from dangerous substances. Despite this obvious need, state response has been minimal. Federal leadership and assistance are necessary to change this record of inaction."

The AFL-CIO has declared passage of a strong occupational health and safety bill "a major priority" for this Congress and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller stressed that the Daniels bill "has the wholehearted endorsement of all segments or organized labor."

THERE WAS NO WAITING for a chair as thousands of barbers and beauticians were on hand in Washington for a two-day conference sponsored by the Barbers union. A highlight of the conference was the union's fourth annual competition in men's hair styling. Members also participated in workshops conducted by specialists in hair styling and fashions.

Incentive Pay Negotiated at 3 Steel Firms

Pittsburgh — Incentive pay coverage for nearly 16,000 employes of three big steel firms has been negotiated by the Steelworkers.

USWA Pres. I. W. Abel announced that union negotiators reached agreement on incentive pay with Bethlehem Steel Corp., National Steel Corp. and Allegheny-Ludlum Industries. They follow earlier agreements with Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., Armco Steel Corp. and Inland Steel Co.

All the settlements mean more money for more production above standards set in the union's agreements with steel firms.

The agreements extend incentive earnings opportunities of employes to 85 percent or more of all employes. The formula became effective last Aug. 1 under an arbitrator's ruling following 1968 contract negotiations.

The Bethlehem settlement extends incentive coverage to more than 12,000 additional workers at 11 company plants. It provides also that retroactive pay will be given covered workers. Payment is expected in about six weeks, the union said.

The agreement with National Steel benefits 1,778 workers in three states. Affected workers in Allegheny-Ludlum are in five different plants.

JOSEPH T. POWER is the new president of the Plasterers & Cement Masons. Power succeeds Edward J. Leonard, who resigned because of ill health.

Nixon Names Members Of Productivity Group

Pres. Nixon has named six labor representatives to the new 23-member National Commission on Productivity. The commission also has six members each from business and the public and five from the Administration.

The labor representatives are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists, Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers and Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers.

The commission is to hold its initial meeting next month in what the Administration hopes will help lead to more stable prices by achieving a balance between costs and productivity. The panel is expected to review at that time the first of a series of "inflation alerts" that will be prepared by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Pres. Nixon announced plans last month to publish the alerts periodically "to call attention to outstanding cases of price and wage increases."

Administration officials on the commission are Dir. George P. Shultz of the Office of Management & Budget, Treasury Sec. David M. Kennedy, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, Commerce Sec. Maurice Stans and Chairman Paul W. McCracken of the Council of Economic Advisers.

Representing business on the commission are Harlee Branch, Jr., chairman of the Southern Co.; Edward W. Carter, president of Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc.; George E. Keck, president of United Air Lines; R. Heath Larry, vice chairman of U.S. Steel Corp.; James Roche, chairman of General Motors Corp., and Walter Wriston, chairman of the First National City Bank of New York.

Public representatives are William T. Coleman, Jr., partner in a Philadelphia law firm; John T. Dunlop, a dean at Harvard University; Howard W. Johnson, president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Edward H. Levi, president of Chicago University; Arjay Miller, a dean at Stanford University, and W. Allen Wallis, president of the University of Rochester.

House Doubles Share Of Health Plan Costs

The House voted to raise the government's share of the cost of health insurance for federal employes to 50 percent of the premium cost—approximately double what it is paying now.

It rejected—by a 199-147 vote—an Administration proposal to peg the government contribution at 38 percent of the cost, substantially less than virtually all private employers pay.

Under present law, the federal government in its role as an employer of more than 2 million workers pays a fixed dollar amount that averages about 24 percent of the cost of health insurance policies. This means that federal employes have had to pay more than three-fourths of the cost, even though an increasing number of workers in private industry have the full cost paid by their employers.

The dollar amount paid by the government under the 10-year-old federal employe health benefit program initially averaged about 38 percent of the cost, but the steady rise in health insurance costs eroded the amount to 24 percent. Federal employes have a choice of a wide assortment of plans to choose from, so the premium percentage represents an overall average.

Under the House bill, the government's contribution to health insurance premiums would be 50 percent of the average cost of the high-option programs of the six largest insurance plans which enroll about 90 percent of federal employes.

A bill approved by the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, but not yet scheduled for floor action, would come closer to the Administration proposal. It would peg the government's contribution at 40 percent of the cost.

Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Ia.) was the only House member to speak against the 50 percent bill during the floor debate. But his motion to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the government's contribution to 38 percent was supported by House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford and a large segment of the House conservative coalition.

When it was defeated by a 199-147 vote, the House then gave overwhelming 284-57 approval to the legislation.

Lovell Nominated For Manpower Post

Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., has been nominated by Pres. Nixon as Assistant Sec. of Labor for Manpower to succeed Arnold R. Weber, who has shifted to the new Office of Management & Budget as associate director.

Lovell has been Deputy Sec. of Labor for Manpower since June 1969. Before joining the Labor Dept. he was executive associate for manpower with the Urban Coalition.

NLRB Asks Views On College Ruling

The National Labor Relations Board plans to follow the Administrative Procedure Act in deciding whether to take jurisdiction over disputes or elections at private colleges and universities, and has called for written arguments on the subject.

Last month the board decided to assert jurisdiction over private educational institutions whose operations have a substantial impact on interstate commerce. It applied the new ruling to Cornell and Syracuse universities but left for the future the development of a set of standards to be applied.

On July 14 it published a notice in the Federal Register asking all interested parties to submit 25 copies of data, views or arguments within 30 days to NLRB Executive Sec. Ogden W. Fields, Washington, D.C. 20570.

Family Income Median Rises to $9,400 in '69

The U.S. median family income rose about $800 last year and another 1.1 million persons escaped from the government-defined poverty level, according to the Census Bureau figures on 1969.

Median family income—the point at which half the families are above and half below—rose to $9,400 in 1969 from $8,632 in 1968, the bureau said. That increase of 9 percent, however, was offset by a 5.4 percent increase in the cost of living and other factors such as increased taxes.

The government's definition of poverty was put at $3,743 for a non-farm family of four in 1969. The bureau reported 24.3 million persons were in families with incomes below that level in 1969, down from 25.4 million in 1968 and 39.5 million in 1960.

While family income had a median of $9,400 in 1969, the report put the median earnings of men only at $8,500 in 1969, up from $7,700 in 1968.

For Negro families, the median income was at 61 percent of the white rate last year, or $6,000. In 1965, Negro family income was 54 percent of the white median.

Santo J. Ruiz Joins Civil Rights Dept.

Santo J. Ruiz, 27, has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Ruiz has been an organizer and business representative for the Upholsterers in Austin, Tex.

A graduate of the University of Texas, Ruiz was a member of the Austin Human Relations Commission and has served as president of the Travis County Political Association for Spanish-speaking organizations. He is married and has three children.

A Losing War

ON EVERY WORKING DAY, 55 American working men or women lose their lives because of on-the-job accidents or illness.

Another 8,500 working people are disabled.

Another 27,200 are injured.

That's a lot more than the U.S. casualty list in Viet Nam.

In effect, the 80 million American working men and women fight a losing war against occupational injury and death every day. The cost of this war, to the workers themselves, is conservatively estimated at $1.5 billion a year in lost wages—plus over $600 million in medical expenses. The cost to the American economy is $6.8 billion.

These estimates don't even take into account the misery and waste resulting from the death or disablement of a breadwinner, the breakup of families, the loss of pride and confidence that comes with the inability to continue earning one's way in the world.

Every day that the nation goes without an effective federal occupational safety and health program brings danger of greater disasters.

An estimated one to two million Americans suffer from cancer and other diseases picked up at work. Two to four million American workers regularly do their jobs exposed to gas and dust that hold the capacity to kill or cripple them in unknown ways.

The danger of on-the-job sickness or injury is not confined to the obviously hazardous occupations. Danger is a condition of work in many occupations—not through carelessness by the employee but because of the very nature of the job.

A strong, nationally-administered occupational safety and health program could end this tragic and preventable wastage of human life. Reasonable safety standards must be established and maintained.

The states just can't do the job on industrial safety and health. Their record is a sad one, whether one looks at it from the standpoint of safety and health laws on the books or from the standpoint of inspection and enforcement of the laws that a few of of the states have managed to pass.

The Dept. of Labor, surveying the occupational safety and health field, had this to say:

"While most of the (states) have been diligent in making codes, only a few meet the standards established by the American Standards Association. Four states do meet such standards, eight more have from 45 to 90 percent comparability, while all others have from 0 to 45 percent comparability."

In other words, only four states have occupational health and safety laws that meet accepted standards. Thirty-eight of the 50 states don't even come half-way to providing decent on-the-job protection to workers.

THIS SAD RECORD is emphasized by a look at the 15 states having the greatest number of manufacturing, mining and construction employes. They had, between them, 1,102 of the 1,661 safety inspectors employed by the state governments.

But the best of the top 15 states had roughly 12.5 inspectors for every 100,000 workers. And the proportion of inspectors dropped way down to less than one for each 100,000 workers.

This is hardly calculated to inspire respect for state authority in on-the-job safety and health programs. It goes far to explain why the tragic toll of death, disablement and destruction from on-the-job accidents and illnesses continues to mount.

Facts Don't Stand in the Way When Agnew Rewrites History

By John P. Roche

AS READERS of this column know, I take a dim view of revising the past to meet the needs of the present. Perhaps it is a historian's pride of craftsmanship, perhaps it is merely the surly reaction of a born spoil-sport—but I believe in telling it as it was.

Over the last year or so most of my fire has been directed at those whom I called the "tigers emeritus"—the former Democratic "hawks" who today, when pressed, will blandly assert that their opposition to the Vietnamese war began in 1946. At a time that the Gallup Poll indicates that 58 percent of the American people think it was a mistake to ever get mixed up in Southeast Asia, it may be understandable that politicians scuttle for historical cover. Yet it is not an inspiring spectacle, particularly since it is founded on the hope that the American electorate can be conned—a notion that is both morally dubious and empirically doubtful.

Now a new precinct has reported. In Cleveland recently Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew took a hand in the game, and—in the course of attacking "summertime soldiers and sunshine patriots"—he did some nasty tricks with the historical record.

His technique was, for all its thunder, quite subtle: beginning with perfectly valid criticisms of leading Democrats (which could have been lifted from this column), he proceeded to indict Clark Clifford, Cyrus Vance, and—of all people—W. Averell Harriman as opportunists, turncoats, and architects of appeasement.

This is preposterous. While I do not share Clifford's mordant views on Viet Nam, I am convinced that his shift in position emerged from his experience as Secretary of Defense and was based on that radical willingness to reassess one's premises which is characteristic of a superb legal mind. While his change of view did not occur (as has been claimed by some of his associates) in February and March 1968, it had certainly jelled by October.

And, by the way, Clifford has never to my knowledge claimed to have been an underground "dove." He changed his mind and made no secret of it.

Agnew's attack on Vance is simply mystifying. Vance characteristically did his job and kept his mouth shut—in the Johnson Administration and out. And at the risk of getting personal, for those of us who watched with anguished admiration as Cy, tormented by a bad back, climbed on a plane for Detroit or Cyprus or Santo Domingo, Agnew's reference to him as a "dandy of the old school tie" was simply reprehensible.

FINALLY, what about Harriman? Agnew set out in the tradition of the Moscow Trials. "In every great diplomatic conference," the Vice President said, "that turned out to be a loss for the West and freedom, one can find the unmistakable footprints of W. Averell Harriman."

From Yalta in 1945, to the Geneva Conference on Laos in 1962, to the Paris negotiations in 1968—so Agnew's history runs—Harriman was out "trusting Communists" and betraying freedom.

Good God! Has Agnew never seen Harriman's cables to FDR alerting the President to Soviet postwar hostility? They have become the centerpiece of the New Left historians' argument that the United States started the Cold War.

As far as Laos negotiations in 1962 were concerned, I wrote some years ago, "the Laotian agreement was a horse dead at the post . . . and all the evidence I have seen indicates that Pres. Kennedy, who had a cold eye, realized this and, writing Laos off as tactically hopeless, turned his attention to Viet Nam where the situation was very different, particularly in terms of accessibility."

Harriman's job at Geneva was to put the best face on an impossible military situation. To put it brutally, he had to provide cover for American disengagement from a previously unconditional commitment. As I know from a conversation with him back in 1966, Harriman had hoped the Soviet Union would cooperate in the neutralization of Laos, but only because he felt the then Premier Khrushchev would find it in Russia's interest to do so. This was hardly a matter of "trusting Communists."

If the Vice President wants to play historian, he had better do his homework.

Haven of the Dispossessed:

Negro's Economic Liberation Fused to Role in Trade Unions

The following is excerpted from "The Role of the Black Trade Unionist," by Frederick O'Neal, chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, which appears in the July 1970 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

NEGROES ARE a working people. The labor movement has been the home of the working man—traditionally the only haven of the dispossessed.

That brief credo, which A. Philip Randolph has used to sum up the reason for the his life's work, still serves well as the answer to the questions many blacks are asking about their role in today's society. We are a nation of working people and black people are workers. And it is in the trade union movement where blacks have both a job to do and a great future.

The black trade unionist can play a creative and essential role in three identifiable areas:

● First, he must be a militant integrationist and an advocate of militant non-violence. As part of an integrated trade union movement, the black worker knows well the folly of separatism.

As part of a movement that has won real and concrete gains for black Americans, he knows that frustration politics is merely a form of psychotherapy which can lead only to a dead end. And he knows that violence will sooner destroy the black community than contribute to its salvation.

His willingness to stand firmly on the principles of integration and non-violence are particularly essential in this very difficult period we are living through, when so many despairing elements within the black community are advocating strategies of withdrawal and recklessness.

● Second, the black worker must articulate a sensible economic strategy as an alternative to the fanatical ideas that are currently gaining popularity in some quarters. Several facts are elementary to this strategy: Black capitalism will not help the black worker; tax incentives will only mean more profits for the rich; there is absolutely no land on which to build industry in the ghetto; community control over an impoverished ghetto will be that and only that—it will not provide jobs for the unemployed, homes for the ill-housed, doctors for the sick and better teachers for the uneducated.

The black worker must understand and publicize the principle that the fundamental division in America is not between white and black but between rich and poor, that there can be no cure for black poverty in the absence of an attack on white poverty and that the racial problem in America requires an economic solution.

The black worker, who has been educated to a sophisticated economic point of view as a result of his participation in the trade union movement, must now speak out against psychological solutions to economic problems. And he must also speak out against deceptive programs which divert people's attention from the real objectives.

Those objectives are outlined in A. Philip Randolph's Freedom Budget and in the economic program of the trade union movement. They are full employment, the redistribution of wealth and the reconstruction of our cities.

● Third, the black worker has an enormously significant political role to play. He must continually point out that the source of funds for a genuine war on poverty lies in Washington and that if liberal-thinking men are to be elected to national office, black people must vote. The kind of voter education and registration campaigns that Negro trade unionists carried on in all of the major American cities in 1968 must remain a model for similar political activity in the future.

But even more important, the black trade unionist must never cease reminding his brothers and sisters in the ghetto that Negroes represent only 11 percent of the American population. Therefore, Negroes cannot go it alone. Any positive action coming from Washington will come only through a coalition of Negroes, liberals and the entire trade union movement.

The black worker must be a forceful spokesman for unity within this coalition and he must speak out firmly against any activities which promote racial polarization. He must become an agent of reconciliation who will break the bitter connection between black rage and white fear.

Unity must be re-established between the economically deprived and the economically insecure in their common struggle against the economic elite. And no group in America is in a better position to bring about this reconciliation than the black worker.

Today there are over 2 million black trade unionists and this number is increasing daily. More Negroes are also moving up through the ranks of their local unions to positions of power and influence.

Today, despite all the progress we've made, the unemployed are filling our ghettos, the inner cores of our cities are literally rotting, health care is primitive and our schools are ill-equipped to serve the enormous needs of children bred in poverty. And the situation is growing worse daily, for automation is transforming the character of labor. Unskilled jobs are being eliminated, muscle power is no longer in demand and as always, black workers suffer most from these changes.

OVER THE PAST 100 years, since Negroes first entered the trade union movement in America, many mistakes have been made. One of the most serious errors was the enforced pattern of segregated unions and the tolerance of segregated jobs in the plant.

Discrimination and segregation still exist within certain areas of the union movement. There is no attempt here to close our eyes to that situation. Discrimination is there, perhaps less than in many other major American institutions, but it's still there and must be opposed.

But because it exists, we should not take the foolish path of the separatists. We should not employ the distorted logic which says that the existence of discrimination justifies separatism and further segregation.

These mistakes have been made repeatedly during the long history of the black struggle for equality. They have been rooted in justified anger and frustrations, But they have also been rooted in opportunism, and the result has always been the further exploitation of the exploited and the further enrichment of the enriched.

The economic liberation of the black American can best be achieved through his participation in the trade union movement.

In Dictator Nations:

Repression Spurs ILO Efforts To Insure Trade Union Rights

GROWING REPRESSION of unions in totalitarian societies has spurred international efforts to safeguard the civil liberties of trade unions, the U.S. worker representative to the International Labor Organization reported.

Although the ILO adopted conventions guaranteeing "freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining" more than a decade ago, "the experience of the last 12 years has made it clear that too frequently civil liberties have been denied," said Rudolph Faupl.

"Without civil liberties, you have no trade union rights," he declared, and the jailing and persecution of union leaders in Spain, Greece and other "dictatorship countries" were major issues at the recently-concluded 51st annual session of the ILO in Geneva.

Faupl, who is also an international representative of the Machinists, appeared on the AFL-CIO produced program, Labor News Conference.

Education and training to upgrade the skills of young workers throughout the world was also a major topic in the 1970 ILO sessions, Faupl reported. He said that field representatives of the worldwide labor organization are working in several countries in specific elementary education and vocational training programs that are similar to current efforts in the United States. In many parts of the world, the so-called drop-out problem is even "more complicated and much more severe than it is here in the United States," he added.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE 1970 CENSUS RESULTS are beginning to come in and while a great deal of further analysis is needed it is clear that the face of the United States, in terms of its population distribution, is rapidly changing.

Study of preliminary returns from some 29 states widely scattered throughout the country shows a pattern of uneven growth with some states such as Texas booming ahead by almost 1.5 million during the past 10 years and other states, such as Mississippi, North Dakota, West Virginia and Wyoming actually losing population.

In general the industrialized western states have gained heavily; mid-western states have pretty much held their own in growth while eastern states have shown relatively small growth.

Overall growth of the country has been over 10 percent and while the four largest states—California, New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois—have still to be completed, there is no reason to believe that the general pattern of change will be affected.

Texas, the nation's fifth largest state has now passed the 10 million mark, going from 9,579,000 to 10,981,000 for a gain of 1,400,000. Houston and Dallas both have shown great growth, Houston going from 938,000 to 1,213,000 and Dallas from 680,000 to 836,000.

Yet, Texas has shown a population shift characteristic of most of the rest of the country—a shift of population from the core cities to the suburbs. Abilene, for example, has lost population —dropping from 90,000 in 1960 to 88,400 in 1970. Another example is Amarillo which has dropped from 138,000 in 1960 to 124,000 in 1970. Abilene, Beaumont, Galveston, Odessa, Port Arthur, Waco and Wichita Falls are cities which have actually lost population.

So far states which have shown healthy growth are Arizona, up half a million; Colorado, up half a million; Wisconsin, up 412,000; Minnesota, up 356,000. Two of the smaller states which have shown impressive increase are Nevada, up 196,000, an increase of almost 70 percent, and Oregon, up 290,000.

On the other hand some states have been shocked to discover that they have lost population or haven't gained as much as they had expected. Alabama, for example, is on the verge of demanding a recount. Preliminary census figures give it a gain of only 3.2 percent.

In these cases, as is true of many other cities, the suburbs have shown much growth. While Birmingham was losing 43,000, its suburban area gained 44,000. In Wisconsin, Milwaukee lost 32,000 population, yet its suburbs gained 113,000.

THERE HAS BEEN a marked shift in rural population, too. Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota and West Virginia, all heavily rural states have either lost population or have trailed behind the rest of the country in population growth.

On top of this rural loss has been a changing pattern in the occupational status of rural residents. Census returns show that there were 3,863,000 Americans age 14 and over employed in agricultural industries last year.

In 1960 about 66 percent of men and women living on farms worked primarily in agriculture. The rest commuted to industrial jobs in nearby cities or towns. Ten years later the similar proportions were 56 and 44 percent showing a growth of farm people who find it necessary to work at industrial jobs also.

Farm population, by and large, has one advantage over the rest of America. Unemployment is low. Only 1.6 percent of the labor force living on farms was unemployed at a time when the nonfarm civilian rate was 3.8 percent.

All-in-all, the 1970 census already is giving us a new picture of American life. When the returns are all in, we'll pretty well know what has happened to us in the past 10 years.

REPRESSION OF UNIONS has spurred the International Labor Organization to safeguard the civil liberties of workers, Rudolph Faupl, center, U. S. worker representative to the ILO, reported on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Don Finley, left, of United Press International and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Vote Against Postal Union Shop

The House on July 9 went on record against allowing postal unions to negotiate a union shop, even though the right to do so was part of the agreement the Administration made with the AFL-CIO and seven postal unions.

In this 230-153 rollcall, 134 Democrats and 19 Republicans cast Right votes (R) to table a motion to instruct House conferees to insist on a "right-to-work" clause. The 148 Republicans and 82 Democrats who voted against the motion cast Wrong votes (W) on labor's scorecard.

Federationist Details Story:

GE Strike Victory Rooted in Unity

The story of victory at GE in 1969-70, and how it was accomplished, is reported in the July American Federationist providing details of the historic strike and its lessons for labor in the 1970s.

The 100-day strike was a "severe test of labor's ability to unite," says James D. Compton, chairman of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, an assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Compton writes that victory in the end "hinged on the ability of 15 unions to act as one, and on the AFL-CIO's ability to rally the resources of the entire labor movement."

He concludes: "They did, on both counts."

By strike's end, nearly 150,000 trade union members in 34 states had walked picket lines for 100 days, and the AFL-CIO had "conducted the largest fund-raising campaign in its history, and the most successful nationwide consumer boycott ever mounted."

The magazine relates how, for the first time on such a massive scale, labor rallied its forces behind the cooperating unions under the leadership of Federation Pres. George Meany. The detailed job of day-to-day operations was entrusted to Compton and other members of his coordinating union committee.

What Compton calls the many-leveled victory of the strikers was among other things a vindication of the principle of coordinated bargaining. In addition, it "points the way toward new techniques by which unions, fragmented among the divisions of the new conglomerate corporations, can pool their strength to meet them on more nearly equal terms," the magazine says.

The foundation on which this effort was built was the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee. The CBC was formed in 1965 "after years of painful experience with GE's ability to coordinate its own efforts against the unions, one by one."

Over 20 years, GE had created a juggernaut system to blunt the strength of its organized employes by making their unions powerless. The unions called the system Boulwarism after Lemuel Boulware, company vice president who made it a highly effective weapon.

Boulwarism, says Compton, "rests on the assumption that workers are primarily cost items and, like all costs, something to be minimized by any means possible."

Management decides how much it is willing to spend on wages and other contract benefits, "then takes such action as is necessary to make its decision stick."

Using techniques similar to those used in marketing a product—like refrigerators or washing machines—GE "seeks to convince its employes that the company knows what is best for them and they may as well like it, because they are powerless to change anything." The article points out:

"While the company does—as the law requires—negotiate with its employes' unions, it is made clear that the negotiations and the contract don't mean anything. It rejects grievances, refuses arbitration and offers only silent contempt toward any contract proposal" except its own take-it-or-leave-it offer.

In challenging this system, Compton says the difficulties were formidable for the unions. "Old hostilities had to be ironed out and rivalries laid aside. Large militant locals had to be persuaded to submerge parochial goals in the interest of national unity. Small, isolated locals had to be . . . fortified to resist company efforts" at splintering the union alliance.

The author spells out the history of the effort that finally produced an overwhelming victory, induced by an effective nationwide labor boycott of all GE-produced products right through the Christmas buying season. The value of the final settlement package was put at $1.12 an hour in increases over 40 months.

The 15 unions stood shoulder to shoulder, Compton says, through the GE crisis, "but not without friction." He adds:

"There was friction and there were failures of communication, and differences that must be solved before the unity can be put to another test.

"But first to last, the unions succeeded in finding ways to live with friction without letting it get in the way of victory."

Shoe, Textiles Quotas Set Up In Trade Bill

Import quotas on shoes and textiles are part of a foreign trade bill nearing final approval in the House Ways & Means Committee.

Introduced by committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), the bill would restrict textile and shoe shipments to the United States to the average annual level of the 1967-69 period.

The Nixon Administration has opposed quotas on shoe imports, but reluctantly became a supporter of textile quotas last month after negotiations failed with Japan on voluntary restrictions of Japanese textile imports.

In another facet affecting international trade and the U.S. economy, committee member Charles D. Vanik (D-Ohio) expressed dismay that federal moneys were used to finance a study to aid multinational companies on tax dodges.

"I am shocked to hear that the Office of Naval Research has used taxpayer funds for research in the opportunities of multi-national companies to reduce tax obligations to America as well as other host governments," Vanik said.

The study was conducted by a professor at Carnegie-Mellon University. It carried a footnote that the project was financed by the Navy.

The Navy denied that it had paid for that particular project.

Reaffirming the labor movement's concern on imports affecting adversely the jobs of American workers, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has issued a pamphlet urging support of a program to regulate imports.

Many industries have already been seriously hurt by the imports, IUD Pres. I. W. Abel declared.

"The list grows longer every day. Each addition means fewer American jobs," the pamphlet notes, and "that means less money to be spent in an American community."

The IUD brochure asks union members to seek support of the program to restrict foreign imports by appealing to their congressmen, the President and other public officials.

Labor Board Orders GE to Reveal Pay Data

The General Electric Co. was not justified in refusing to let a union see area wage data the company used in setting wage rates, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

It is no excuse to say the information was obtained in confidence, the board wrote in ordering GE to give the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers the original information gathered in 1968, and later used to justify its refusal to raise rates at its Rome, Ga., transformer plant.

The ruling, by a three-member NLRB panel, nailed down the right of unions to check the accuracy of area wage surveys made by companies for use during contract negotiations.

Members of IUE Local 191 in Rome called a series of one-day strikes from January through April of 1968 to protest GE's refusal to grant higher wages. Management said it would conduct a survey of other plants if IUE members would return to work. They did so, and the survey was made.

What GE showed the union committee was not the original figures keyed to each company by name, and each job classification, but a list of the companies surveyed, a graph listing the highest and lowest rate paid for each of 20 classifications; the community average for each classification, and GE's pay rate for each.

The union challenged the accuracy of the figures and asked GE to tie each classification and rate to a specific company. Management refused, and the IUE filed unfair labor practice charges.

The board agreed with a trial examiner's finding that the information requested "was relevant and necessary to the union in order that it might bargain intelligently concerning wages."

The NLRB noted that management has relied on similar surveys in the past in adjusting its wage rates; relied on this one in refusing to make new adjustments; and the union needed the data to check the accuracy of the survey.

Pointing out that the IUE had never "clearly and unequivocally waived its right" to the information when it halted its "quickie" strikes, the NLRB said it is "well established that a request for relevant and necessary information cannot be denied on the ground that it is confidential."

The union found some discrepancies in the figures presented by management. Moreover, the board ruled, "it was impossible for the union to determine whether the rates for each classification were based on figures obtained from all 11, or only some of the plants surveyed; whether the figures represented straight averages or were weighted in some other manner."

The board disagreed with the examiner's suggestion that supplying the requested information might prejudice the rights of the other employers. It ruled that GE committed an unfair labor practice and ordered it to give the union the full information it requested.

GE's Rome plant makes medium transformers and related electrical products. It has had contracts with IUE since 1954.

J.P. Stevens Hit 11th Time for Union-Busting

Statesboro, Ga.—The J. P. Stevens Co. has been slapped down for the eleventh time on an unfair labor practice charge.

John M. Dyer, a trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board found that the huge textile corporation failed to bargain in good faith with the Textile Workers Union of America at its Gulistan plant and unilaterally changed its pay structure, resulting in a pay cut for the workers.

The company had sought to avoid the new unfair labor practice charges by claiming that an earlier NLRB order to bargain is not binding since it is being appealed in the courts.

Dyer rejected this argument, noting that the NLRB has ruled that Stevens had been illegally refusing to bargain since March 1968, when the union was certified. In such cases, an employer acts "at its peril" if it does not meet that duty, he said.

The company committed a new law violation when it changed its pay system unilaterally, the examiner found. He recommended that Stevens, the nation's second largest textile chain and a big government contractor, be ordered by the NLRB to give backpay to all Gulistan employes who suffered a pay cut, and to restore the old pay system, subject to proper collective bargaining.

Hodgson Cites 8% Increase In Training

Manpower work and training programs administered by the Labor Dept. were benefiting 452,975 persons as of June 1, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson reported. This is a net increase of 31,767, or about 8 percent more than a year earlier.

Although there was an overall increase in the number of enrollees, certain sectors of the manpower programs showed declines.

Leading the increase was the Work Incentive Program—designed to aid welfare recipients to find useful jobs—which had 87,936 enrollees, a gain of 27,440 over the year.

The Concentrated Employment Program, a service for all manpower and related program services, dropped to 50,388, a decline of 22,534 from June 1, 1969.

While gains also were made in on-the-job training, Operation Mainstream and New Careers programs, declines were shown in such areas as institutional training, the out of school Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Job Corps.

Operation Mainstream, which trains chronically jobless workers on public improvement projects, had 13,019 registrants, compared with 10,262 on June 1, 1969.

On-the-job training under the Manpower Development & Training Act totaled 45,329, up 10,101 from the year before, and the highest month on record except for August 1968 when 46,352 persons were in the program.

The in-school and summer Neighborhood Youth Corps enrollment rose by about 5,000 to 100,903, but the out of school sector dropped to 32,384—a decline of almost 14,000.

Job Opportunities in the Business Sector (JOBS) increased its enrollment to 46,723 from 22,005 a year ago. Enrollment in the New Careers program rose to 4,099 from 3,508.

Enrollment in the Jobs Corps declined to 19,926 from 20,587. The decline has been almost steady since the Administration cut back on the Job Corps operations early last year. In March 1969, the Job Corps enrollment was at 35,000.

42 Cities Using Computer Plan To Spot Jobs

Job banks with computerized employment services are now operating in 42 cities across the country, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson reported. Another seven are expected to be operational by the end of July.

The first pilot job bank was opened a little less than a year ago in Baltimore, Hodgson noted. With the number growing to 42 on July 1 and 24 more expected to be in operation within three months, Hodgson said "we consider this a remarkable accomplishment."

The Labor Dept. allotted $9 million for the development of the computerized job bank operations during the past fiscal year. Most of the job banks use existing computers in the federal-state unemployment insurance system.

Operation of the job banks is based on the quick collection of all available jobs in a labor market area. Daily computerized data enable a job seeker at a public employment office to have a selection of openings available and suitable to him, the Labor Dept. said.

Rep. Griffiths Tells House:

Soaring Costs Point Up Need To Enact National Health Plan

The cost of medical care in America has reached such astronomic proportions that the nation cannot afford to delay enactment of a health insurance program any longer, Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) told Congress.

"On the basis of current trends," she said, "failure to enact a national health insurance program with effective cost control in the next Congress can only mean further increases in future costs.

"Certainly the vast majority of Americans are ready for a change in the system."

Mrs. Griffiths announced that health care costs are rising much faster than taxable payrolls. Therefore, she said, she plans to reintroduce the bill she sponsored last February. Twenty other legislators from nine states later added their names as co-sponsors, and four other members introduced identical bills.

"Because of shocking health cost escalations," she said in remarks printed in the Congressional Record, "I will reintroduce my national health insurance bill in the next Congress."

When she first began researching the subject 18 months ago, the cost of an acceptable health care system was estimated at 7 percent of covered payrolls. That figure has since risen to 7.9 percent.

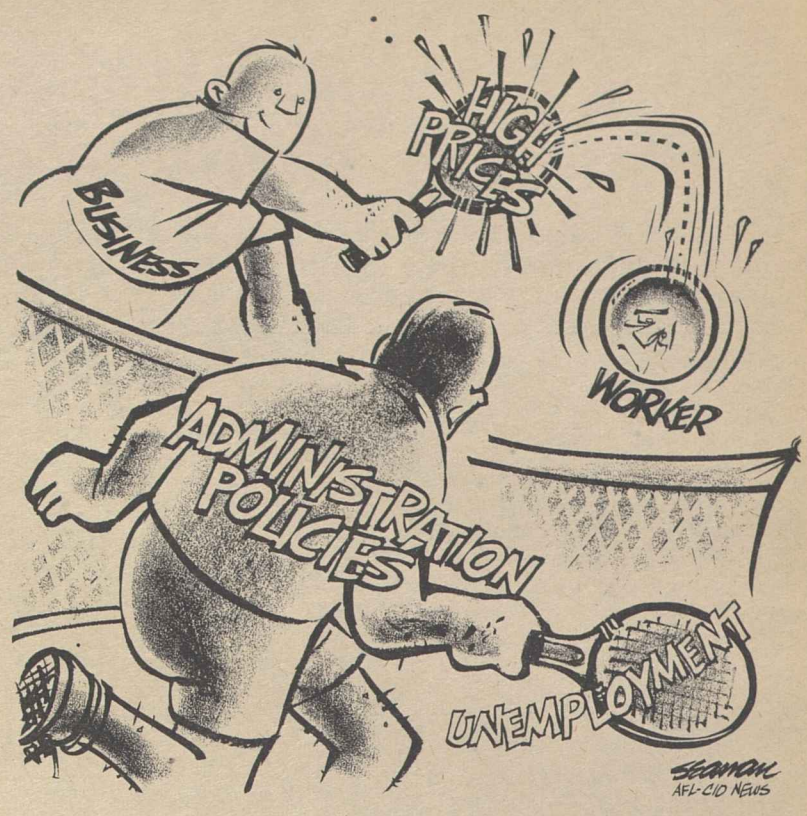
The Michigan congressman said her new bill will contain some improvements over the old one. It will provide for increased revenue by raising the health insurance tax rate from 7 percent of payroll to 8 percent—3.5 percent from employers and an equal percentage from federal revenues, leaving the tax on employes at the proposed 1 percent rate.

Mrs. Griffiths declared she does not believe Congress can afford to let runaway costs and inadequate care go on much longer.

If health expenditures continue to absorb an increasing share of the gross national product at the present rate—nearly 7 percent— in 30 years the rate of spending will nearly double to 13.4 percent, she said, adding:

"This is why I believe it is imperative to bring the nation's health delivery system under budgetary control as soon as possible. The only questions that require answers are whether the providers of health care and services could live within the budget" proposed in her bill, and whether the budget is one under which the quality of service would improve.



Mrs. Griffiths stressed her belief that her bill, which has been strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO, is the only bill now pending which would "control costs effectively and in a manner acceptable to all concerned."

The AFL-CIO Legislative Dept. reported in a 1970 fact sheet on the subject that benefits for health services in the Griffiths measure are "far more comprehensive than those in any existing health plan under collective bargaining or Medicare."

It said "virtually every kind of medical service . . . is covered, including physical examinations, physician visits . . ., specialist services including surgery and psychotherapy, eye care including eye-glasses and frames, prescription drugs, rehabilitation and physical therapy."

Institutional benefits would include hospitalization, skilled nursing home care, home health services and ambulance services. Children under 16 would receive comprehensive dental services, the fact sheet points out.

Game Plan

Jobs for Handicapped Stressed in New Study

Handicapped workers need full employment just like all other workers the U. S. government reported in a study stressing the need for model employment services.

A study by the Office of Manpower Research concluded that 2.2 million of the nation's 17.8 million handicapped need an expanded employment service program to help them qualify for jobs for which there is competition.

The OMR reported that full employment is a must if handicapped workers are to be accepted for jobs. But training for high-demand positions, such as office work, also is necessary, it said.

The agency reported that acceptance of the handicapped by able-bodied workers is another need, along with the elimination of architectural barriers.

Specific features of the expanded service program recommended by the report include greater efforts to find the employable handicapped, community centers offering a wide range of services, effective evaluation procedures, special placement programs, more use of the handicapped in federal and state government jobs, more attention to them in manpower training programs, and better communication between all agencies and organizations involved in placement and training of the handicapped.

A key feature of the recommendations is for income supplements to workers in the service stage of their rehabilitation, and wage subsidies for those in training or sheltered employment.

The study was distributed by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Fact sheets may be ordered from the committee. Copies of the report are available at $3.75 from the Clearinghouse for Federal Scientific & Technical Information, Springfield, Va. 22150.

Urban Poverty Areas Show Jobless Increase

employment. The rates for black women and teen-agers either declined or remained steady.

For black teenagers, the steady rate was at 34.2 percent, compared to 34.7 percent a year ago. For white teenagers, the rate was 16 percent, up from 13.4 percent a year ago. That puts the overall teenage rate at 23.2 percent, only slightly increased from the 22.5 for the same period of 1969.

The rate was down for all adult women in the poverty neighborhoods. Overall it was down from 5.7 percent from 4.1 a year ago. That breaks down to a decline from 4.1 to 3.8 percent for white women and from 7.5 to 6 percent for black women.

All together, the number of people out of work in the poverty areas rose by 75,000, almost all of it among whites—52,000 among white adult men. But while the increased number of unemployed was numbered at 75,000, the decline in the number employed dropped even more, by 200,000.

For adult men, the unemployment rate of 5.9 percent in poverty neighborhoods compares with 3 percent in all urban areas and the 5.2 percent among whites compares with 2.9 percent for the entire cities.

Negro men, now 7.2 percent unemployed in the poverty neighborhoods compared to 4.4 percent in other areas of the same 100 cities, now make up 153,000 of the nation's 3.8 million unemployed. Of that 153,000 unemployed blacks, 94,000 are classified as living in urban poverty areas and 79,000 live in all other areas.

Education Aid Funds Above Nixon Limits

The conference committee action accomplished a long-time goal in separating education from the budgets of the Depts. of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare. This was one of the objectives of an emergency committee on full-funding of education programs in which the AFL-CIO played an active part.

It also enabled the aid to education funds to move through Congress much earlier in the year. Usually, education funds aren't cleared until October, well after the school year is under way. Last year, they were delayed even more by the fight which resulted in Pres. Nixon's veto of the $19.4 billion Labor-HEW package.

Air Line Pilots' New Unit Wins First Contract

The new Union of Professional Airmen signed its first contract with a commuter airline and announced it will step up its drive to organize thousands of other "third level" pilots flying for employers other than scheduled commercial airlines.

Thousands of pilots employed by commuter, executive, pipeline and other aviation firms need the protection of a strong union, said Pres. Scruggs A. Colvin of the union, chartered last Aug. 25 by the Air Line Pilots. Colvin had been an ALPA organizer for nearly 25 years.

The new union's first working agreement was signed for 34 pilots flying for Suburban Airlines, Inc., of Reading, Pa. The line operates in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and the Washington, D.C. area. The contract provides improved wages and conditions, a seniority list and grievance machinery.

UPA recently won elections conducted by the National Mediation Board at Executive Lines and Hinson Airways Inc. and is in negotiations with those firms and others, it said.

LPIU Members Vote Per Capita Increase

New York — Members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, voting in a referendum, have approved a 50-cent monthly per capita increase.

The proposal, defeated in a previous referendum after convention action last November, carried by a margin of about 4,000 votes, Sec. Donald Stone said. It goes into effect July 1.

Union Workers Get More, Census Findings Show

What's a union card worth? A lot more money in the paycheck, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The bureau has just worked out a pay comparison between union and non-union workers based on 1966 earnings—the latest figures available.

It found that among skilled craftsmen, the workers with a union card averaged 23 percent more in pay. For semi-skilled production workers, the union man made 34 percent more, and among nonfarm laborers, union members averaged 50 percent more than non-union workers.

And that's just in pay. It doesn't count the big difference in fringe benefits, job security and working conditions.

the Senate Commerce Committee on the heels of a report by the National Commission on Product Safety on the 30,000 deaths and 20 million injuries attributable to home safety hazards.

In other congressional developments:

- The House Commerce Committee added a new dimension to the Senate-passed bill to limit television campaign spending by extending it to primaries and governors' races. The Senate bill applied to federal offices only.

The subcommittee also provided an effective date, Jan. 1, 1971, and called for a 3½-cents per voter ceiling on TV ads in primaries. The Senate bill provided a similar 7-cent ceiling in general elections.

- The Senate Finance Committee was urged by new Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Elliot L. Richardson not to approve a social security increase of more than the 5 percent passed by the House.

Richardson, in his first congressional testimony since replacing Robert H. Finch at HEW, told the senators that "the federal budget is seriously strained" and that any increase above the amount approved by the House "might upset the delicate balance of our economy." The House bill also calls for further social security increases tied to the cost of living.

- The Senate approved $100 million for financially ailing medical schools as part of a five-year extension of the Public Health Service Act.

House Jobless Aid Action Excludes Farm Workers

Real Wages Continue To Trail 1969

Real spendable earnings for the nation's rank-and-file workers fell below year-ago levels for the 15th consecutive month in June as consumer prices moved up another four-tenths of 1 percent.

While the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the increase was slightly less than in the past two months, the rise in the index sent it to 135.2. This means that goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period cost $13.52 last month.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had this comment on the report:

"We are still a long, long way from an end to the worst inflation in 20 years. The slightly lower climb of consumer prices in June still leaves living costs 6 percent above a year ago. It still leaves the rank-and-file worker with less buying power than last year. And it still means workers need substantial wage increases to achieve a decent standard of living."

The BLS report said that higher prices for used cars, homes and most types of consumer services were primarily responsible for the June increase, while food prices declined and other price rises slowed.

The gross weekly earnings of production and non-supervisory workers increased to $120.05 in June due to a longer workweek and higher hourly earnings. A worker with three dependents took home $105.08.

But in terms of real spendable earnings—take-home pay expressed in 1957-59 dollars—his earnings were $77.72, compared to $78.73 a year ago.

The four-tenths of 1 percent rise in the CPI in June, combined with previous rises, brought cost-of-living wage increases to 114,250 workers, BLS said, ranging from 3 to 8 cents an hour. The workers included those in aerospace, mail order houses, food processing, steel fabricating, bus drivers, sheet metal workers and printers.

The report disclosed that about 7,000 workers who would normally receive pay increases as a result of the June CPI will not receive them because they have reached the maximum stipulated in their contracts.

In April and May the CPI increased, on a seasonally adjusted basis, five-tenths of 1 percent. The June increase of four-tenths, while a slowing of the rate of in-

Labor Hits Effort to Sap NLRB

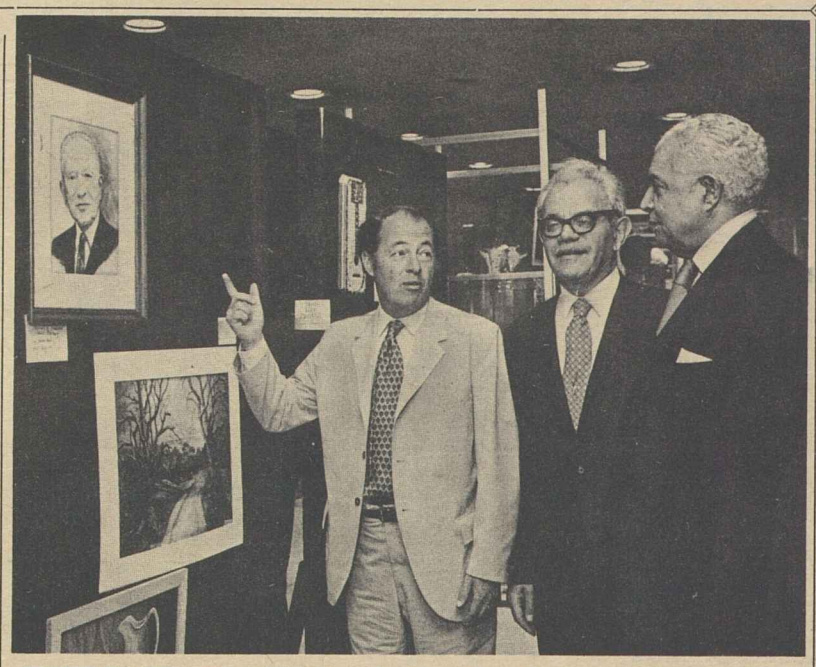
A proposed Senate bill to weaken the National Labor Relations Board drew a sharp attack from the AFL-CIO.



Thomas E. Harris, associate general counsel of the federation, outlined labor's opposition to a bill introduced by Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. Harris also expressed the AFL-CIO's belief that such a measure ought properly to be considered by the Labor & Public Welfare Committee.

Harris said the bill would worsen, rather than relieve, the shortcomings of the National Labor Relations Act in these major ways:

- By transferring initial jurisdiction over unfair labor practice cases from the Labor Board to the U.S. District Court, it would vastly increase delays that are already serious. Cases that now take nearly a year to resolve would, in some jurisdictions, require several years to reach trial.

- By abolishing the office of the labor board's general counsel, it would place prosecution of unfair labor practices in the hands of U.S. attorneys, who already are overloaded with criminal cases and are unpracticed in labor law. Alternatively, it would place the burden of prosecution on the charging party, giving employers, with far greater legal resources, an overwhelming advantage over even the strongest unions.

Protection Added For 4.75 Million

The House has passed a pared-down unemployment insurance bill extending coverage to 4.75 additional workers but leaving another 12 million unprotected, including more than a million farm workers.

The House voted to accept the conference committee version of the bill, which now goes to the Senate for similar action. The vote was 388 to 3.

Besides extending coverage to some new workers, the bill also provides for a system of extended benefits for periods of severe unemployment.

When the insured unemployment rate hits 4.5 percent for three consecutive months, workers who have exhausted their state benefits and are still jobless become eligible for 13 additional weeks of coverage beyond the 26 weeks in the present law.

However, the insured unemployment rate is always lower than the overall rate and it would probably take a national level of 6 percent unemployed to trigger the extended benefits.

A last-ditch effort to extend coverage to 275,000 farm workers, or about one-fourth of the nation's total, was voted down. A motion by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to send the bill back to conference committee with instructions to include the farm workers provision was rejected, 219 to 170.

O'Hara's motion sought to salvage the Senate's original extension of coverage to farms employing eight or more workers who are on the payroll for 26 weeks of the year. That provision had been stricken in conference.

The bill also fails to make any

Despite Upturn in Economy:

Unemployment Rise Forecast in 2nd Half

The economy has "turned the corner," the "downturn has bottomed out," but unemployment will remain high and probably increase during the rest of 1970.

That's the story coming out of the Administration in statements by Pres. Nixon and testimony before congressional committees of top economic experts.

The President told a news conference that on the basis of economic indicators and his meetings with economic analysts "the downturn has bottomed out and the last half of the year will see an increase in productivity and an upturn in the economy."

The President noted that inflation has been slowed and as the economy has "cooled" it "has inevitably had some upturn in unemployment and also this upturn has been greater than would usually be the case" in moving out of an inflationary period.

Paul W. McCracken, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, spelled it out more specifically for the Joint Congressional Economic Committee. He said:

"Even when the economy has turned the corner, we cannot assume an automatic return to full employment."

McCracken gave the committee an optimistic forecast for the rest of 1970 but noted that unemployment is going to grow more severe in the remainder of the year with the rate for the second quarter, which averaged 4.8 percent, rising still further.

He said cutbacks in defense spending, reduction in the size of the armed forces as well as business sluggishness were responsible and called on Congress to act quickly on job training programs and broader unemployment compensation to cushion the blow on the jobless.

Former Labor Sec. George P. Shultz, now director of the Office of Budget & Management, joined McCracken in suggesting that there

President Challenges Congress on Funds

The debate between the White House and Congress over funding of federal programs took a sharp turn and threatened to continue as the House began consideration of appropriations for the Depts. of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare.

Pres. Nixon threatened "difficult and painful measures" if Congress continued to vote funds for critical domestic needs in excess of Administration requests. He raised the possibility of tax increases, vetoes of appropriations bills or simply refusal to spend the money Congress appropriates.

This statement came in the wake of House passage of a $4.4 billion federal-aid-to-education bill which included many mandatory spending provisions. The bill, a compromise between the $4.8 billion originally voted by the Senate and the $4.1 billion approved by the House, was about $453 million above what the Administration had asked.

Mandatory spending provisions were also written into the $2.79 billion hospital and health care bill which was passed over Nixon's veto in late June.

White House spokesmen said that no decision had been reached on whether Nixon would veto the education bill. Another possibility, they said, was that the legality of the mandatory spending provisions might be tested by White House refusal to spend the money.

House Majority Leader Carl Albert (D-Okla.) said Nixon's statement was "merely another attempt to camouflage the disastrous economic policies of his Administration." Albert predicted that voters "would not fall for this obvious political gimmickry designed to

Musicians' President Herman D. Kenin Dies

New York—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin, who guided the Musicians to new heights in membership and program, died in his sleep at a hotel here. He was 69 and had been AFM president since 1958.

A message of sympathy from Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland expressed "deep sadness . . . at the tragic death of our colleague and warm friend."

His years of service to the AFM, they said, were matched "by his service to the entire trade union movement." The message recalled that "to every assignment he brought calm and thoughtful competence, and deep compassion for his fellow man."

Kenin was "a true trade unionist and a fine gentleman, and we shall miss him," the federation officers said. They conveyed "our sincere regret" to AFM officers and members and the family. Survivors include his wife, Mrs. V. Maxine Kenin, sons David and James, brother Frank K. and sister Fanny Friedman, Portland, Ore.

The family asked that instead of flowers, memorial tributes be sent in Kenin's name to Reed College, Portland, Ore. 97202.

To meet the emergency caused by Kenin's death, Sec.-Treas. Stanley Ballard and the officers called a special board meeting for July 29.

AFTE Elects W. T. Cleary, Raises Dues

Milwaukee—The Technical Engineers elected William T. Cleary as president for a two-year term at the union's 39th convention.

Cleary, formerly director of AFTE industrial employe activities, succeeds James Woodside, who declined to seek reelection to become a labor relations adviser with the Navy Dept.

Delegates voted to increase monthly per capita payments from $1.50 to $1.85. The increase in dues is subject to ratification by members in a national referendum. If approved, it will go into effect next February. The additional revenue will be channeled into the union's general fund and defense fund.

Sec.-Treas. John H. Dunne, who was re-elected to his second full term, reported that union membership rose by 3,000 since the last biennial convention to 18,000 members. The membership growth was due primarily to internal organizing efforts by AFTE locals, Dunne said.

Three new vice presidents were elected: Robert Coughlin, Philadelphia, Atlantic district; A. Roy Gilchrist, Toronto, Canadian district, and Robert M. Andraski, Milwaukee, Midwestern district. Re-elected to additional two-year terms as vice presidents were Joseph F. Swain, Northeast; Albert Gross, West, and Albert J. Resolute, federal.

Delegates selected Hawaii as the site for the 1972 AFTE convention.

Waymen Chart Goals On Service and Wages

Detroit—Delegates to the 36th convention of the Maintenance of Way Employes approved a program designed to preserve a high standard of living for the union's 140,000 members while improving the services of the railroads they work for.

The 700 delegates in five days of meetings, elected Pres. Harold C. Crotty and other officers to new four-year terms, raised Grand Lodge dues from $6.75 quarterly to $9.75 effective in 1971, and adopted 37 policy statements based on recommendations by the officers.

The recommendations were for action to improve agreements with railroads in such fields as wages and working conditions, paid vacations, travel time and expenses while away from home, cost-of-living wage adjustments, health and welfare, railroad retirement and unemployment insurance.

Two vice presidents and four board members retired at the convention. Crotty was chosen for a fourth term without opposition, and B. L. Sorah, Jr., who has been serving as secretary-treasurer pro tem since the death of Frank L. Noakes last May, was elected to succeed Noakes.

Crotty set the theme of the convention in a keynote address that called on labor, management and government to "work together to preserve and improve a railroad industry whose existence and services are absolutely essential to the well-being of our society."

The waymen's brotherhood, he declared, "is not an enemy of the railways. We are their friends. We realize that the structure of laws and regulations . . . ought to recognize that change has brought challenge to the rail industry."

On the other hand, Crotty declared, "we have every reason to expect that railway management will recognize" that the men who build and maintain rail bridges, tracks and buildings for the railroads "are entitled to wage rates and working conditions at least equal to those received by workers performing similar tasks" elsewhere.

Throughout their deliberations the delegates considered major problems affecting railway labor in the United States and Canada: railroad mergers, elimination of branch lines and facilities, erosion of maintenance of way forces with resultant unsafe working conditions, retirement benefit needs and united efforts with other railway labor organizations.

Unity was a principal note struck in convention addresses by Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union, Vice Pres. R. W. Smith of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, Donald S. Beattie, executive secretary of the Congress of Railway Unions, and Paul R. Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Neil P. Speirs, labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board, brought the delegates up to date on railway retirement legislation and the financial status of retirement funds. He predicted House passage of a bill increasing retirement benefits by 15 percent.

TV-Radio Artists Elect Bill Baldwin President

Louisville, Ky.—The Television & Radio Artists elected a new president at the union's 33rd convention and prepared for a sharp rise in membership due to proliferating new processes like cable television and home video tapes.

The shape of the future became obvious for the 250 delegates who saw a demonstration of a process whereby television programs can be put on a cartridge for representation in living rooms like a tape recording or motion picture.

Acting on a series of recommendations by AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff, incoming Pres. Bill Baldwin and others, delegates representing 40 local unions and chapters approved policy statements on organizing, job opportunities for minority groups, and job rights of present members.

They voted to strengthen the union's jurisdiction in such areas as cable TV and recordings. The convention also:

- Voted to work with other AFL-CIO unions to combat runaway film production and encourage more U.S.-produced films.
- Authorized the AFTRA board to seek agreement of sponsors, agencies, networks and producers to use more talent of professional standing in programming, and more dramatic programs in radio and television, including educational TV stations.
- Agreed that the union should seek ways to provide more work for performers affected by the use of program re-runs.

Wolff reported the successful conclusion of negotiations with NBC, CBS and ABC radio-TV chains on new contracts covering 20,000 network employes in Los Angeles, New York, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco.

Wolff and Baldwin both stressed the need for "staggered" contract bargaining to avoid overloading negotiators with prolonged and highly technical contract talks held simultaneously with employers. The delegates approved a resolution calling for different expiration dates for major contracts.

Baldwin succeeds Mel Brandt, who served three years as president and was not a candidate for another term. Baldwin, of North Hollywood, Calif., had been first vice president since 1967. He has been an actor, narrator, announcer and sportscaster for nearly 35 years.

Also elected without opposition were Vice Presidents Ken Harvey, New York; Joe Slattery, Chicago; Julian Barber, Washington, D.C.; Rubin Weiss, Detroit; Elizabeth Morgan, New York; Art Metzler, Louisville, Ky.; John Henning, Boston; Treas. Jack Costello, New York, and Recording Sec. Roy Glenn, Los Angeles.

Delegates unanimously voted to support newsmen members in protecting the confidential nature of information and news sources. They approved establishment of an equal employment opportunity program in the initial stages of negotiation in cable TV and cassettes.

In pre-convention sessions, singers reviewed proposals for improvements in the National Code of Fair Practice for Phonograph Recordings, expiring next Mar. 31.

With LPIU:

Bookbinders Back Merger Proposal

Detroit—Nearly 300 delegates to the 36th biennial convention of the Bookbinders voted unanimous approval of a recommendation to "enter into an agreement for merger with the Lithographers & Photoengravers Union."

Merger of the two internationals would create a 125,000-member union and was approved by the LPIU international council in June. The LPIU itself came into being through the 1964 merger of the Amalgamated Lithographers with the Photo Engravers.

In recommending the action, the Bookbinders executive council said it would enable the union to meet the "twin challenges of increased employer size and strength, and job insecurity caused by a changing technology."

The convention resolution authorizes the executive council to "take any and all actions which it deems necessary to bring about a merger" with the goal of consummating the action prior to the next convention. Any agreement must be ratified by the membership before becoming effective.

In an address to the convention the day before the merger resolution was adopted, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates that "the AFL-CIO is strongly pro-merger."

He said that when the AFL and CIO merged in 1955, the constitution that was adopted "stated as one of its main charges to the federation the responsibility to promote and encourage voluntary mergers between affiliates in similar or related trades and industries."

Kirkland went on to emphasize the increased importance of such mergers for unions faced with "rising costs of operations, the consolidation and merger of corporations, the growth of conglomerates and the onrush of technology."

These factors, he said, "argue very strongly for the consolidation of trade union structures," and he added "it is our conviction that the best interests of the trade union movement at large would be more clearly served by another couple dozen mergers of our affiliates than by almost any other single step that might be taken."

Delegates also heard from LPIU Pres. Kenneth Brown who detailed the gains he felt both unions could make under a merger.

In other actions, the Bookbinders voted a two-installment increase of 50 cents in per capita payments. On Feb. 1, 1971, per capita dues will go up 25 cents, and a similar raise will be made Feb. 1, 1972. Fifteen cents of each increase will go into the union's general fund and 10 cents into the defense fund.

Delegates also approved a 9 percent salary increase for international union officers and representatives, to be effective next year, and turned down a resolution prohibiting 65-year-old members from seeking office in the union.

During the five-day convention which ended July 17 delegates heard addresses by Sec.-Treas. J. Frazier Moore of the Pressmen, Pres. James H. Sampson of the Stereotypers & Electrotypers, Michigan AFL-CIO Pres. August Scholle, Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Services Trades Dept., and the U.S. Public Printer, Adolphus M. Spence.

Pres. Nixon headed the list of political figures who sent greetings and good wishes to the convention.

Final action taken by the convention was a unanimous decision to hold the 1972 convention in St. Paul.

REA Workers Rebuff Raid By Teamsters

New York—The Railway & Airline Clerks has repulsed a Teamster raid at REA Express, winning a nationwide mail ballot by a heavy margin.

The National Mediation Board announced these results of the voting: eligible 20,598: BRAC 10,074, Teamsters 6,077, void ballots 629.

BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis and Vice Pres. Robert Devlin, who heads the union's express division, congratulated the membership "for a vote of confidence in BRAC."

The union has represented REA Express workers since 1920. The last big election was in 1965, when employes in seven cities voted to leave the Teamsters and unite with the majority group in BRAC. The present contract at REA Express runs for another year.

ADVANTAGES OF MERGER to both the Bookbinders and the Lithographers & Photoengravers are described by Pres. Kenneth Brown of the LPIU at the 36th biennial convention of the Bookbinders in Detroit. Delegates authorized the Bookbinders executive council to proceed with merger negotiations.

Emergency Action Urged for Housing

American workers are ready and anxious to meet the challenge of the nation's housing crisis, the AFL-CIO told the Senate subcommittee on housing.

But more federal action is needed than the Administration proposes in its housing bill, Federation Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger declared.

The Administration proposal offers nothing new to meet the crisis, Goldfinger said. "The bill," he added, "has the appearance of action without the substance."

"When we are faced with a housing crisis so severe that only the upper one-third of America can afford decent shelter," Goldfinger suggested, "the Administration's 1970 housing program should be an emergency crisis plan to meet the annual goal of 2.6 million housing units spelled out in the 1968 Housing Act."

"Unfortunately, it does little to produce new homes or meet the crisis," he observed.

He noted that the Administration bill is designed merely to recodify existing housing laws and tidy up the many programs that have been developed over the years.

Meanwhile, the nation's home construction program slips behind its stated goals and more than 10.9 percent of the construction workers are without jobs.

"They are ready to go to work tomorrow if the housing plans and programs can be produced," Goldfinger told the senators. "America can make no greater effective utilization of this skilled labor reservoir and its human and material resources than by an immediate and massive program of residential construction."

Goldfinger pointed out that as of mid-1970, the annual rate of 1.3 million housing starts was about half of what the nation's needs are.

"It is obvious that our goal of the 1968 Act won't be met in 1970 and it was not met in 1969 either," he said. "We are failing desperately to meet the needs of new family formations, the loss of homes to demolition, condemnation and fire, without any great consideration to general lifting in the national standard of shelter."

"In this atmosphere of emergency," he continued, "the AFL-CIO cannot understand the failure of the Administration to put forth an emergency program to produce the millions of housing units that are so badly needed"

Goldfinger reiterated an appeal he made before the House Banking subcommittee, citing the need for improved credit policies of financial institutions to make home mortgages more available.

"The President has the power," he stressed, "to establish discretionary credit controls . . . to channel available credit at low interest rates to where it is needed and curb inflationary expansion of credit for purposes that are less important to society.

"Because the President has failed to act, we now urge Congress to direct the President to take the necessary steps to implement these discretionary controls and help meet this critical housing need."

While the rising cost of materials, labor, land and money have been factors in putting home ownership out of reach for low and moderate income families, the major blame lies with high interest rates, Goldfinger told the subcommittee.

He pointed out that the current effective interest rate on an FHA-VA home is 9.1 percent, compared with a rate of 5.46 percent just five years ago.

"Shelter at reasonable cost is one of the nation's most pressing needs," he declared. "The Administration's bill is not the answer."

"When the issue of credit allocation is met head on and resolved, and when new concepts for bringing new money and new concepts to the mortgage market are accepted, then America will have taken a giant stride toward resolving its housing crisis," he concluded.

Musicians' President Herman D. Kenin Dies

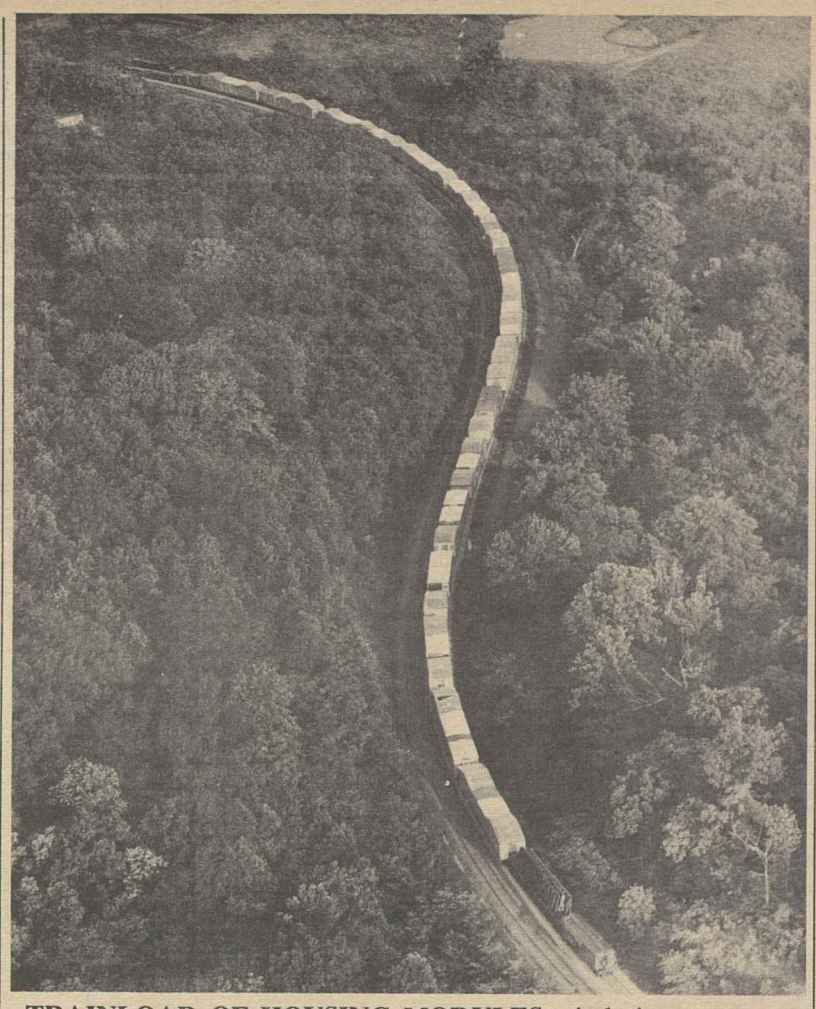
In his lifetime Kenin combined a career as violinist, orchestra leader and practicing attorney to become an influential labor leader. He had been an AFM officer since 1943.

Born in Vineland, N.J., he was the son of a member of the Cigar Makers when it was headed by Sam Gompers. He went to school in Portland, attended Reed College, and in 1930, following three years as a night student at Northwestern College of Law, was admitted to the Oregon bar.

During his college and law school days, Kenin played with the George Olsen Orchestra, then led his own band on hotel, radio, theater and club dates on the West Coast. He practiced law starting in 1931 but kept up his membership in AFM Local 99, and in 1936 was elected its president.



Kenin gave up his law practice at the request of AFM Pres. James C. Petrillo in 1943 to become a board member of the union. He was elected president in 1958 succeeding Petrillo and helped guide the 300,000-member union during its period of greatest growth.

Under his leadership the union became a major force in efforts to establish the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities. Also it won a long battle in Congress to reduce the 20 percent cabaret tax, established pension trust funds for musicians, persuaded television networks to eliminate foreign-produced music from their programming in favor of "live" domestic music, achieved major gains in salaries and conditions for symphony musicians, and set up scholarship and student-aid programs like the world-renowned Congress of Strings.

He was largely responsible for negotiating agreements with the major television networks and film studios, and with recording firms that fortified the role of the musician in those industries.

Kenin's death brought messages of sympathy from several world labor groups. Sec.-Gen. Arturo Jauregui of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers—ORIT—cabled "heartfelt condolence on the death of a great leader and devoted trade unionist, also . . a valued friend."

Kenin played a leading role in founding the Inter-American Federation of Entertainment Workers and the International Secretariat of Entertainment Trade Unions. He was past president and, at his death, treasurer of the AFL-CIO Council for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes.

TRAINLOAD OF HOUSING MODULES winds its way on a 1,000-mile trip to Corinth, Miss., where a townhouse complex is being erected for victims of a tornado. The modules are built by members of the Carpenters in Avon, N. Y.

Tornado-Raked City Gets Prefab Homes

Corinth, Miss.—Families whose homes were destroyed by a tornado were ready to move into a townhouse complex within hours after a trainload of union-made modules arrived on the building site.

The pre-assembled units were built by members of the Carpenters at the Stirling Homex Corp. plant in Avon, N.Y., and shipped by rail 1,000 miles to this northern Mississippi community.

Fifty-six modules made up the initial shipment of components that were assembled as 14 houses. After arriving in Corinth, the modules were hauled by truck trailers to building sites where they were placed on prepared foundations. In a short time, the modules were joined together and were ready for occupancy.

Stirling Homex is to ship a total of 130 modules for the building of 33 townhouses within a month. The Tennessee Valley Housing Authority will purchase the homes with financing from the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development. The units will then be rented to the tornado victims.

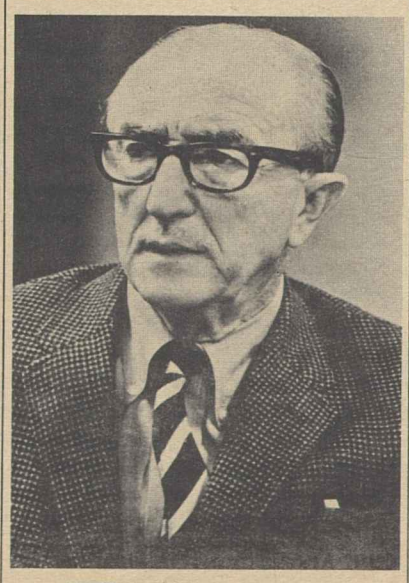
Witnessing the operation were a number of labor, government and local officials who helped in the dedication of the townhouse community.

Representing labor were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Pres. M. A. Hutcheson and First Vice Pres. William Sidell of the Carpenters; Vice Pres. J. P. Saunders of the United Transportation Union, and Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO.

The operation was hailed as the first long-distance shipment of homes by rail to open an important new means of filling the nation's acute housing shortage.

Kirkland noted that trade union members in both the housing and transportation industries "can take justifiable pride in the role they have played in providing this housing today for those who need it."



The prefabricated modules are built under a contract the Carpenters had signed a year ago with Stirling Homex. Hutcheson noted that the agreement has served as a model for other contracts in the modular construction industry.

The modules were made on the production line in Avon as sections of houses, complete with plumbing, lighting and central heating. Four modules are combined to make a three or four-bedroom house.

Stirling Homex Chairman David Stirling, Jr., said "this first shipment of homes by rail presents an important new means of filling the nation's acute housing shortage." It "opens new vistas for industrialized housing to satisfy the dwelling needs of our exploding population," he declared.

The long-distance rail shipment was hailed as a major innovation for the housing industry. Previously, industrialized housing was limited to shipment by highway only in an area of less than 400 miles. The cost of shipping by rail for a distance of about 1,000 miles is approximately 50 percent less than by highway, Stirling reported.

UTU Pres. Charles Luna said in a message: "It is not too often that we of the UTU can see so immediately the impact of our efforts."

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employes Federal Credit Union was made as of June 30, 1970. Members who do not receive statements by July 30, 1970 are asked to notify the chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 706, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Laborers Sign With Precast Housing Firms

The Laborers have signed agreements with five companies that are bringing European systems of precast concrete, factory-built housing to the United States and Canada for the first time.

In a ceremony at the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, Laborers' Pres. Peter Fosco hailed the agreement as a "major and significant breakthrough" in helping to solve the nation's housing crisis.

"All of us," he said, "the consumer, government and the construction industry are deeply aware of the necessity of providing better housing fast and in great numbers."

Fosco said that the systems have been successful, noting that "high-rise apartments that stand throughout Europe, Israel and some parts of Africa and South America testify to the validity of the techniques."

The agreements with the Laborers cover production and mainteance personnel and, in some cases, on-site skills. Individual contracts will be negotiated with each employer.

Each system employs similar techniques of using highly automated equipment to produce precast concrete components in the manufacture of housing units. Most of the components are designed primarily for high-rise and other multi-family developments.

The five firms are Ecology Development Corp. and American System Building, Inc., both of Washington, D. C.; Florida System Building/Coignet, Inc., Dade County, Fla.; Jespersen-Kay Systems, Inc., Toronto, Ont.; Balco Building Systems, Alsip, Ill.

In March, the Laborers signed national agreements with two U. S. manufacturers of industrialized housing in the precast concrete field.

Painters Win National Pact On Tank Jobs

Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters has announced a new two-year national agreement covering the priming, painting, coating and preparatory work for water storage systems and general storage tanks.

Retroactive to Mar. 1, the agreement is between the Painters, National Tank Fabricating & Erector Contractors, and a number of independent painting contractors across the nation.

The group does most of the work on big tank towers, reservoirs, standpipes, chemical plant penstocks, surge tanks and ground storage tanks.

Worked out after six months of intensive negotiations, the new agreement contains five major features, Raftery said.

- The contractor will be required to hire at least one local man on each project. The local man will be paid at either local or national rates, whichever is higher. Under the old agreement, the contractor was permitted to bring in three of his regular employes and pay the national agreement rates.
- A job steward will be employed at all times when work is being performed.
- Fringe benefits will be returned to the local union where the contractor's regular employe has membership.
- Rates are increased to compensate for rising living costs. They vary by districts but range up to more than $9 an hour.
- To coordinate manpower needs, the employer is required to notify the Painters 15 to 20 days before starting a job.

The Housing Crisis

WE HAVE STUDIED the Administration's proposed Housing Act of 1970 as well as other measures that relate to America's current housing crisis. We agree that there is a need to recodify the current housing laws and tidy up the multitudinous programs that have developed over the years.

However, the American public should not be misled into believing that the Administration's bill proposes new and extensive housing programs. The bill has the appearance of action without the substance.

At this moment in 1970, when we are faced with a housing crisis so severe that only the upper one-third of America can afford decent shelter, the Administration's 1970 housing program should be an emergency crisis plan to meet the annual goal of 2.6 million housing units spelled out in the 1968 Housing Act. Unfortunately, it does little to produce new homes or meet the crisis.

American workers are available now in all trades and in any number to produce 2.6 million housing units this year and any year hereafter: American workers are available in any numbers necessary to produce lumber, home-building materials, and appliances. These workers are available and anxious to go to work now.

More than 10.9 percent of America's construction workers are presently jobless and ready to go to work tomorrow if the housing plans and programs can be produced.

We note that last month's slight upturn in housing starts, after a 16-month slide, has caused general optimism in trade circles. We wish it were more than the possibility of a promise that the bottom has been reached. We cannot ignore the fact that every passing month puts us further from realizing our 10-year goals.

DESPITE OUR MANY programs and lofty goals, America is steadily falling behind in its shelter needs. And these are not impossible goals, either. If we could achieve the annual housing production of 20 years ago, we would be enjoying a comfortable housing boom and an end to the joblessness that is gripping workers and communities throughout America.

In 1950 we built 1,952,000 new private dwelling units. We have never reached that number of new units in any year since.

We now stand, as of June 1970, at an annual rate of 1,358,000 housing starts—only about half of what is needed. It is obvious that our goal of the 1968 Act won't be met in 1970 and it was not met in 1969 either. We are failing desperately to meet the needs of new family formations, the loss of homes to demolition, condemnation and fire, without any great consideration to a general lifting in the national standard of shelter.

In this atmosphere of emergency, the AFL-CIO cannot understand the failure of the Administration to put forth an emergency crisis program to produce the millions of housing units that are so badly needed.

How can we meet the housing needs of a 250-million population that will soon be upon us, when we can't even meet the housing output of 20 years ago? America was able to achieve nearly 2 million housing starts in 1950, when the population was 152 million. But in 1969, with a population of 203 million, the number of housing starts was only 1.5 million and falling. And even if housing starts improve somewhat during the remainder of this year, it is likely that the annual total will be less than in 1969—unless decisive action is taken immediately.

A Word Edgewise:

Hard Look Needed at Torrent Of Invisible Political Spending

By John P. Roche

THE STUDY of invisible political finances understandably arouses a great deal of suspicion among Democrats and Republicans alike. Without for a minute suggesting that all the fun should be taken out of American politics, I submit that when $100 million are spent in a presidential election, we have gone beyond the "boys will be boys" phase. And that a very hard look should be taken at the level of acceleration of campaign spending, which may soon make it impossible for anyone without the personal fortune of Nelson Rockefeller, Richard Ottinger, or the late John Kennedy to run an effective statewide-race.

On the national level, a great deal of money is funneled invisibly into political war chests by various financial dodges: the use of corporate credit cards by political workers, or, even more notably, the hiring of a political worker by a large business, which pays his freight but never sees him.

However, one of the most useful ways of bankrolling a campaign is to find jobs for the troops in the federal government. True, more than 95 percent of federal civilian employes are covered by civil service. But, in practice, what does that mean? Most political experts these days are well qualified for civil service appointments. Thus there is nothing dishonest in the award of, say, a GS-15 rating to a skilled statistician. He is then appointed—to use a hypothetical example—Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of Commerce and sent on detached service to the White House. Meet the President's chief pollster.

Control of the presidency provides almost unlimited possibilities for invisible campaign financing. Take the phone bill as a case in point. Those in the White House share the demonic urge to call all political acquaintances once a week. But while the Democrats owe a million dollars on this account, the Republicans ask for a permanent leased line, and Uncle Sam picks up the bill. From 1961-69, of course, the tables were reversed and the GOP kept AT&T nervous.

Since the job of organizing a campaign is not very different from that of preparing a regular presidential trip, the highly skilled men who "advance" the President are obviously also campaign workers. As any insider will acknowledge, a good advance man is worth three Secretaries of State. A man who can, on eight hours notice, turn out a million and a half Mexicans with flags and balloons (or in this case knows which Mexican official can push that button) is worth his weight in gold. He merits a good, quiet post, one with minimal burdens.

What could be more appropriate than membership on the Subversive Activities Control Board? Or any one of 40 or 50 miscellaneous commissions, boards, etc., that are tucked away in the Administration? I used to play poker with the advance men on Air Force I and their formal titles never ceased to amaze me; the prize went to a man whose official style (slightly altered to protect the guilty) was "Political Adviser to the International Meteorological Commission."

NOW, AS I SAID before, we certainly don't want to purify politics to the point of boredom—that could start a revolution. But at the same time, the American people have a vested interest in guaranteeing that no party can buy an election. The first priority is obviously TV, and here CBS has set a good precedent by giving time for the Democrats to reply to the President. After that, the whole structure of campaign financing should be investigated and reformed.

In this area, I might add, the Democrats are not just howling because they lost. In 1966, and again in 1967, Pres. Lyndon Johnson urged upon Congress a comprehensive cleanup in our election procedures. As Johnson put it in May 1966, "The essence of our democratic system is the clash of ideas beeween differing men and differing parties."

In 1968, the GOP spent nearly $25 million in the final campaign; the Democrats, $10.6 million; Wallace, $6.9 million. It would take a pretty strong idea to stay afloat in this torrent of money.

'The Third Pollution':

Public Urged to 'Make Noise' About Growing Hazard of Noise

JETS, JACKHAMMERS, sirens, food blenders, electronic music—all contribute to making the sound of our cities almost unbearable. At home, at work, at play, innumerable pieces of equipment add to efficiency and convenience—and threaten us with the jitters and with loss of hearing.

Noise—The Third Pollution, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet, by Theodore Berland, explains what noise is and what it does—physically and psychologically—and what you and your community can do "to quiet our society."

"Noise," Berland states simply, "is sound that is obnoxious. Noise travels like waves on water, but invisibly. It is usually carried by air, but it can also be conducted by the wood walls of homes, by the steel floors of offices, by the glass in windows, and by the metal bodies of autos and airplanes. . . .

"If the noise is loud enough," he continues, "your ear can suffer temporary inability to hear. . . . If the cells are given a rest, they can recover. But they can't if the noise is too prolonged or repeats itself too soon."

Sirens and jet engines and highly amplified rock music are examples of noise which is most dangerous to hearing and which today few persons can fully avoid. They exemplify what noise researchers have found: "What has passed unnoticed is that many noise levels encountered in the community exceed sound standards found injurious in industry."

Hearing impairment is not the only hazard. There is evidence that even the unborn child in its mother's womb suffers stress because of noise, "which may induce developmental abnormalities in the fetus." Other studies have shown that "noise increases the level of cholesterol in the blood and raises blood pressure," Berland reports.

One researcher "concluded that his findings meant that night sounds such as those of traffic, heard while we sleep, might endanger the health of our heart and arteries."

Psychological effects of noise, Berland summarizes, "are centered on fear and annoyance. . . . It's easy to understand how a man who works in a frustratingly noisy environment comes home irritable. If his home is also noisy, he not only is not a pleasant person to be with but his mental health is seriously threatened."

Finally, noise can cause cracks in metal, break glass windows, crack plaster walls, destroy irreplaceable archeological ruins.

BUT WE CAN protect ourselves against noise and its hazards—by personal measures, by appropriate laws, and by community action. Most simply, Berland suggests, you can cover your ears with your hands, or with ear plugs, when noise becomes unbearable. He even recommends that "each of us should carry a pocket set of ear plugs or ear protectors."

Proper construction techniques can make walls effective barriers against noise. Until everyone lives and works in better-constructed buildings, though, it should be noted that "drapes, carpets, upholstered furniture, and acoustical walls or ceilings all work to absorb sound. . . ."

Even more important, Berland stresses, is prevention of noise—by public pressure for the manufacture of quieter home and commercial equipment, and the containment or proper placing of noisy industries far from town and residences.

The United States lags behind other countries in control of noise because it has no national anti-noise legislation. And the state and local regulations that do exist are only weakly enforced.

Berland reports that "health professionals, hearing experts, and sound specialists, aided by lawyers, public officials, and . . . private citizens, are leading the fight against noise. And they are winning small but significant battles." A few such victories show "that when citizens organize themselves and make their wants known, government, business, and industry must listen. It has happened in the area of pure foods, and in auto safety, and it is happening in air pollution and water pollution. If more citizens make noise about noise, this too will be actively and successfully fought."

Farm Union Scores Advances As Growers Shed Fear of Pacts

GROWER REALIZATION that a union contract isn't "lethal" was the key to the "sudden and dramatic breakthrough" of the Farm Workers union in the grape fields of California and Arizona, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher declared.

Pointing out that about one-third of the total table grape crop is now union-harvested and marketed under more than 80 trade labels, Kircher predicted, "It is just a matter of time until the rest of the growers . . . join the collective bargaining march into this modern era." He made the statements on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview, Labor News Conference.

Kircher credited the mounting success of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee to strong, able and determined leadership from within the ranks of the union itself.

"They have intelligence . . . courage . . . ability to learn . . . desire to understand, and they work tirelessly toward goals they set for themselves" in behalf of "farm workers of today, and those who will come tomorrow," he said. "This movement is really a movement of farm workers, for farm workers and by farm workers" with long personal and family experience and background as migrant workers, he added.

Kircher said that in addition to substantial wage gains under the union contracts, farm workers and their families will for the first time be protected by prepaid medical insurance and a seniority system that will help ease the uncertainty of where they will work from year to year.

THE NEW MEASURE of job security will give the farm worker "a chance to put down roots, and give his family some of the stability that other workers have built for themselves through the collective bargaining process over the years," he noted.

He stressed, however, that the grape boycott continues against those growers still refusing to sign union contracts and urged "our friends all over the nation to determine whether or not the grapes they see in a market have been union-harvested" before they buy them. Shoppers, he said, should demand to see the UFWOC union label on the boxes.

Questioning Kircher were Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine and Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc. Labor News Conference is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

WE ARE CONTINUALLY working with the democratic machinery of our government seeking to perfect it and bring it closer to the people.

In the last few years legislation has been enacted to assure the voting rights of all citizens, elimination of the poll tax, protection against fraud at the ballot box, and—last month—lowering the voting age to 18. The U.S. Supreme Court, with the backing of Congress, gave us one-man, one-vote.

When this nation was founded, members of the U.S. Senate were elected by the state legislatures. However, in 1913, the 17th Amendment to the Constitution provided for the popular election of Senators.

Attention is now being centered on our system of election of President and Vice President.

Many voters still do not realize that when they cast their ballots they are not directly voting for President and Vice President. They vote for members of the Electoral College.

Members of the Electoral College from each state are equal to the number of senators and representatives from that state. The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Canal Zone, the Virgin Islands and Guam have no electoral votes. Only in 1964 was the District of Columbia awarded three votes.

Today the electoral college totals 538. The necessary majority to elect a President is 270.

If no presidential candidate receives a majority in the Electoral College, the election is decided by the House of Representatives. Under the 12th Amendment to the Constitution, each state has one vote. The House chooses from among the three candidates with the highest electoral votes.

This means that a third party candidate—such as George Wallace—could maneuver his balance of power role for concessions that would throw the White House to one major candidate or another.

This happened twice before in our history, when Thomas Jefferson was elected President in 1800 and John Quincy Adams in 1825. And judging by the devious maneuverings, the open buying and selling of votes, this is no way to determine the leader of the nation.

ANOTHER FEATURE of the present system disturbs many people. In 12 presidential contests the winner received less than a clear majority of the popular vote. In three elections—John Quincy Adams in 1825, Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876 and Benjamin Harrison in 1888—the victor came second in the popular vote.

A plan for direct election of the President is now before the Congress. Its prime sponsor has been Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.). But it was the House of Representatives which first took action, securing the two-thirds vote necessary for a constitutional amendment.

The House-passed bill is quite simple. The candidate for President who receives the largest popular vote would be elected, without regard to the states won or lost. If no candidate receives 40 percent of the vote, a runoff would be held between the two top vote getters.

The support given the Bayh Amendment is non-partisan and across the board as far as political and economic philosophy goes. It is backed by the AFL-CIO, United Auto Workers, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Bar Association, the League of Women Voters and many religious and other public interest groups.

The proposal is not expected to sail through the Senate, however. With the 100-member Senate it must receive 67 votes and while a clear majority is already committed there are some roadblocks.

Some of the undecided senators are from small states. Under the present system their states play a bigger role in determining the President than they would under a direct election system.

And even if the proposal receives the two-thirds vote in the Senate, it still must be approved by 38, or three-fourths, of the states.

N.Y. Landlords End Holdout, Strike Settled

New York—Employes of 2,500 apartment houses returned to work with a new three-year contract and a $40 wage increase after holdout landlords approved a settlement they had previously rejected.

The settlement ended a two-week walkout by 12,000 members of Service Employes Local 32B against building owners represented by one landlord group.

Another 13,000 members of the union previously had won contract improvements without a strike. For all 25,000 members, the contract calls for an $18-a-week increase retroactive to Apr. 21, another raise of $12 in 1971, and a further $10 hike the third year.

The new pact, negotiated before the strike with the Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations for all consenting owners, also calls for improved shift differentials, paid vacations, and leaves of absence for health and other specified reasons.

Thomas Shortman, president of the 43,000-member local union, said the new agreement provides the best wage package in the union's 36-year history. Local 32B represents building superintendents, maintenance staffs, elevator operators, doormen, custodial employes and porters.

The strike just ended, and one threatened for Bronx landlords when contracts of sister Local 32E expire in September, grew out of disputes over the city rent control ordinance. The City Council revised the law in June but some landlords held out for more leeway between rent income and expenses.

Local 32B started negotiations on a new contract in February, and reached agreement with the Realty Board in June. It voted to strike those landlords who refused to come to terms but postponed a walkout twice while the City Council debated changes in the rent control law affecting older buildings.

Shortly before the old contract expired, Local 32B signed an interim agreement with a majority of the landlords providing that any wage increase agreed on would be retroactive. When the city finally acted, holdout landlords were struck.

The city's Dept. of Housing Maintenance & Rent served notice on the holdouts that it was prepared to take over all buildings that failed to provide essential services. Later the rebelling owners agreed to give the city time to work out further improvements in the rent law by Apr. 1, 1972. If it does not, the union or the owner group may terminate the present contract.

Full Support of Clerks Urged in Airline Strike

All AFL-CIO unions and their members were urged by Federation Pres. George Meany to give "full support" to the strike of 3,500 members of the Railway & Airline Clerks against Northwest Airlines.

In a letter to affiliated unions and central labor bodies, Meany requested "all possible cooperation to the strikers" who seek a fair contract "as quickly as possible."

In other developments BRAC Pres. C. L. Dennis asked the International Transport Workers Federation for help in boycotting flights by Northwest planes to Asiatic cities, and Minneapolis Mayor Charles Stenvig asked the National Mediation Board to offer its services to the parties.

Since July 8, union members have been on strike for higher wages and benefits on a par with those on comparable airlines. Northwest has reduced its flight schedule by about 92 percent, the union estimates, but still is maintaining some flights to the Far East.

Dennis told the ITWF, composed of transportation unions throughout the non-Communist world, that its help is needed in getting Northwest to negotiate promptly with BRAC on all contract issues. Some flights are continuing to Japan, Hong Kong, Korea, Singapore and other overseas points, he said.

Meany's message noted that the clerks' walkout followed months of unfruitful negotiations. Northwest management, he pointed out, has not yet improved an original offer which was "much less than comparable wage settlements on other airlines."

The strike, he said, has strong public support because of the justice of the union's proposals and its "patient efforts to achieve agreement."

BRAC posted picket lines in 38 U.S. cities normally served by the carrier. Most members of other unions declined to cross the lines and management tried to give minimum flight service to a few cities with planes serviced and flown by company supervisors and strikebreakers.

BRAC Chairman Jack M. Bacon said Northwest "wants to pay less than anyone else and get more work for it."

ITU Mailers Win $72 Hike In New York

New York—Members of the ITU Mailers won a wage increase of $72 a week over a three-year period at the Daily News and said they expect the agreement to set a pattern for similar pacts at the Times, Post and Long Island Press.

The agreement in principle, announced by Mediator Theodore W. Kheel at the hour set for a walkout at the News and a shutdown or lockout at the Times, will be reduced to writing and then submitted to a vote of members, probably within a month.

Pres. George E. McDonald of Mailers Local 6 reported the settlement to the presidents of eight other newspaper unions after Kheel's announcement at Automation House. A ninth union, Typographical Local 6, is the only other union to reach agreement this year.

A spokesman for the Newspaper Guild said "absolutely no progress has been made anywhere" in its negotiations with the publishers, but that talks will continue.

The Mailers' settlement will give 500 members at the News a pay increase of 42.92 percent, compounded over three years. This was reported to be $2.10 more than they would have received under the percentage agreement first offered by the publishers, but less than the $7 additional they had asked. Mailers' wages, now $167.60 a week, will rise by $25.94 this year, $21.83 next year and $24.23 the third.

disguise presidential neglect in such fields as health, education and housing."

On the heels of Nixon's statement, the House Appropriations Committee completed action on a Labor-HEW package totalling $18.8 billion, about $93 million more than the Administration requested. Last year's appropriation, which called for $19.4 billion, drew Nixon's first veto as president.

The Labor-HEW bill which the committee approved increased the Administration's request for HEW by $134 million, to a total of $15.4 billion. But it cut back on the Administration requests for the Labor Dept. by $8 million, leaving a total of $1.2 billion, and took another $33 million off the funds for related agencies.

Members of the Democratic Study Group, a coalition of House liberals, called the health provisions of the bill approved by committee "woefully inadequate" first lost their bid for an additional $360 million on a 151-to-103 teller vote.

The AFL-CIO backed this effort and also sought to retain full funding for the NLRB, which the committee voted a total of $39.4 million, some $1.5 million more than was requested and almost $1 million more than last year's budget.

The House Committee voted $154 million for wage and labor standards under the Labor Dept. budget. This is about 50 percent above last year's appropriation but provides for no increase in the wage-hour investigating staff.

provision for federal standards, a major goal of the AFL-CIO.

In another action, a House committee revived the labor-backed effort to toughen the federal law against discrimination in hiring. The House Education & Labor Committee approved a bill that would give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the authority to issue "cease-and-desist" orders against violators of the federal law.

The bill would also extend coverage under the law to state and local government employes and to school and college teachers. The act forbids discrimination in hiring by employers or unions on the basis of race, religion, color, sex or national origin.

The effort to arm the EEOC with the power of cease-and-desist orders has had the strong backing of the AFL-CIO, but has been opposed by the Administration. The Administration proposes that the EEOC go into federal court to seek enforcement of its findings.

The action by the House committee came after the Administration proposal was voted down 18-14 on a split that came along party lines—the Democrats opposing the Administration version and the Republicans voting to retain it. The committee then approved the tougher version by voice vote.

The AFL-CIO testified as long as a year ago on behalf of cease-and-desist orders for the EEOC, at the same time the chairman of the commission, William H. Brown III, testified that the cease-and-desist orders were unnecessary and the Administration bill was sufficient.

The Administration bill rejected by the House committee included no provision for extension of the coverage under the act. The bill recommended by the committee has the effect of transferring discrimination cases in the federal government to the EEOC and away from the Civil Service Commission.

The bill would widen coverage to employers of eight workers instead of the 25 under the present law. It would not, however, move the authority of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance to the EEOC. This provision, which the AFL-CIO has backed, is included in a similar bill pending in the Senate.

In other congressional developments:

- The House Agriculture Committee approved a new three-year farm support program with a ceiling of $55,000 on subsidies to big farms raising cotton, wheat and feed grains. Action on the agriculture bill is necessary to clear final approval on extension of the Food Stamp program.

However, the $55,000 limit on subsidies would apply to cotton, wheat and feed grain separately, making it possible for one big farm still to receive $165,000 if it qualified for maximum subsidy in each. Last year, with no limits, five big farms received over $1 million each under the program.

- Federal support for the arts and humanities was extended three years when Pres. Nixon signed a bill calling for $40 million this year, $60 million next year and $80 million the following year. The creation of the National Foundation on the Arts & Humanities and its extension this year received strong labor backing.
- A $2.02 billion budget for the Interior Dept. was approved by the House, the first budget of a major federal department to be forwarded to the President. The bill cut some $6 million off the amount sought by the Administration.
- The House Banking Committee approved a bill to empower Pres. Nixon to impose wage price controls. The measure was tacked onto the Defense Production Act and would allow the president to impose controls on prices, wages, salaries and rents at levels no higher than those in effect on May 25, 1970.

The legislation, which the Administration has said it didn't want and wouldn't use, was described by Speaker John W. McCormack as part of the continuing effort to arm the president "with all the necessary to stop the galloping inflation which we are experiencing."

SIU to Fight Charges On Political Donations

Members of the Seafarers, at meetings throughout the country, are voting to fight an indictment handed down by a grand jury in Brooklyn charging that the union has made political contributions in violation of federal law.

The Seafarers Log, official publication of the SIU, noted that the Justice Dept. took 18 months to bring its findings before the grand jury which handed down a 17-count indictment against the union, and a number of its officers. The Log reported the action in a special four-page supplement.

The indictment, the Log said, charges that donations from the Seafarers' Political Activities Donations organization (SPAD) of $20,000 to various groups supporting the Humphrey-Muskie ticket in 1968 and another $20,000 contributed to Republican campaign committees were made in violation of federal law.

The indictment also charged that the union and its officers had conspired to spend $750,000 for political action in presidential, senatorial and congressional campaigns between 1964 and 1968. Contributions were made to both Democratic and Republican committees and candidates.

The paper pointed out that "all of the contributions cited in the indictment had been reported publicly by SIU's SPAD to the Dept. of Labor and the clerks of the House of Representatives and the Senate, as required by law."

The charges, the Log added, follow "a long series of attacks by newspapers—and the Wall Street Journal in particular—against SIU's political activities."

Reports on the indictment were made to membership meetings by SIU Sec.-Treas. Al Kerr. The meetings adopted without dissent the position "to fight the indictment financially and morally and to use the union's full strength to protect its rights."

Individuals named in the indictment are SIU Pres. Paul Hall, Kerr, Vice Pres. Earl Sheppard, Representatives Frank Boyne, Paul Drozak, Joseph DiGiorgio, Frank Drozak and Philip Carlip, the union's legislative representative in Washington.

Subhuman Conditions:

Story of Migrants' Misery Related at Senate Hearings

A pattern of misery and death caused by inhumane living conditions among migrant farm laborers in Florida, Texas and Michigan was drawn in testimony before a congressional panel.

Large families are poorly fed and crowded together in rundown housing projects without heat, clean water or sanitary facilities, the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor & Public Welfare was told.

The result is a heavy incidence of disease, four physicians said in their testimony.

Children have died after drinking the only water available at a migrant camp in Texas, another witness related. And "we have had dogs die from drinking the water, which is filled with garbage, fecal matter and other pollutants," said Efrain Fernandez, who works with the AFL-CIO Farm Workers in the Rio Grande Valley.

The four doctors said that such conditions continued to exist a year after the federal government instituted a $15 million health program for migratory workers.

The testimony of the doctors centered on the conditions they discovered in Hidalgo County in southern Texas. They were among a group of 15 physicians who examined 1,400 members of migrant families in a study financed by the Field Foundation.

They told of children who were often dying of neglect or growing up without hope because malnutrition and disease had left them unequipped physically or mentally to face life.

Most of the children were infected by intestinal parasites and skin diseases and many had ear infections that left them partially deaf, said Dr. Raymond M. Wheeler of Charlotte, N.C.

The doctors also said that migrant families had an infant-maternal mortality rate one-third to one-fourth higher than the national average.

"We find destitution and exploitation of men, women and children which we would be ashamed to describe were we not so horrified by their presence," one doctor told Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.), chairman of the subcommittee.

A number of large corporations, including Coca Cola, were charged with having "callous disregard" for impoverished migrant workers who harvest the crops.

Coca Cola bought out Minute Maid orange juice 10 years ago and owns or controls about 30,000 acres of Florida citrus groves. Other products of the company include Snowcrop orange juice, and HI-C and Real Gold fruit drinks.

UFWOC Rep. Fernandez declared that the conditions of the migrants — mostly Mexican-Americans — at many Florida and Texas farms were subhuman.

He also said that state and local institutions have tried to suppress the culture of the Mexican-Americans, who have suffered severe psychological damage as a result.

"Our children fall behind in school not because they cannot learn but because the schools do not teach in our language," Fernandez observed. "Our people are taught to believe that our cultural heritage is not worthy of respect—they are taught to be ashamed."

Fernandez also appealed for congressional support for farm worker organizations seeking to help migrant workers.

"We think the solution is in our own efforts to organize and have power over our own affairs. . . . We don't want paternalism," he declared.

Machinists Win Appeal On Backpay for 1,000

New Orleans—The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that nearly 1,000 members of the Machinists, locked out for more than a year by National Airlines in 1969, are entitled to reinstatement "with full benefits including backpay."

The three appeals judges, ruling for the second time in nine months, reversed U.S. District Judge C. Clyde Atkins of Miami and returned the case to his court for a decision in line with their findings.

The IAM estimated that company compliance with the ruling would give mechanics and other ground crewmen in excess of $10,000 each in lost benefits covering base pay, longevity pay, shift differential, cost of living bonus and the cost of hospital and insurance benefits paid by them during the lockout. Also due are company contributions for pensions, social security and unemployment compensation, it said.

Appeals Judges John C. Godbold, David W. Dyer and Lewis R. Morgan found again, as they had last November, that the mass discharge of IAM mechanics and other ground crewmen in National shops 18 months ago was not justified. The men had walked off their jobs to protest the firing of three New York mechanics in a safety dispute.

The judges said in the earlier decision, "We do not think the mass discharge of the strikers . . . can be justified by the need to restore service. We recognize that the District Court was faced with a difficult situation and had little time to deal with it.

"Nevertheless we hold that the discharge of the strikers constituted an impermissible form of self-help" under the Railway Labor Act. "The discharge . . . was not necessary in order to hire a new labor force."

IAM members returned to work last June under an agreement with National that left the back pay issue to the courts to resolve.

The original order to reinstate the strikers was limited to those employes who had not been replaced. The appeals judges sent the case back to Judge Atkins with instruction to determine whether the replacements—totaling either 4 or 67—had actually acquired payroll status at National.

In an unusual action, the Miami judge ignored the higher court's instruction. He ruled that National could not have hired a new labor force to keep its planes serviced without discharging all the strikers.

Of this the appeals judges said, "The district judge erred. . . . He reached a conclusion precisely contrary to the holding of this court that self-help . . . did not justify mass discharge, and that strikers were entitled to reinstatement unless replaced."

The only matters for the lower court to determine were "when the strikers would have been returned to work, and who had been replaced as of that time," the appeals panel said.

As to replacements for the strikers, the panel ruled: "The formation of an employment contract with a replacement, which never ripens into actual employment, may not displace the statutory right of the discharged employe to return to the status quo."

The union also claims that if a striker has been replaced and a vacancy he is qualified to fill has since arisen, he must be reinstated to that vacancy with full backpay and benefits from the time the vacancy arose. The appeals judges directed the district judge to rule on that new issue.

Pennsylvania Spells Out Public Employe Rights

Harrisburg—The Pennsylvania legislature overwhelmingly adopted a landmark legislative package that extends collective bargaining rights to public employes and workers at non-profit institutions. The law does not prohibit strikes, but spells out mediation and fact-finding procedures that must first be exhausted.

Enactment came on the last day of the legislature's meeting before its summer recess, capping a 15-year effort by the State AFL-CIO and other labor organizations.

Gov. Raymond P. Shafer was due to sign the bill within days after it cleared the House of Representatives by a 157 to 34 vote. The bill had sailed through the Senate earlier, 32-13.

All Democrats and a majority of Republicans in both houses of the legislature voted in favor of the bill despite opposition from the GOP leadership, business interests, school boards and the "right-to-work" lobby.

The long drive for passage was spearheaded by a coalition built by the AFL-CIO of nurses, teachers, policemen, and state, county and municipal employes.

The bill extends union rights to nearly 1 million workers in the public sector across the state, including employes of non-profit hospitals, nursing homes, universities and colleges.

Among the key provisions are:

- Maintenance of membership rolls in unions.
- The right to strike after unions exhaust a comprehensive program of bargaining, mediation and fact-finding procedures.
- Protection of pre-existing collective bargaining agreements.
- Extension of the state labor relations act to cover public and institutional employes.

Michael Johnson, executive vice president of the State AFL-CIO, reported that the labor coalition displayed exceptional unity in working for the passage of the bill.

The coalition's efforts proved particularly effective in beating off attempts by "right-to-work" elements to weaken or side-track the measure with amendments, Johnson said.

AFL-CIO Assails Move To Sap Labor Board

- By permitting employers to prosecute their own cases and giving plenary jurisdiction to district courts, the bill would "restore the worst evils of government by injunction."

Harris reminded the committee of the bitterness brought about by the indiscriminate issuance of injunctions against unions "which completely undermined the confidence of workers in the administration of justice" before passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932.

"To put the federal courts back into the business of government by injunction would be a disservice not only to workers and unions, but to the federal courts and the stability of our policy," Harris said.

- Harris pointed out that "the Board and the Office of General Counsel should have and do have an expertise which several hundred district judges in 86 different districts, and 86 different U.S. attorneys' offices, could not be expected to match."

While the NLRB applies its doctrines uniformly throughout the country, he noted, "decisions by hundreds of different district judges would produce conflicting rulings to the point of chaos."

Finally, he declared, experience over the years has shown that trial judges tend to be more sympathetic to workers in major industrial districts, where unions are strongest, less sympathetic in areas where employers have blocked workers' organizing and where unions are weakest. "To oversimplify," he said, "we get the worst treatment from the trial courts where we need the best. This situation would be greatly accentuated if district courts had the broad role proposed" in the Tower bill.

Harris declared the situation would be no better under another bill that would scrap the NLRB in favor of a "labor court."

"If its 15 judges sat singly, or in small panels, numerous conflicts in doctrine would develop," he pointed out, "and en banc hearings to resolve them would produce additional delay, and the backlog of cases would snowball."

Any major revision of the labor laws, the federation spokesman suggested, should follow these lines:

- Trial examiner decisions should be made final, subject to discretionary review by the NLRB, and to judicial review in the same manner as board decisions now are.
- Board and trial examiner decisions should become legally effective automatically after a short period during which respondents could file petitions for review.
- Injunction provisions, heavily weighted toward employers, should be revised in the interests of equity.

Labor Archives Launched in South

Atlanta—The Southern Labor Archives are being set up at the Georgia State University library through an agreement reached with the southeastern regional AFL-CIO and several labor organizations.

The archives are designed to preserve official and historical records of trade unions and to aid historians, researchers and scholars in their study of the labor movement.

The project is being launched with an initial donation of $3,750 from several southern labor organizations. The contributors include AFL-CIO Region VI, which takes in Alabama, Georgia and Florida; the Atlanta Labor Council; the North Georgia Building & Construction Trades Council and Laundry Workers Local 218.

SST Program Seen as Boost To Economy

The development of a supersonic transport plane is important to the national economy and will assure continued American superiority in world aviation, a Dept. of Transportation official told the Machinists union membership.

In answers to 12 frequently asked questions about the SST printed in the IAM paper The Machinist, William M. Magruder, director of SST development for the department, touched on costs, safety, pollution, sonic boom and other problems posed by opponents of the plane.

Magruder expanded on many of the answers in a speech at the National Press Club. The issue, he pointed out, is not whether the world will have a supersonic airplane. "That has already been decided. The British-French Concorde and the Russian TU 144 are flying."

He announced a $27.6 million effort to answer questions being asked by persons concerned with damage to the environment. Studies will be conducted by top scientists who will check out the effects of radiation, vapor trails, noise and other problems raised by the plane's development.

'Do Nothing' Approach:

Meany Hits Failure Of Economic Policy

Cincinnati—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged that the Nixon Administration has "done nothing and is doing nothing," to combat unemployment, the cost of living and increasing interest rates.

Meany, speaking before the 50th convention of the Theatrical Stage Employes, said the Administration's economic policies are "a complete and absolute failure."

He cited the rising unemployment rate, now 4.8 percent, and high interest rates which "are drying up credit and have brought housing in this country to a practical halt," as indications of the failure of Administration policies.

On living costs, Meany noted that they have been rising at an annual rate of 6 percent since January. "In other words, they are going up a half-percent a month, and let me tell you, when you take that on month after month, that adds up to quite a bundle," he said.

Meany told the 1,000 IATSE delegates that the Nixon Administration seems "to have taken an almost fatalistic view that they have a policy based on the theories of their financial experts and this policy has got to work—if not today, tomorrow, or perhaps the next day. Well it may work, but before it works we may not be in a recession, but what we would call a major depression."

Earlier, convention delegates heard Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America, speak on the recent pact between the union and the Association of Motion Picture & Television Producers to produce more films in the United States.

"As of July 16, 23 pictures have come into production under this agreement. Six of these films have been taken off the shelves and four were going to be made in foreign countries," Valenti noted.

He urged the union to unite with other elements of the film industry to "make the creation of motion pictures in the United States more attractive and beneficial than any other place in the world."

Two resolutions before the convention deal with restrictions on foreign-made films. One asks for a national boycott of products of General Mills and other sponsors using foreign-made animated subjects in the United States and the other asks for government restrictions on entry of foreign theatrical and television films.

The delegates, representing 60,000 motion picture and theatrical industry workers, approved a resolution asking for stiffening of rules to protect industry employes as well as the public "against obscenity and pornography in films, while retaining legitimate freedom of expression for motion picture producers as guaranteed by the first amendment."

In other resolutions, the convention demanded that bidders on government film-making contracts use union crews, voted to seek cost-of-living clauses in future contracts, and urged locals to set up apprenticeship programs.

Meany, discussing the Viet Nam war in his address, lauded the President for bringing home 115,000 U.S. troops since he took office.

"He did not put them there. In the last analysis, security in Saigon is a military matter and the decision rests with the commander-in-chief of our armed forces and this is the basis of the AFL-CIO's support."

On civil rights, Meany said, "I can tell you very frankly that I am not satisfied with the progress we have made. . . . But to say that nothing is being done and that we have not made any progress, of course, would be absolute nonsense. We have made and are going to continue to make progress."

Hanoi Assailed on Prison Conditions

Eighty-nine members of the U.S. Senate signed a letter to the premier of North Viet Nam expressing their "outrage at the persistent, callous attitude manifested toward United States personnel missing in action and the inhumane treatment of U.S. prisoners detained in Southeast Asia."

The letter noted that the signers differ over U.S. policy in Southeast Asia but that they are of "one mind and one voice" on insisting that U.S. prisoners be treated in accord with "universal humanitarian principles."

'We Got Him'

Wage Chiseling Put At a Billion Dollars

One billion dollars in illegal wage underpayments have been uncovered by Labor Dept. investigators since the Fair Labor Standards Act became law 32 years ago, Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran announced.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research called the violations exposed by the Wage & Hour Division a "disgrace," but noted that as shocking as the billion-dollar figure is, it fails to tell the whole story.

The department said only about a third of the money found to have been illegally withheld from workers is ever recovered. It pointed out, too, that the full extent of violations is unknown since the wage-hour investigators rarely visit more than a small percentage of business places in any one year and must rely largely on complaints.

The federation's Dept. of Research charged that the law is not adequately enforced and compliance officers are too few.

Moran's announcement said the billion-dollar figure covers underpayments from the minimum wage, overtime, age discrimination and equal-pay-for-women provisions of federal laws for whose supervision his division is responsible.

The number of employes found to be underpaid each year has been steadily increasing since 1966, Moran noted.

The figure "has almost reached the level found in the early '40s, immediately after passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act, when the oppressive employment practices which had inspired the law a few years earlier were first beginning to be corrected," he said.

Moran said in his release that the billion-dollar figure is "well over three times the entire operating budget of the Wage & Hour Division since its inception in 1938" and "makes him both proud and dismayed."

He wrote: "While it is gratifying to know that wage-and-hour investigators have more than justified their existence as protectors of the American wage-earner, it is disheartening to note the large and increasing number of working people who have not been paid their rightful wages under federal law."

The law violations totaled by the administrator occurred under the minimum wage, overtime and equal pay sections of the Fair Labor Standards Act—the wage-hour law itself; the Public Contracts Act, and the equal pay law prohibiting discrimination against women workers as compared with men.

A year ago Moran's division reported that employers were violating the wage-hour laws at a higher rate than ever before. From July 1, 1968, through June 30, 1969, a record total of 477,434 workers were illegally underpaid by $89 million, it revealed.

This year the division reported a sharp increase in wages withheld from handicapped workers by so-called "sheltered workshops." Moran put the illegal wage withholding in this category alone at $336,000 below the amounts actually due some 2,000 workshop clients.

Sheltered workshop certificates permit employers to pay certain handicapped workers a minimum wage below that set by the FLSA.

The increase in underpayments by such shops follows a pattern of rising violations of federal wage-hour laws generally.

Last year the AFL-CIO urged the Labor Dept. to increase its investigative staff by at least one third. And last August, Federation Pres. George Meany called on all state and city central labor bodies to set up their own committees to help assure the "effective enforcement of minimum wage laws."

Veto Threat Poses Battle On Trade Bill

A battle on trade legislation was shaping up between the White House and Congress as Pres. Nixon threatened to veto any bill containing mandatory quotas on imports except for textiles.

Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.), ranking GOP member of the House Ways & Means Committee which is in the process of putting the final touches on trade legislation, said he thinks the President was taking an early and hard bargaining position to ward off further quotas on other products.

The committee has tentatively approved a bill calling for import quotas on textiles and shoes and setting up machinery for other quotas to be set if the Tariff Commission and the President find serious threats to American jobs and business.

Nixon told a press conference, in reply to a query on the committee's actions, that import quotas, except for textiles, would set off a trade war and that more jobs would be lost than are being lost now.

"In the case of textiles," he said, "for 16 months we have been attempting to negotiate a voluntary quota agreement with Japan without success, and also with other nations. In view of the lack of success and in view of the enormous importance of the textile industry to this country, the fact that one out of eight workers in manufacturing is in textiles, we feel that for the Congress to pass a limited bill dealing with textiles only and providing that mandatory quotas will come into effect and will remain in effect only if voluntary quotas are not negotiated, we believe that approach is acceptable."

Rising Unemployment Predicted Despite Some Upturn in Econony

was a need now for a more rapid expansion of money and credit. But both men appeared to reject stimulation of the economy through increased government spending or tax policy. Both opposed sizable deficits in the federal budget.

A number of economists, including Administration spokesmen, had predicted earlier this year that unemployment would continue to rise. In June there were 4.7 million persons unemployed; for the first six months of 1970 there were an average of 3.7 million jobless.

The apparent basis for the optimistic economic forecasts outside the area of unemployment were a series of reports which showed:

- Indications that the continuing downward slide of the economy was slowed or stopped in the second quarter of the year when the gross national product—the total value of all goods and services produced—stabilized in real dollars after correction for price increases. In the previous six months the "real" GNP had dropped by $7 billion.
- The price index for the GNP, a measurement of the rate of inflation, increased 4.2 percent in the second quarter compared with 6.4 percent in the first three months of the year.
- Income rose in the second quarter because of an increase in social security benefits and a government pay raise, and consumers were saving at a high rate.
- Housing starts showed an increase in June over May, a reversal of steady downtrends in the depressed housing industry.

In contrast, the Federal Reserve Board reported that industrial production fell in June for the third straight monthly decline and the ninth drop in the past 11 months. The index last month was at its lowest point in 19 months.

Administration officials indicated that they expect the real GNP to grow in the third and fourth quarters of the year, though not rapidly. But they conceded, according to a story in the New York Times, "that this anticipated course of the economy would mean no improvement and possibly some worsening of the unemployment picture as the year goes on. The present expectation is that unemployment will hover in the region of 5 percent of the labor force for the rest of the year, moving above that level in some months."

Other economists appearing before the Joint Economic Committee called for an expansionist economic policy. Among them was Walter W. Heller, former chairman of the CEA. He said that "inflation is at last on the wane" and that "it is now time to move from a policy of less restriction to a positive policy for expansion" to avert more serious unemployment.

crease, nevertheless put all items on the index 6 percent above June a year ago.

Charges for consumer services last month rose six-tenths of one percent with the price of medical care, transportation and other services up substantially and by more than the May increase.

Food prices declined on a seasonally adjusted basis in June for the first time in two years, with meat prices down instead of showing their usual June increase.

Used car prices rose for the third consecutive month and house prices also continued their climb, BLS said.

Farm Union Signs 26 More Growers

Delano, Calif.—The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, just weeks short of its fifth anniversary, crossed the threshold to complete unionization of California's vast grape fields.

Twenty-six growers of this hub of the San Joaquin Valley, including the giant Giumarra vineyard, signed three-year contracts with the union to bring social justice to thousands of field hands.

The grower group represents about 50 percent of the state's table grape crop. Their agreements place the union within 30 percent of blanket coverage of California grape workers. Previously, growers with control of about one-quarter of the state's table grape production had signed.

Contracts with the 26 growers will cover nearly 8,000 workers at peak harvest time of grapes and other crops including wheat, tomatoes, cotton, lettuce and tree fruit, such as peaches.

The remaining unsigned growers are mostly in the Fresno area and UFWOC is pressing its efforts to bring them to agreement.

Meanwhile, the boycott that spelled the difference in bringing the pivotal Delano growers to terms, will continue against grapes produced by the holdout vineyards.

"The fruits of dignified labor remain ever sweet," said Bishop Joseph F. Donnelly of Hartford, Conn., chairman of the Catholic bishops' committee on farm labor.

"This is the beginning of a new day," declared UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, who has led the field workers throughout their long struggle

House Acts To Abolish Teller Votes

The House of Representatives took a step which organized labor had called "long overdue" as it voted to abolish "teller" votes, the system through which congressmen could avoid a recorded vote.

The abolition of teller votes came as part of a reform package that included more than 100 provisions. It is scheduled to take effect when the 92nd Congress convenes next January.

However, after action on the individual provisions, the House will still have to pass the total bill. Senate confirmation is also necessary since parts of the bill affect relations with the Senate.

Final House action on the bill was delayed by the funeral of Rep. Michael Kirwan (D-Ohio) and this raised some concern that a final vote might not come until after the

IUD Rally Presses Action on Job Safety

Trade unionists from all sections of the country poured into Washington on a barnstorming tour of congressmen's offices asking for the right to have a safe and healthy place to work.

The program was part of a two-day briefing session by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., on the fight for passage of a strong occupational safety and health bill.

The 750 union delegates to the conference came from 34 states, 39 international unions and six AFL-CIO state bodies.

Their immediate effort centered on raising enough congressional support to dislodge the bill from the House Rules Committee, where it has been bottled up since the House Labor Committee approved the measure in June.

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), would give the Secretary of Labor authority to set job safety and health standards with strong powers to enforce them.

Opponents of the measure favor a substantially weaker substitute. Besides the Administration, the opposition includes the Chamber of Commerce, most House Republicans and the National Association of Manufacturers.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller reminded the delegates of the extreme tactics being used by opponents to defeat the Daniels measure.

"Probably more lies have been told about this bill than about any

Meany Calls For Wider Protection

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to take a "no nonsense" approach to the problem of eliminating poverty among the working poor by widening protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act and providing a minimum wage of $2 an hour "at the very least."

Millions of working Americans are "slipping backwards" as the "sorriest victims of inflation," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a House Labor subcommittee in calling for modernization of the wage-hour law.

"It is time to realize that if we want to get rid of the bulk of poverty, the way to do it is to get rid of sub-standard wages," Meany testified.

Summarizing "the kind of Fair Labor Standards legislation we need," he stressed these points:

"We need protection for the 17 million workers not now covered by the act.

"We need to increase the minimum wage to $2 an hour—at the very least.

"We need double-time pay for overtime work.

"We need premium pay for overtime in excess of eight hours a day.

"We need to shorten the work week or the work year."

Fair labor standards have little effect on the great majority of organized workers, Meany noted, since unions generally have been able to establish substantially higher standards than those called for by wage-hour laws.

"But there are millions of low-wage workers who need the pro-

U.S. Contract Ban Asked On Labor Law Violators

A blue-ribbon presidential commission has urged the Defense Dept. to support a policy that would allow contracts to be withheld "from companies that have been determined by appropriate authority to have flagrantly, deliberately, and repeatedly violated expressed national labor policy."

The recommendation was one of 113 made by the commission, which was set up by Pres. Nixon in July 1969 to examine the country's defense structure and recommend any needed changes. It urged also that the Defense Dept. "should not use its contracting powers to help or hurt any party involved in a union representation question, a collective bargaining agreement, or an inter-union dispute."

The commission, headed by Gilbert W. Fitzhugh, board chairman of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland.

In its discussion of industrial relations, the report noted that the department "must also do its part to maintain good relations with unions, whether they represent their own employes, employes of their contractors, or other employes whose cooperation is essential to the operations of the department—such as transportation and construction workers."

Administration Policies Turn Surplus Into Deficit

The Administration's economic policies have converted its own estimates of a $1.5 billion budget surplus six months ago into a $2.9 billion deficit for the fiscal year ended June 30.

George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management & Budget, in announcing the deficit at San Clemente, the western White House, acknowledged that the drop in tax revenues that caused the deficit indicated that the economic recession had been stronger than anticipated.

The deficit resulted from a $5.4 billion drop in corporate and individual income tax revenues from the Administration's earlier estimates. This was offset in part by the Administration's anti-spending policies which held expenditures $1.1 billion below February 1970 predictions.

IATSE Steps Up Drive To Aid Domestic Films

Cincinnati—The 50th anniversary convention of the Theatrical Stage Employes voted unanimously to give IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh a free hand in the campaign to bring runaway film production back to American studios.

The action followed a resolutions committee recommendation based on Walsh's report that the continuing drop in motion picture production in this country has plunged employment in Hollywood and other film centers to a record low.

Walsh was empowered to spend whatever funds are needed in IATSE's long-standing effort to encourage more domestic production of movie and television films.

The money will come from the union's general fund, without added assessment or taxation of members, the convention's more than 1,000 delegates agreed. The expenditure will be in addition to the $100,000 voted to launch the campaign two years ago.

Walsh reported severe distress among Hollywood craftsmen who once produced most of America's movies. He said some workers are in danger of losing their pension, health and welfare benefits along with their homes.

For many, unemployment insurance has expired or is close to expiration, and the jobs of thousands are threatened by the industry's rush to make movies abroad at reduced cost and ship them here for showing at high prices.

In the final days of the week-long convention, Walsh was returned to office for a two-year term. He won, 655-423, from Business Rep. Steve D'Inzillo of Local 306, New York City.

Without a dissenting vote, delegates approved a boycott of products sponsored by General Mills and other television sponsors who use animated films made abroad for use in this country and Canada.

A resolution introduced by Cartoonists Local 839 reported that more than 30 percent of Hollywood animation artists have lost their jobs because of this practice.

Also named in the resolution was a Rankin-Bass television series produced in Japan. Called Tom Foolery, it will be broadcast this fall Saturdays at 9 a.m. over NBC stations, the union said. Similarly disapproved was "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town," an animated TV special made in Japan for Rankin-Bass and 20th Century Fox.

Major convention speeches were made by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Jack Valenti of the Motion Picture Association of America.

Valenti, reporting on a recent pact between IATSE and producers to make more films in this country, said that as of July 16, nearly two dozen films have gone into production under the new agreement. Six of the films were "taken off the shelves" and four others were redirected from overseas, Valenti said.

Glass Workers Certified for Aid

The Labor Dept. has certified about 180 workers at a Jeannette, Pa., glass plant eligible for adjustment assistance because of the impact of imports on their jobs.

The affected workers are represented by the Glass & Ceramic Workers and the Glass Cutters. They were employed by the American St. Gobain Corp., which stopped producing heavy sheet glass at the plant last year but continues to turn out sheet glass for windows.

The adjustment assistance provisions are a part of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

Workers will be eligible for payments of 65 percent of average weekly wages with an $85-a-week maximum. Payments are limited to 52 weeks, but an additional 26 weeks may be allowed so workers can complete training courses for other jobs.

Last May, 150 glass workers at the company's sister plant in Arnold, Pa., were certified eligible for adjustment assistance because of imports.

3-Year Pact Negotiated for Ballet Troupe

New York—A new contract with raises up to 61 percent for dancers, stage managers and choreographers of the American Ballet Theater was "dictated by conscience, if not by necessity," the employer told newsmen after agreement was reached.

Principal features of the three-year contract were agreed to in advance of the Aug. 31 expiration date of the old agreement to allow time for a ratification vote. The 70-member company left for London and a European tour after authorizing Associate Executive Sec. Deloyd Tibbs of the Musical Artists to sign the completed draft.

The union is an affiliate of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America.

Pres. Sherwin M. Goldman of the Ballet Theater Foundation said that while he is not sure where the raises are coming from, "we can no longer allow the artists responsible for the excellence of the American dance to continue subsidizing that excellence with their own sweat and blood."

The settlement provides that a first-year ballet corps member will go from $6,450 to $7,936 this year, $8,478 next year and $8,660 in the final year—an overall raise of $2,210.

The minimum annual salary for principal dancers will be increased from $7,950 to $12,800 over the contract term.

The contract gives dancers the right to blacklist theaters whose poor facilities have caused substantial injury. Other provisions include a guarantee of 36 weeks of employment a year; a five-day rehearsal week on a trial basis, extended health insurance and disability coverage.

The theater is scheduled to be the resident company at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, now under construction in Washington, D.C.

$2 Minimum Wage Called Vital to Poor

tection provided in this act and who need a higher minimum wage," he emphasized.

"It is on behalf of these workers that we urge modernization of the Act."

Meany, who was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger gave Subcommittee Chairman John H. Dent (D-Pa.) an appendix of supporting arguments and data on labor's position backing the wage-hour amendments introduced in the House by Dent May 13.

Meany said the wage-hour-law amendments are among the most important legislative proposals before Congress.

He noted that when the current $1.60 minimum was adopted in 1966, it was barely enough to provide an income above the government-defined poverty level.

The nation was engaged in an all-out war on poverty at that time, and it was recognized that an increase in wages for millions of Americans working at substandard wage levels "was one immediate and effective way to help win that war."

Since that time, "some progress has been made," Meany observed. "Many workers at the low end of the income ladder were moved a step or two above the poverty level. And we in the AFL-CIO were proud to have fully and forcefully helped make that possible."

But today's inflated prices have dropped millions of Americans "down again to the lowest rungs. And millions more never moved out of poverty," Meany pointed out.

Inflation hits the working poor harder than anyone else, he said, and today's minimum wage of $1.60 is just a few cents more, in terms of purchasing power, than $1.25 was in 1966.

Meany called it "shocking" for the United States to be heading into the last third of the 20th Century in this condition. The existence of so many working poor "is both an American tragedy and an American disgrace," he said.

"These people work hard at useful jobs, struggle to maintain their economic independence and self-dignity, and attempt to achieve self-reliance against overwhelming odds.

"Yet they are paid less than a subsistence wage."

The labor movement does not believe that any employed worker should be forced to go on the welfare rolls to survive, said Meany.

"It has been clear for a long time," he continued, "that the simplest, most direct and least expensive way to eliminate poverty is to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act so that it is adequate to the times. That is what we urge Congress to do."

Turning to the inadequacy of the present $1.60 minimum, Meany pointed out that a worker employed at that rate earns only $3,200 a year, "if he has a full-time, year-around job. Even $2 an hour is barely above the government-defined poverty level for families with two children."

And, he stressed, a $2 minimum wage is by no means an adequate wage, but a floor—a "good and necessary floor that will benefit the entire economy by building purchasing power, eliminating some welfare costs and eradicating the blight of poverty from one big section of struggling America."

As to coverage, Meany emphasized that the labor movement wants the 17 million workers now excluded to be brought under the Act.

"These workers have been excluded too long," he stressed. "There never was any real justification for their exclusion, and there is real justification for their inclusion."

Among the 17 million are employes of state and local governments, largely still unprotected; millions more in retail trade; domestic workers and others.

"Then, too, there are the farm workers," Meany noted. "About half of them get a minimum wage, but the ceiling never gets up to $1.60 an hour. There is no reason for this difference. It is a clear case of double discrimination."

All that the farm and migratory workers want, Meany said, "is to become economically self-reliant, and to be treated like workers in all the other industries of America."

"They are no less human. Their basic necessities of life are no less or different. They are no less immune from pocket-robbing inflation. And, like the other uncovered working poor, they look to Congress for a floor under their wages —the same floor given other workers."

"It is time," Meany said, "for all farm workers to come under the full protection of the . . . act, just like the other covered workers."

Meany also stressed the need for double-time pay for overtime work, overtime and premium pay for work in excess of eight hours a day as well as 40 hours a week. Both provisions, he said, would encourage employers to hire additional workers instead of scheduling overtime for regular workers.

On the subject of enforcement, Meany cited the Labor Dept.'s recent report that illegal wage underpayments since the wage-hour law was enacted have passed the $1 billion mark. Declaring that even the billion-dollar figure fails to tell the whole story, Meany charged that the law is "inadequately enforced" by too few compliance officers and investigators. Full enforcement of the law, he emphasized, is "the only answer to chiselers."

Meany concluded his testimony with this observation:

"The whole history of the Fair Labor Standards Act proves that it works and that it adds to the economic well-being of the country. Every Secretary of Labor, no matter what his party ties, has made reports to the Congress on FLSA's impact. Universally these reports prove that FLSA works for the workers, for the economy, for the country.

"The Declaration of Policy in the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is as valid today as it was in 1938, says the United States must, as rapidly as practicable, eliminate labor conditions 'detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers.'

"What we are saying, is that the job of translating this policy into fact requires constant change, constant modernization. Each of the previous amendments has been designed to that end. In 1970, we have new problems requiring new legislation to make the goal of this law a reality.

"So we urge these amendments, and we urge that they be made promptly. Every day of delay penalizes millions of American families who should not be asked to suffer an additional, unnecessary hour."

for union bargaining rights.

"We too are happy and I suppose overjoyed at the peace that will come to this valley," said John Giumarra, Jr., whose family owns the biggest table grape vineyard in the world, employing 2,000 workers at peak harvest.

"The 14 million members of the AFL-CIO—bakers, plumbers, steelworkers, carpenters—all of them are here in spirit," said AFL-CIO Dir. William Kircher, who had been at UFWOC's side during its fledgling years and has aided its strike, boycott, organizing and bargaining activities.

"We were once called outside agitators and Communists, but we ignored the slurs and waged the struggle," commented UFWOC Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong, who was chiefly responsible for unifying efforts of Mexican-American and Filipino field workers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who spoke by telephone with Kircher just prior to the signing at a news conference covered by dozens of newsmen from the press and television, sent his "sincere congratulations" and added, "the farm workers have proved their ability to successfully organize and build a union in agriculture."

Terms of the new contracts are much the same as the previous ones except that they call for a $1.80 minimum hourly wage plus 20 cents per lug box (22 pounds) of grapes picked. Original agreements were for $1.75 hourly and 25 cents a box.

The hourly rate in the new contracts will increase to $1.95 next year and $2.05 in 1972. Previously the growers claimed they were paying $1.65 an hour and 15 cents a box. There were no fringe benefits.

Also the same in the latest contracts is the employer contribution of 10 cents an hour per worker toward health and welfare and 2 cents an hour for an economic development fund, ban on "hard" pesticides, successor, hiring hall and no-strike clauses during the life of the contract.

Singing, cheering, speeches and handshakes marked announcement of the new agreements in the jammed hiring hall of UFWOC headquarters, steamed by the 100-plus degree temperature.

The news conference to announce the new contracts drew hundreds of farm workers and their families, many volunteers who have embraced their cause, and two busloads of boycott workers sent by the Los Angeles AFL-CIO to the forty-acre site of UFWOC headquarters. Their emotions erupted into spirited cheers of "Viva Chavez," "Viva La Raza" (the race), "Viva Boicoteros" (boycotters), "Viva Virgen de Guadalupe."

Augie Lira, a young farm worker, accompanied the overflow crowd on a guitar to the strains of the familiar songs of La Huelga (The Strike)—"Solidaridad Pa' Siempre" (Solidarity Forever), "We Shall Overcome," "De Colores" (Of the Colors).

The hall exploded with a cacophony of chants, applause and foot stomping when Chavez entered, leading the contingent of growers and other union and labor officials including John Henning, executive secretary of the California AFL-CIO.

Chavez, who ordinarily wears a plaid shirt and field jeans, was dressed in slacks and a formal white silk brocaded shirt on the collar of which was the fiery red button bearing the fierce eagle symbol of the union.

Growers and union officials, some coming face to face for the first time, sat at one long table.

John Giumarra, Jr., a Stanford law school graduate in his early 30s, was accompanied by his father, key to the Delano growers' collective agreement and signer for them when he and Chavez formalized the contract.

While the elder Giumarra sat at Chavez's side, his son spoke for the growers.

"I think we are starting a new relationship here today," he said.

"It's a relationship our business and your jobs depend upon, so we must learn to love and respect each other. What we anticipate is a new era in agriculture."

He said the pact will serve as a pattern for farm worker activities in the future and a test for the young union.

"If it works here, it can work anywhere. If it can't work here, it can't work anywhere. You can show to the people of the country that you did it well here and you can damn well do it there."

Chavez followed this up by noting that he had received requests from field worker groups "from all over the country and outside, including Canada, to come and represent them. We will not disappoint them."

Chavez, a firm advocate of nonviolence, said that in the face of violence throughout the world today "this event truly justifies that through non-violent action social justice can be gotten."

Mindful of the assistance from every facet of labor and other organizations and individuals given his union, he said, "we send our thanks to all the good people who have been with us nearly five years."

Adding to his statement that the boycott will continue until all the growers in the state have signed, he said:

"It is our hope that we can soon turn the boycott machinery all over the world into trying to make all the grapes sweet again."

He said of the day that it was one of "mutual understanding and total peace—a day we have all looked for and prayed for and we thank God for all these things and we thank you too."

Bishop Donnelly, whose committee has been instrumental in bringing together growers and union negotiators to hammer out more than 70 contracts since last Mar. 31, said that "this is really only a beginning."

"What is needed now is a thorough evaluation of the whole process of farm labor-management relations, spelling out the rights and duties of both sides.

"We need federal legislation offering protection for both sides, but especially the farm worker, who has little or no protection as of now."

Chavez said that the turning point of grower-union relations, which at no time until recent weeks were anything but bitterly strained, "was when the growers came to us."

That was July 17 at a quiet meeting in a Bakersfield hotel, some 30 miles from Delano. After four days the meetings recessed. Then on July 25 the Giumarras called for a meeting in a motel here, where Chavez, who suffers intense pain from a back ailment, was forced to lie on the bed while they discussed possible settlement.

Final successful talks were Monday night, July 27, at St. Mary's Catholic Church here.

Chavez left immediately after the signing for meetings in Fresno with growers yet unsigned.

Chavez Hits Teamsters On 'Back-Door' Pact

Delano, Calif.—A single cloud hung over the ceremonies at which the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee announced it had wrapped up agreements with all the major grape growers in the Delano area.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez took bitter note of a statement by the Council of California Growers only the day before, July 28, that five-year contracts with the Teamsters union had been approved by half the council's more than 60 members in the Salinas area, most of whom are lettuce growers.

Chavez, announcing plans to seek a court order voiding the Teamsters' contracts, bitterly denounced that union and accused it of violating a written pledge to honor UFWOC's organizational rights among farm workers.

"We will make it so miserable for those growers that they will have to do something," Chavez said.

"Neither the workers nor the union leadership will be turned from this task by the Pearl Harbor type of sneak attack which occurred when the Teamsters signed a back-door contract with the growers in this area," he said.

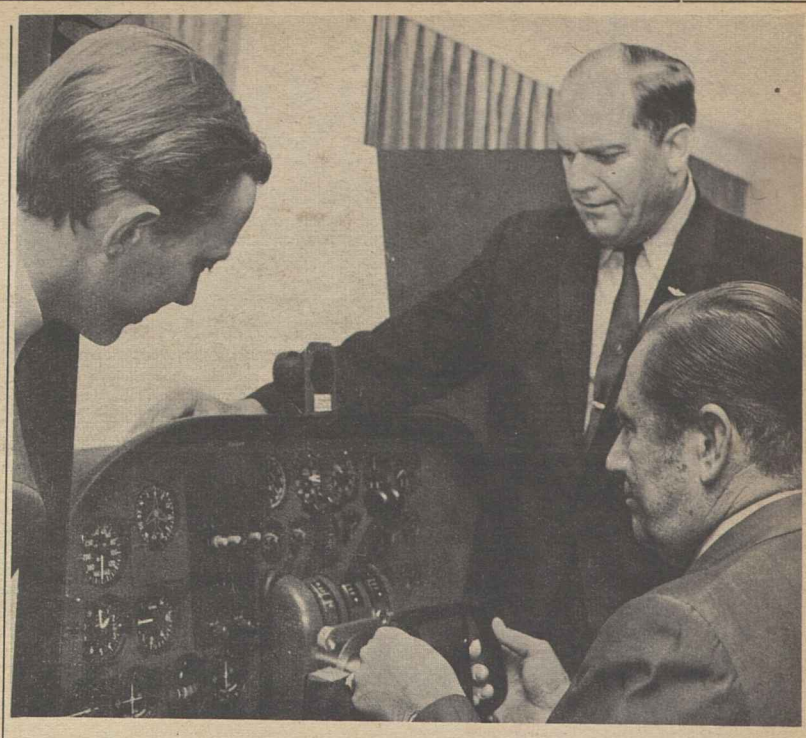
The announcement by the growers' council, which is composed largely of vegetable growers, said the group had "actively supported federal legislation which would provide ground rules for the organization of farm workers and we still endorse the program embraced in Sen. George Murphy's bill."



But, it added, the Teamsters union "has convinced us that we should negotiate an agreement now."

The Murphy bill has been vigorously opposed by organized labor on the ground that it would deny true union rights to farm workers and, among other things, outlaw strikes during harvest periods.

Chavez called the Council of California Growers "a long-time foe of our union."

Cleveland Leader Of Carpenters Dies

Cleveland, O.—Alex Brackenridge, a founder and executive board member of the Union Eye Care Center, died at 52 after a heart attack. He had been executive secretary of the Carpenters District Council since 1961, and a member of Local 105 for 25 years.

COCKPIT CONTROLS of an advanced pilot aid device, employing a television system for landings, are tried out by Sen. Howard W. Cannon (D-Nev.) at the safety forum of Air Line Pilots in San Francisco. Capt. B. Vic Hewes, left, chairman of the ALPA safety committee, and Philip Cooper, manufacturer's representative, give Cannon pointers on the operation of the controls. Cannon was one of the forum speakers.

Pilots Sound Warning On Airport Obstructions

San Francisco—The Air Line Pilots have warned that their members may soon refuse to service airports where hazardous obstructions pose a serious danger.

A resolution adopted by the ALPA National Safety Committee called for the union to "investigate the possibilities of modifying existing service at any airport in the nation where obstructions have been built which totally ignore the ALPA's established safety criteria."

Noting that tall buildings, television towers and other obstructions are being erected near airports, the ALPA expressed concern that the well-being of airline passengers is being sacrificed. Many of the obstructions are being allowed by officials of the Federal Aviation Administration because of political pressures in Washington, the union's statement declared.

Improvements also are needed in air traffic control facilities and airports, ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby, told the 500 representatives of ALPA pilots, stewards and stewardesses attending the union's annual safety forum.

Ruby said that commercial airlines will not be able to raise money to buy new and larger aircraft and necessary ground support facilities unless the nation's air traffic control system and airports are updated to handle the new airplanes efficiently. He noted that the ALPA has successfully supported the passage of an airport improvement measure in Congress that includes the certification of airports.

"The big job now is to obtain industry agreement on the certification rules and implement procedures to eliminate airport deficiencies," Ruby added.

The forum also urged Congress to approve financing for the development of a supersonic transport plane. It said in a resolution that the United States is in danger of losing its leadership in the development of aircraft because of the dominance of Anglo-French and Russian SST programs.

Four persons were honored by the ALPA for their contributions to air safety. They are Capt. Lee Hines of Atlanta, Capt. Amadeo Castro Almanza of Mexico, Stewardess Elizabeth Montgomery of Washington, D.C., and aviation writer Robert Sterling.

Hines, a regional vice president of ALPA, was cited for his efforts in promoting improved safety in airport design and operation.

Miss Montgomery was selected for her work on stewardess safety committees, accident investigation and aircraft evaluation committees.

Author Sterling was honored "for his selfless contributions in the interest of air safety through his books, articles and speeches . . . for the betterment of both passenger and crew safety."

Castro received a special award for his efforts to improve air safety facilities in Mexico to benefit pilots of all nations operating in that country.

The forum also covered a number of air safety topics, including the problem of birds on runways, the size of life rafts, the use of air cushion boats in marshy areas, airplane emergency door ejectors, and the role of the well-disciplined stewardess.

Six Bureaus Restructured In Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. is streamlining the structure and operation of six bureaus in a move designed to make enforcement of various labor standards more efficient.

The department has consolidated into one administration bureaus dealing with federal contract compliance laws, wage and hours enforcement, occupational health and safety, programs for women, wage determination for public construction, and federal employe compensation programs.

Assistant Sec. Arthur A. Fletcher, now head of the Wage & Labor Standards Administration, will head the new setup, the Labor Dept. reported.

Under the reorganization the various programs will have available the services of about 1,000 compliance officers and investigators now attached to the wage and hours administration.

Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson said that the new organization should be particularly effective in the field of occupational health and safety.

Midsummer 1970

AMERICA IS POISED between summer clearance sales and back-to-school promotions in an uneasy atmosphere marked by irritability, apathy and a sort of indefinable unpleasantness.

It's more than the summer dog days or the doldrums or the usual seasonal afflictions. It is a compound of the many problems the country faces at home and abroad and the loss of a sense of direction.

Some of this comes into focus in the preliminary reports of the 1970 census dealing with what's happened in terms of poverty, income, education in the past 10 years. The figures show tremendous gains and accomplishments, and yet the country seemingly finds little sense of gratification.

This stems partly from the minority of the young people and those in the intellectual and academic community and the entertainment world who brush aside the gains of a decade. This progress, they suggest contemptuously, merely reflects an obsession with materialism and denotes a form of corruption in society.

The analyses of campus unrest go on and on, coming up with the same profundities, the same rhetoric about the "system," the fascination with self-examination and guilt, the meaningless cant about revolution and the not-so-meaningless commitment to confrontation politics and possible violence.

But reporters and others who have been traveling the country find the unease, the irritability. They talk of films aimed at the younger audience which are keyed to the theme of a corrupt society. They talk of a growing disenchantment with higher education in its current state of disrepair, its lack of direction and concern for traditional academic standards and values.

And everywhere there is growing evidence that the reaction to the radicals, the alienated, the drug-oriented and those who screech and stomp on the values of a democracy is to move the country away from its historic spirit of tolerance, the sense of live-and-let-live that is fundamental to life in America.

THE HOSTILITY that marks midsummer 1970 is more than the clash of ideas or programs; it is a symptom of a developing conflict of values, a conflict over the very aims and directions of American society.

It all comes down, finally, to a question of the responsibility a person has to society. In America this has meant cooperation, help for those most in need of help, the brotherhood and fraternity that is the bonding cement of the trade union movement.

Taken collectively, this has formed a national commitment to eliminate discrimination in all its forms against all minority groups; to give real meaning to the national policy to wipe out poverty and need and hunger. It is our commitment as a people to peace and freedom for all peoples.

All this can be accomplished in a nation that understands that self-fulfillment and self-realization are the fruits of a primary commitment to the general welfare and well-being of all members of society.

Castro's Sugar Harvest Sours, But His Police State Succeeds

By John P. Roche

MOST AMERICANS probably don't think about Castro's Cuba once in three months, and then only because a hijacked plane hits the headlines. Those of us in the academy, however, are exposed to a good deal of noisy propaganda from a radical faction which has its papacy in Havana.

These radicals have a curious position on the radical spectrum—sort of halfway between Moscow and Peking. Their leading heavy thinker, the Frenchman, Regis Debray (who is in a Bolivian prison), sounds like a delirious Trotskyite. They may be easily identified by their perpetual novena to the late Che Guevara.

Six months ago the Castro regime began announcing that Cuba was about to leap into socialism by producing 10 million tons of sugar.

They invited all those interested in such an accomplishment to come to Cuba as guests of the regime and join the masses in cutting sugar. A number of young Americans made this revolutionary scene, though the indications are that they spent their time singing revolutionary songs rather than in proletarian toil.

While the American troubadours played their guitars, just about every Cuban who could talk was drafted to work in the cane fields. The result, however, was still a shortfall of 1.5 million tons.

Castro, bitterly disappointed, announced that the Cuban people still had not developed the necessary spiritual commitment to work. He fired the Minister of Education and replaced him with an army major, who plans to eliminate bourgeois tendencies from the young. The American students, needless to say, returned home to their bourgeois sanctuaries.

This highlights what has been happening in Cuba for a decade. Castro's regime may call itself "communist," but it is a highly efficient dictatorship in the personalist tradition of Latin fascism.

True, Castro has announced his allegiance to the "socialist camp." But this is another way of saying he found a rich uncle who would protect him from the Americans. If the Russians were Buddhists, Castro would be wearing a saffron robe.

Castro and his entourage would certainly flunk any examination in Marxism-Leninism, and their wild talk of "spontaneity" must occasionally give the Soviets nightmares.

However, they have done one thing—they have established the most efficient police state ever seen in the Western Hemisphere. Cuban friends, democratic socialists who fought against the Batista regime and survived rather well, tell me that today their position is hopeless. The East Germans, who specialize in this sort of thing, have helped Castro develop a savagely effective secret police. Batista's random brutality has been replaced by efficient elimination.

THE ONE BRIGHT SPOT is that in a moment of romantic whimsy Castro announced that he would permit Cubans who didn't like the regime to leave. The consequence of this "love it or leave it" policy has been an American-financed refugee program which has brought 3,500 Cubans to the United States every month for the last four years. There are at least another 100,000 Cubans who are waiting, exit visas in hand, for transportation to the United States.

Now the whole program—which has cost $120 million a year, including resettlement, job training, etc.—is in jeopardy. When the appropriation for this program came up in the House recently, it won narrow, only tentative approval. And a number of congressmen are out to scrap it, ostensibly on the ground that the funds should be used for poverty-stricken Americans here at home.

This is an ignoble position. Of course, we should spend money on poor Americans, but not at the expense of other human beings who are trying to escape from a police state. The immense difference between living in poverty in the United States and living under the guns of a totalitarian caudillo should need no elaboration. When the sum involved is so trivial it somehow seems shameful that one has to argue the case.

Deceptive Magazine Sales:

Brazen Subscription Pushers Undaunted by FTC Charges

By Sidney Margolius

EVEN AFTER the Federal Trade Commission recently charged Life magazine's subscription subsidiary with using "deceptive" methods, the company continued merrily on its way kidding the public.

Just a few days after the FTC announced its charges, and just as though there were no FTC, my phone rang and a woman said, "Your phone number has been selected from a revolving drum to get free subscriptions to three magazines."

Since we do have a particularly lucky phone number (a few weeks ago it won a free sewing machine if we paid for the carrying case), I took the news calmly. The woman on the phone explained that if I would just subscribe to Life magazine at 49 cents a week, they would give me free subscriptions to Sports Afield, Esquire and McCall's.

Now 49 cents a week comes to $25.48 a year. Since one of the mail-order magazine agencies offers Life at $5.72 a year; Esquire at $3.87, and McCall's at $3.95 for two years, I would have had to pay almost twice as much because my phone number was pulled out of a drum. Some luck.

The woman calling was from Family Publications Service Inc., subsidiary of Time, Inc. which also publishes Life. What is especially ludicrous was a recent public announcement by Time magazine that it was not involved in the FTC complaint. Henry Luce III, the publisher, carefully explained that the FTC action was not against Time but involved Family Publications Service, a Time, Inc. subsidiary. Now you see it, now you don't.

Some other big magazine companies also were charged by the FTC. They include:

- Cowles Communications, Inc., and five subsidiaries (Civil Reading Club, Educational Book Club, Home Reader Service, Mutual Readers League, and Home Reference Library).
- Hearst Corp., and its subsidiary, Periodical Publishers Service Bureau, and a franchise, International Magazine Service.
- Perfect Film & Chemical Corp. (related to the Curtis organization) and the subsidiary Perfect Subscription Co. and Keystone Readers' Service.

For some years now there has been an upsurge in hard-selling of magazine subscriptions. In fact, the Akron Better Business Bureau recently listed "magazine and book sales" as one of the top 10 problem areas along with such notorious sources of complaint as home building, remodeling and furnaces, insurance, new and used cars and trailers, auto repairs and accessories, appliance sales and service, correspondence and vocational schools, employment advertising, and business opportunities and investment.

The lucky phone number approach is of course a widely-used device. In fact, as the saleswoman talked to me, I could hear other voices in the background telling people that their numbers had been pulled out of a drum. The objective of the phone call is to get you to make an appointment with a salesman.

In some cases on record, salesmen have been known to tell prospects they have "won" the subscriptions and just have to pay "a small handling charge."

One of the problems is that the salesmen stress what seems like a low price by the week, and tell you that you will get an envelope each month so you can pay while getting the magazines. ("If you don't get the envelope you don't have to pay," the saleswoman emphasized several times.)

BUT AS OTHER investigations have shown, you will get a coupon book and the monthly amount may be higher than you expect. The subscription company will accelerate your payments so you pay up ahead of time. Often, they try to get you to sign up for five years.

Moreover, as we have seen, you pay much more than if you bought the same magazines from one of the cut-rate mail order subscription companies.

If you realize you've been gulled and stop paying, you can be subjected to some harsh collection procedures, such as garnishment, and harassment at home and on the job by phone calls. Collectors even sometimes use such names as Tufson, Hardheart or Striker to further intimidate the consumer, reports Thomas Jacobson, who worked with the Wisconsin Attorney General's office on subscription problems.

Sometimes magazine companies tell buyers their subscriptions can be canceled within 72 hours. But Jacobson reported receiving complaints from buyers that the salesman had backdated the contract one week from the date signed.

The magazine industry maintains an organization which is supposed to help buyers who feel they have been deceived. This is the Central Registry of Magazine Solicitors, 575 Lexington Ave., New York, N.Y., 10022. But they'll help you only if you cancel within 72 hours of signing. They will tell you (as they told me) that first you have to write within 72 hours to the subscription company to cancel. If they refuse, then you can appeal to the Central Registry to intercede.

While the mail order subscription companies are cheaper, don't be overly impressed by their "contests." From our study, it is obvious that all the coupons sent out have a "lucky number" and so everyone "qualifies" for the drawing. The drawings of prize winners are legitimate enough, and the prizes are really awarded. But the number of prizes is a small percentage of the huge advertising mailings of these companies.

Cure Seen in National Health Bill:

White House Offers Little Help In Easing Health Care Crisis

CALLING FOR PASSAGE of a national health insurance law, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair noted that Pres. Nixon had acknowledged the nation's health care crisis a year ago, but that he had done little to solve it.

The "most significant" step taken to meet the crisis, Fair said, came when Congress overrode the presidential veto of the improved and expanded Hill-Burton Act. Fair said the new Hill-Burton law paves the way for "construction of the kind of facilities needed to make a better health care delivery system."

The quality of U.S. health care compares favorably with other nations, "provided you can get the care," he observed as he was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference.

National health insurance is a key to meeting the health care crisis, Fair said, and the labor movement has made it a "high priority" legislative goal. He declined to speculate when national health insurance will become law, but said it won't take as long as Medicare, which was introduced in 1957 and became law in 1965.

"People are aware" of the rapid rise of medical costs and the difficulty of obtaining care, and they recognize "the need for change," he said. The national health insurance bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) is closest to what the AFL-CIO believes is necessary for an effective solution, he said.

But, he added, "the prospectus" for the national health insurance proposal expected to be offered by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) on behalf of the Committee of One Hundred, also "has some strong points."

"There are no philosophical . . . or basic differences between the proposals," he said, pointing out that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock have met on the issue and agreed to work together on Capitol Hill for passage of a comprehensive national health insurance program.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AT LATEST COUNT there were 4.7 million Americans out of work. On top of this have come disturbing predictions by top officials in the Nixon Administration that as many as 2 million more workers will be affected over the next year because of the curtailment of defense contracts.

Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson has told the Joint Economic Committee that shifts in defense planning have returned 300,000 men in the armed forces to civilian life, that in the critical defense industries ordnance, aircraft, shipbuilding and communications equipment, some 260,000 jobs already have been eliminated and that in the economy as a whole there has been an additional loss of 400,000 jobs in defense-related industries.

"This decline is expected to continue at roughly the same rate during the forthcoming year as we continue to shift priorities," Hodgson said.

In the face of these revelations, what have we done, as a nation, to prepare for what is clearly going to be a disaster for thousands of workers as we shift from defense to civilian production?

The answer is very little.

The Administration has stressed two legislative steps that it feels ought to be taken: improvement in the unemployment compensation system that would add some 4 million workers to the program and extend the period of benefit eligibility plus strengthen manpower training programs. In addition, it would take a number of administrative actions to help workers find new jobs that presumably will exist.

Congress has moved on the unemployment compensation legislation, but the measure has been stalled over efforts to extend benefits to farm workers who need such protection desperately.

Extension of training programs leaves labor economists skeptical since they ask what good it is to train a man if there is no job for him when his training period has ended.

They feel that action will be needed on a far wider front than is now contemplated either by the Administration or by Congress.

The need for more vigorous action, in their view is highlighted by a number of important considerations that are not receiving enough attention.

- Hodgson mentioned the return of 300,000 military men to civilian life. If we are going to cut back on defense, many hundreds of thousands more will be thrown on the job market.
- The extent of employment impact of defense-related industry is larger than is generally understood—studies have shown that perhaps as much as 10 percent of employment is involved in defense work both in large and small employment centers.
- The task of reversing the current increase in unemployment is far greater than is generally realized.

LABOR ECONOMISTS suggest that the shift from a wartime to a peacetime economy will require far more energy and far wider programs than are now envisaged.

"Of paramount importance in effectuating a smooth transition from defense to civilian production is the existence of a prosperous, full employment economy," the AFL-CIO told Congress last December.

The opportunity is there. The nation has vast needs in the rebuilding of its cities, in providing and improving public facilities, in building desperately needed homes, in fighting pollution of its streams and land. In brief, there is a splendid chance to expand job opportunities while meeting social needs.

The late Auto Workers president, Walter P. Reuther, proposed to Congress a plan to "enlist the profit motive in the service of smooth conversion from defense to civilian production."

Basically the plan sought to prevent or minimize layoffs or alternatively to provide benefits for laid-off workers caught in a job cut.

What is apparent is that while the Administration and Congress are becoming more and more aware of the problem of reconversion, their proposals thus far are essentially routine and do not reflect the spirit or urgency that is needed.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE is needed to meet the health care crisis—which Pres. Nixon has acknowledged, but has done little about, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair declared on Labor News Conference. Fair was interviewed by Jerome Brazda, left, of Washington Report on Medicine & Health and Tom Joyce, right, of Newsweek magazine.

JOB SAFETY & HEALTH BILL sponsor Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) describes key provisions of the proposal to 750 union representatives at the Industrial Union Dept. conference in Washington. The delegates made the rounds of Capitol Hill offices later to raise congressional support for the legislation.

Law Grants Antitrust Immunity To Joint Newspaper Operations

Pres. Nixon has signed into law a bill granting antitrust immunity to price fixing, profit pooling and market splitting by "competing" newspapers printed in common plants under "joint newspaper operating arrangements."

Final legislative action on the measure came when the Senate—with recorded dissent from but one member, Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.)—accepted and sent to the White House the version of the bill passed by the House 292 to 87.

The bill, labeled the Newspaper Preservation Act by its sponsors, is an amended version of the Failing Newspaper Act introduced in the 90th Congress in March 1967. The original bill would have granted antitrust exemptions to full newspaper mergers as well as the partial mergers exempted under the legislation enacted.

The AFL-CIO, the Newspaper Guild and the printing trades unions all had voiced strong opposition to the measure. They maintained that such broad, unregulated, perpetual and retroactive immunity from antitrust laws was neither necesary nor justifiable for the survival of newspapers faced with financial failure. Enforcement of antitrust laws, not relaxation, is the way to insure competition, labor argued.

The drive for the antitrust immunity was precipitated by the courts in ordering the two daily papers in Tucson, Ariz., to quit pooling profits and fixing circulation and advertising prices.

Union opponents of the bill noted the courts had specifically held that common printing and distribution facilities are not forbidden under law and that publishers themselves had in the past noted that these produced the greater economies under joint operations.

Opponents of the legislation also included the National Newspaper Association, a group composed primarily of publishers of weekly and small and medium circulation daily papers, the antitrust section and the board of governors of the American Bar Association, Sen. Hart's antitrust counterpart in the House, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Dept.

Richard W. McLaren, Justice Dept. antitrust chief, told Celler's committee last September that the bill would create a "government approved 'shared monopoly'" in each of the 22 cities presently with joint newspaper operations and in other cities in which they might be launched.

"I know of no instance where any such franchise has been awarded without the government in turn imposing administrative regulation of prices and profits for the public protection," he said. The new law contains no such regulation.

The legislation approves profit pooling, price fixing and market splitting by jointly operated newspapers if not more than one of the papers involved is "other than a failing newspaper."

The bill also does away with the obligation of seeking an outside buyer before entering a semi-merger with a competitor.

And it authorizes the Tucson papers to reinstitute their profit pooling and price fixing arrangements, despite earlier court orders to the contrary. It also provides for dismissal of civil treble damage suits filed under the antitrust laws against the Tucson publishers by the City of Tucson and other advertisers and by advertisers and former employes against San Francisco's two dailies.

While the Justice Dept. opposed the bill under both the Johnson and Nixon Administrations, the Commerce Dept. endorsed it two days after Richard E. Berlin, chairman of the Hearst Corp., met privately with Pres. Nixon at the White House last September.

Hearst was among the newspaper chains most actively lobbying for passage of the bill. Other proponents included the Scripps-Howard, Newhouse, Lee, Block and Cox newspaper chains, along with other publishers engaged in joint publishing and a few isolated newspaper union locals.

U.S. Contract Ban Asked On Labor Law Violators

Citing the large percentage of the government contracts that involve the Defense Dept., the report noted that the department's "actions and attitudes" have an important bearing on the relationships with labor" of the government as a whole. "If it wants the cooperation of labor—working people and their unions—as it must, it is necessary, in turn, for it to be sensitive to the atitudes of labor."

The commission said a number of cases were brought to its attention in which labor complained that the department was contracting "with employers who seemed to be deliberately thwarting national policies prescribed by Congress and the President."

While the report did not specify, one of the cases involved the awarding of Defense Dept. contracts to J. P. Stevens & Co., a major textile manufacturer, which has been found in violation of the nation's labor laws by the National Labor Relations Board on 11 different occasions in the past few years. Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, have upheld the NLRB in every case appealed by Stevens.

The AFL-CIO has called on the government and the Defense Dept. to adopt a policy of withholding award of contracts where there are findings of willful violation of the nation's labor statutes.

The language of the panel's recommendations in this area said:

"The Dept. of Defense, although not expected to act as enforcement agency of national labor laws, should support any appropriate action that would permit more flexibility in such matters, so that contracts could be withheld from companies that have been determined by appropriate authority to have flagrantly, deliberately, and repeatedly violated expressed national labor policy. At the same time, the department should not use its contracting powers to help or hurt any party involved in a union representation question, a collective bargaining agreement, or an inter-union dispute."

Another panel recommendation said that a department objective in determining wage rates for its own employes "should be to have its rates fair and competitive with the wage rates of private employers for employes of comparable skills."

It recommended also that the Secretary of Defense should appoint a widely representative general advisory committee to advise him on matters concerning the "internal management of the department," including labor relations, and that the committee serve as a vehicle to bring problems to the Secretary's attention by interested parties outside the department.

Backs Daniels Bill:

IUD Rally Presses Action on Job Safety

other issue" contemplated by Congress, Biemiller declared.

He displayed a Chamber of Commerce publication claiming that the "Daniels bill would allow strikes with pay." The article, he said, twisted the facts on the Daniels bill provision that calls for the five-day shutdown of a plant when workers are faced with imminent danger.

Biemiller called the Daniels bill the most important piece of legislation in the current Congress dealing with the welfare of workers.

The object of labor's drive is to get the bill out of the Rules Committee and on the floor before the House breaks for a three-week recess starting Aug. 14.

Daniels told the IUD rally he is hopeful of beating the Aug. 14 deadline, but warned that an all-out effort must be engineered by the bill's union supporters.

He described his bill as being strong, "but it is also fair and it is reasonable."

The Chamber of Commerce and NAM opposition, he charged, is based on the fact that employers will have to spend some money to improve working conditions.

Many employers, he declared are more concerned with profits than the safety of their workers, although 14,500 workers are killed annually by industrial accidents. Occupational accidents and illness every year disable another 2.5 million, injure nearly 7 million and cost the American economy almost $8 billion, he pointed out.

Rep. John P. Saylor (R.-Pa.), who is among a contingent of Republicans supporting the Daniels bill, declared that on-the-job safety has been compromised enough. He told the rally he will cooperate fully to work for its pasage.

Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, who presided as chairman of the IUD Occupational Health & Safety Committee, warned that opponents are using every means possible to kill the legislation.

He said the Daniels bill is needed to bring order to the hodge-podge of ineffective state laws covering health and safety standards on the job.

- Full authority for the Secretary of Labor to set occupational health and safety standards and to enforce the law with penalties against violators.
- The right of the Secretary of Labor to shut down a plant or industrial process for five days where there is an imminent danger to the workers.
- The right of employe representatives to accompany safety inspectors and receive copies of their reports.
- Development of health standards by the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare on various toxic materials used on the job.

Weaknesses in the substitute bill proposed by the Administration were described by IUD Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman and Jack Sheehan, legislative director of the Steelworkers. Although various versions of these proposals already have been voted down by the House Labor Committee, the Chamber of Commerce is continuing efforts to water down the Daniels bill through amendments.

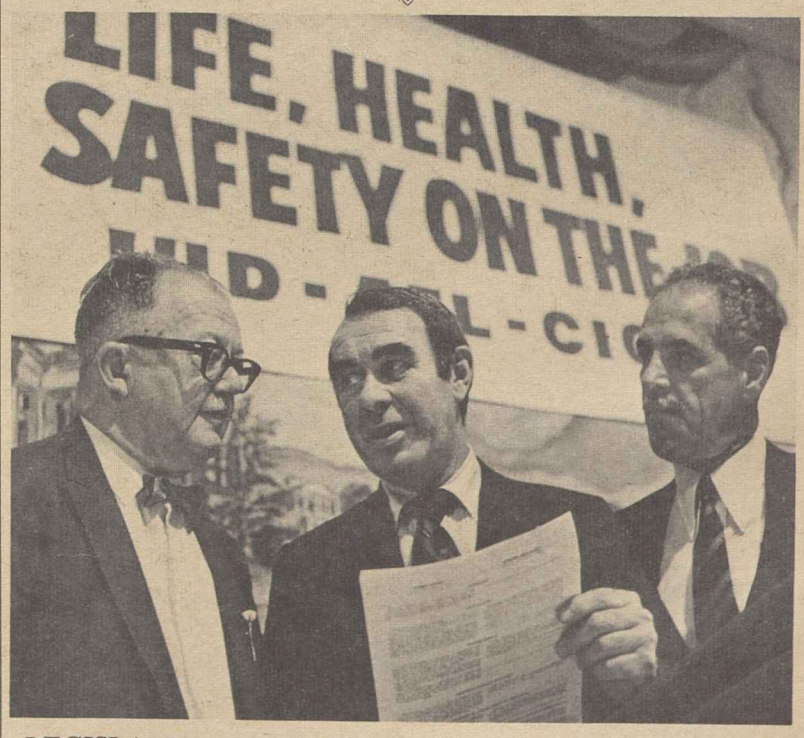
One of these proposals calls for the Labor Secretary to refer violations to a new Occupational Safety & Health Court that could make enforcement difficult and clumsy.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), who is sponsoring senate legislation similar to the Daniels bill, told the labor representatives that there is an urgent need for a federal law with "no-nonsense" investigations of working facilities.



He noted that Congress passed a coal mine safety law after a major disaster in West Virginia—which triggered intense public reaction.

But since industrial accidents are more commonplace, the public is less aware of the need for health and safety legislation, Williams observed. He called on trade unionists to exert special effort to educate the public on the issue.

Williams specifically cited the need for standards on dust control and noise, which he said cause extensive illness and disability of workers.

Veto Threat Hangs Over Money Bills

A bill calling for $4.4 billion in federal aid to education—almost a half-billion dollars more than the Administration requested—has been cleared by the Senate and sent to the President for signing.

But the fate of the bill, along with two other major appropriations measures, was uncertain in light of past presidential veto threats.

The other two measures are:

- An $18.8 billion conference committee package for the Depts. of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare, which has been approved by the House and sent to the Senate.
- An $18.1 billion independent agencies appropriation on which House and Senate differences have been reconciled in conference committee with final passage by each chamber yet to come.

Each of the three bills is over the amount requested by the Administration—the education bill by $453 million, Labor-HEW by $93 million and the independent agencies by $541 million.

Repeated threats from Pres. Nixon to veto money bills he considers "irresponsible" have brought reaffirmations from Congress, especially from Democrats, that vital domestic programs must not be starved in the name of "fiscal responsibility."

Congress is almost a month behind on fiscal 1971 appropriations and the crush of bills will serve to save the education funds.

When the $18.8 billion for independent agencies, which includes $3.6 billion for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, was approved by conferees, Senate Minority Leader Hugh Scott (R-Pa.) predicted the measure was "in danger of being vetoed."

With the possibility of that measure being selected for veto, another Republican, Norris Cotton of New Hampshire, said he was "hopeful the President will go along with us" on the education bill, which was worked out in an appropriations subcommittee on which Cotton is the ranking GOP member.

However, the federal-aid-to-education bill which was sent to the White House includes many mandatory spending provisions. The Administration is not required to spend all of the money appropriated in the other two bills.

The final education bill retained the controversial Whitten amendment to forbid busing to achieve racial balance in a school district. But during Senate debate on the measure, Sen. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) displayed a letter from HEW Sec. Elliot Richardson assuring the Senate that the Whitten amendment has been so altered as to be rendered meaningless.

Meanwhile, the House completed action on the Labor-HEW package by a vote of 361 to 14 after liberals were beaten, 151 to 103, in an attempt to add some $360 million in hospital construction funds.

The $3.6 billion HUD appropriation in the independent agencies bill was $650 million more than the Administration sought.

Most of the money added in the final bill was for urban renewal, water and sewer projects and veterans' medical care.

In other congressional developments:

- The Senate approved a 15 percent increase in railroad retirement benefits, retroactive to Jan. 1. That gives some 1.05 million retired railroad employes and their dependents the same increase which was made in social security benefits earlier this year.
- The House Agriculture Committee voted 25-2 to approve a three-year extension of the federal food stamp program. But the measure is expected to face stiff opposition on the floor from House liberals who consider the bill too restrictive.
- A consumer protection bill allowing individuals to band together in "class action suits" was approved by the Senate Commerce Committee after Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) threatened to keep the committee in session around the clock until it acted.

NATIONAL AGREEMENTS were reached among the Laborers and five companies introducing European systems of factory-built pre-cast concrete housing in the United States and Canada. From left are Pres. Peter Fosco of the Laborers, Peter Kluchert, William B. Kajdocsy and Pres. G. K. Escott of Jesperson-Kay Systems, Ltd., Toronto; Sec.-Treas. Terence J. # Concern Mounts Over Growing Use Of Swiss Banks to Conceal Income

Millions and millions of American dollars are salted away in secret Swiss bank accounts every year—not only to escape taxation but also to finance illegal operations in this country.

The money comes from racketeers and legitimate businessmen who in growing numbers are using the Swiss accounts to conceal their true income, an article in the July issue of the American Federationist reports.

The situation is a cause of major concern to the U.S. Treasury, the Internal Revenue Service and the Securities & Exchange Commission—all of whom are affected by manipulations.

Congress is also concerned over the now-easy outflow of money to these foreign accounts, writes John A. Grimes in the AFL-CIO's magazine. Measures to slam the door on these operations are pending in both the House and Senate.

While a number of criminals use the secret accounts to stash away "hot" money, Grimes points out that many businessmen, financiers, banks, stock brokers, doctors, dentists and other affluent Americans have foreign bank accounts to cover up their actual incomes and dodge the taxes due on them.

Government officials have found themselves almost helpless in combatting the problems because they are restricted by the foreign laws covering secret bank accounts, Grimes notes.

Often tax evasion or illegal operations are not defined in foreign countries as they are in the United States. And once the money gets into a foreign bank account it is almost impossible to trace down.

Grimes cites these examples of the manipulations connected with American money in foreign bank accounts:

- A father-son team of stock brokers managed to avoid tax payments of nearly $900,000 by trading through a foreign account.
- One American who controlled a foreign corporation made nearly $9 million profit in one week last year by trading gold when the price fluctuated wildly on the open market. It's illegal for Americans to trade in gold.
- Money from narcotics racketeering, loan-sharking, and other illegal operations has been sent abroad—only to return as "loans" after it had been "cleansed" by the foreign bank.

Congressional hearings have disclosed that criminal elements in the United States first discovered the advantages of foreign bank accounts, Grimes reports.

The "dirty" money—collected from narcotics, numbers, gambling and prostitution—goes into the foreign account. Then the depositor takes out a loan, which not only allows him to hide the deposit but also to get a tax advantage by deducting on the loan from his gross earnings.

Now the criminal has money he can invest in legitimate U.S. businesses—"and whatever use he makes of it, the interest on the loan is a federal tax deduction against his declared loan," Grimes observes.

The author also notes that secret bank accounts have been used by corporate "insiders" to conceal sales of stock they hold in their own company. Grimes describes "insiders" as corporate officials owning more than a certain percentage of stock in the company they work for. Under U.S. laws, transactions involving that stock must be specially reported.

But by dealing through secret foreign accounts, such transactions for profit have been hidden. The secrecy of the accounts allows the corporate officials to take advantage of "inside" news and sell at enormous profits.

Another transaction that has been used by American businessmen to hide profits is through "double invoicing." It was spelled out this way before a congressional committee:

An American corporation selling abroad will invoice the product twice. One will be a lower invoice, which will eventually be shown to U. S. tax officials. The other will be a higher invoice which will carry the real selling price. The overseas customer will pay the amount of the lower invoice directly to the seller. By pre-arrangement, he will deposit the difference between the invoices in the American businessman's secret bank account. There is little chance of tracing this money for taxation.

When U.S. investigators seek to uncover illegal operations being conducted through Swiss bank accounts, the Swiss claim their hands are tied by their laws preventing disclosure of information, Grimes notes.

The article observes that "tax evasion to the Swiss is an administrative rather than a criminal matter. Swindling may be beyond the pale. But Swiss securities laws as to what constitutes a swindle are neither so sophisticated nor demanding as ours."

The Banking & Currency Committees in the House and the Senate have come up with bills that would clamp down on the secret foreign bank accounts. But both measures have run into opposition from bankers and brokers—"rightly or wrongly about the additional paperwork burden," Grimes writes.

"But," he suggests, "if the U.S. officials who have been battling the secret bank account problem for so many years are correct, the return to the federal government in recovered tax revenues will more than pay the costs."

Right-Wing Station Loses Licenses For Violating 'Fairness Doctrine'

The Federal Communications Commission has refused to renew the licenses of a Media, Pa., radio station that has often attacked liberal groups and individuals and has failed to allow opposing points of view to be aired in violation of the FCC's "fairness doctrine."

Station WXUR has until Sept. 1 to wind up its affairs when both the AM and FM licenses expire. The licenses were issued to Brandywine-Maine Line Radio, Inc., now controlled by Faith Theological Seminary, Inc., which is headed by the right-wing minister, Dr. Carl McIntire.

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO joined 18 Philadelphia area civic and religious groups in urging the FCC to deny the license renewals.

After years of investigations and hearings, the FCC concluded that WXUR had persisted in violating a number of established broadcasting practices.

The FCC charged that the station:

- Failed to provide reasonable opportunities for the presentation of contrasting views on controversial issues of public importance.
- Ignored the personal attack principle of the fairness doctrine requiring that the target of the attack be given an opportunity to reply.
- Failed to live up to promises in the operation of its programs.
- Made no adequate effort to keep attuned to the community's needs or interests.

An FCC examiner also reported that when WXUR aired its "Freedom of Speech" call-in program, many of the callers were abused by the moderator.

"We find that Freedom of Speech . . . was conducted so as to discourage viewpoints with which he disagreed. From the outset he both cut off and insulted callers who did not share his views," the FCC noted.

The moderator of another WXUR program dealing with civil rights also treated callers with antagonism, the commission said.

The FCC also cited editorial viewpoints expressed by the station's broadcasters with no contrasting viewpoints being aired. They included:

"Organized labor was seeking dictatorial powers. . . . A guaranteed annual income as proposed by a presidential commission was a crackpot scheme which would erode the captalistic system and lead to socialism. . . . Major news media in this country are Communist propaganda outlets. . . ."

The station regularly broadcasts the 20th Century Reformation Hour which features attacks by Dr. McIntire on labor, civil rights groups, peace advocates and other liberal organizations.

"Numerous attacks on the integrity, character, honesty or like personal qualities of identifiable persons or groups" were broadcast by WXUR, an FCC examiner reported, without notifying the objects of the attacks or giving them a chance to reply.

The FCC said that any one of the violations would alone be enough to deny renewal of the WXUR licenses. It said that the violations were rendered even more serious "by the fact that we carefully drew the seminary's attention to a licensee's responsibilities before we approved the transfer of the stations to its ownership and control."

summer recess which starts Aug. 14.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote to all House members urging adoption of the reform act, which was introduced by Representatives Thomas O'Neill (D-Mass.) and Charles S. Gubser (R-Calif.).

Calling the bill the "first major change in congressional rules since the Reorganization Act of 1946," Biemiller told congressmen, "your support of these bipartisan reform efforts will help to bring about badly needed and long overdue changes in the present House rules and procedures."

The AFL-CIO has long advocated public voting on crucial amendments, Biemiller noted. He cited a 1963 AFL-CIO convention resolution declaring that until congressional reform is achieved, "America will be trying to resolve its vast automation and atomic-age problems with a horse-and-buggy legislative mechanism."

The vote on the amendment which did away with teller votes came on a voice vote with only a scattering of "nos" heard.

Under the old rules, which have been in use since the first Congress met in 1789, there was no way to get a recorded vote when the House sat as a "committee of the whole."

The procedure was for members to walk through lines with "tellers" recording the numbers of bodies, but not the names. The system was used only on amendments—but a critical amendment often changed the whole shape of a bill before it was finally adopted by a public vote.

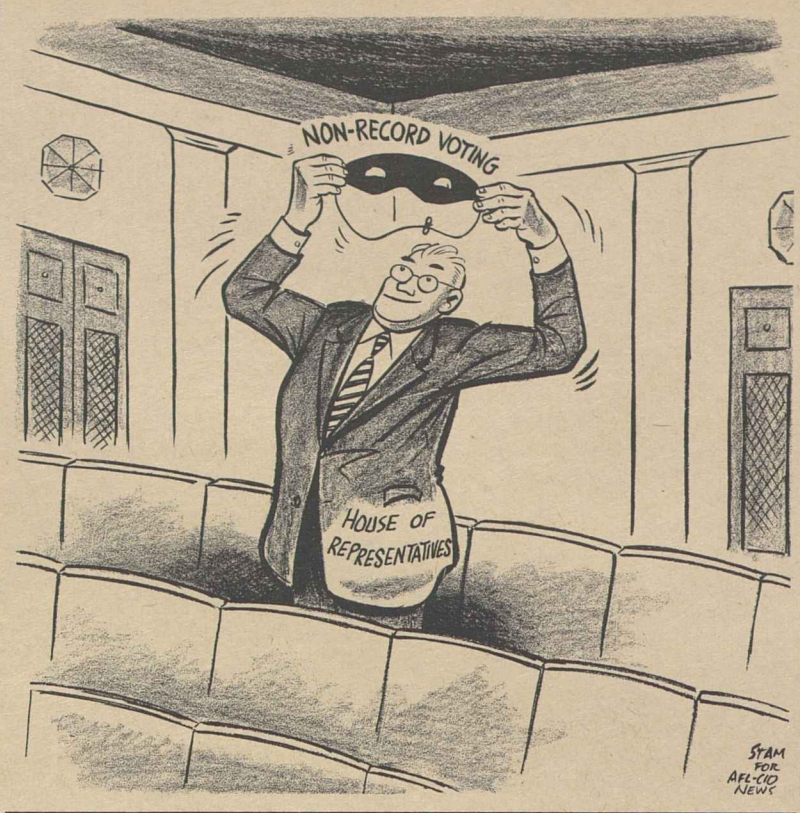
The same bill that killed teller votes also paved the way for future use of electronic voting equipment which could eventually do away with the tedious process of 435 individuals repsonding to roll call and quorum calls.

A House committee is expected to make specific proposals by the end of the year on an electronic system of voting, either by push-buttons or coded cards.

In other parts of the reform bill, the House:

- Provided for the public listing of names in the votes of both committees and subcommittees. Previously, totals were announced but not broken down by names.
- Voted 96-93 to allow some televising of committee hearings, which the Senate has done for many years. However, the provision included careful restrictions, such as allowing only four TV cameras at one time.
- Refused by a 132-112 teller vote to allow all committee meetings to be open to the public unless a majority of the committee members agreed in a roll call vote to close them.
- Backed away from overhauling the system by which the senior member automatically becomes committee chairman. Some long-time critics of the seniority system, such as Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), argued that the selection of committee chairmen was a party matter. Others shunned tying reform of the seniority system to the present bill, fearing other reform measures would be defeated in the process.



As a result, study of the seniority system was referred to two committees, headed by Rep. Julia Butler Hansen of Washington for the Democrats and Rep. Barber B. Conable, Jr., of New York for the Republicans.

Molders' Union Marks 100 Years in Cincinnati

Cincinnati—The Molders ended their first 100 years in Cincinnati without ceremony or celebration. It was union business as usual for Pres. William A. Lazzerini and his staff in the union-owned headquarters building at 1225 E. McMillan St.

The union itself is 111 years old. Originally a craft union, it now represents 80,000 workers in metal forming, fabricating and plastic molding industries. About 1,500 members work here, 10,000 in all of Ohio.

Congress Urged to Halt Exportation of U.S. Jobs

The expansion of world trade "must be orderly, equitable and must contribute to real growth in living standards," Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers told Congress.

Jennings said that the United States cannot allow growth industries and the employment they generate to be exported "at a time of substantial increases in the labor force and at a time when we are trying desperately to find jobs for the unemployed and the underemployed poor."

Jennings testified before the Foreign Economic Policy Subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress as chairman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s world trade committee.

He attributed the exportation of U.S. jobs to multinational corporations and their investments and operations abroad.

Jennings told the subcommittee that U.S.-based multinational firms spent about $5 billion on foreign manufacturing plants and equipment last year and will spend more this year.

In the past 25 years, he noted, such firms established an estimated 8,000 foreign subsidiaries, mostly in manufacturing, he said.

The annual output of these firms ranges between $120 billion and $200 billion—greater than any nation in the world, with the exception of the United States, the Soviet Union and possibly Japan, Jennings observed.

He said that in the electrical and electronics industries where IUE members are employed, "we have seen plant after plant shut down in recent years, their production discontinued, products, technology and jobs exported to offshore manufacturing facilities of the same multinational firms."

He also attacked the "twin plant" concept under which a foreign plant with many employes assembles a product from U.S.-made components and sends it back to a U.S. plant with few employes for final touches and sale in this country.

Hundreds of such plants paying workers 30-40 cents an hour are located in Mexico, Jennings noted. When the product returns to the United States, the customs duty is based on "value added"—mainly low-wage labor—not on total value, he pointed out.

Jennings cited the loss of about 2,000 U.S. jobs when a single company shifted television set production lines to Mexico. Similar use of cheap labor occurs in Korea, Taiwan, Haiti, Barbados and Brazil, he added. He estimated that this cost the U.S. more than 60,000 jobs since 1966 in electronics production alone.

Jennings charged further that many multinational firms in the electrical-electronics industry were fostered by taxpayer money for federal procurement orders and subsidized research and development. But the corporations patented the developments, Jennings reported, and then licensed other companies abroad to use them.

He said that U.S. companies are encouraged to invest in overseas operations by concessions from foreign countries and U.S. tax loopholes. But while capital and technology can be shifted from country to country, he noted, workers cannot.

Frank Kleiler Named Deputy to W. J. Usery

Frank M. Kleiler has been appointed Deputy Assistant Sec. of Labor for planning and evaluation in labor-management relations.

Kleiler, who has been director of the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports since 1963, will serve as deputy to W. J. Usery, Jr., Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations.

Rockettes Win Major Gains in New Contract

New York—The Rockettes of Radio City Music Hall held an after-midnight meeting to approve a contract settlement providing wage increases of $55 to $80, a cost-of-living bonus, management payment of hospitalization premiums, sick leave, and double time for each performance on the seventh day of any workweek.

The agreement covering more than 100 dancers and singers was reached 10 minutes before a midnight strike deadline. After the vote, Executive Pres. Penny Singleton of the Variety Artists and five members of the cast negotiating committee sealed it with a handshake in Music Hall Pres. James Gould's office.

The terms represent a vast improvement over prior conditions, Miss Singleton said. Members of the Rockettes and Corps de Ballet will get a minimum wage of $190 for first-year employes, $210 in the second year, $230 for third-year employes by July 1, 1972, with raises of $55, $60 and $65 respectively over three years.

First-year chorus employes go from $135 to $190 this year, to $200 next year and to $210 in the third year of the agreement. Second-year employes are raised to $210, then $220 and finally $230.

Weekly minimums for choral ensemble principals move by stages from $250 this year to $270 in the third year.

A feature of the new pact is more pay for girls who step out of line to sing a few bars. This wage supplement ranges from $10 for those who sing four bars or less, to $35 for 32 bars or more.

Some Subsidies Set For Home Mortgages

Pres. Nixon has signed into law a bill to put money into the nation's sagging housing industry, but in amounts far short of what has been termed essential by organized labor.

The legislation authorizes about $1.3 billion in federal funds to stimulate mortgage money in the next three years, but specific sums will have to be appropriated for each provision. Estimates on how much actual mortgage money would be made available through the new program varied widely—from $8 billion to $20 billion over an undetermined number of years.

The bill provides $250 million for home construction, with that amount made available to savings and loan associations. But there is no guarantee that money will not be used for luxury housing.

One of the key provisions is for federal subsidy funds of $105 million in each of the next three years to provide 7 percent housing loans for buyers whose incomes are below the median family income level in their areas. For the nation as a whole, the median income was $9,400 in 1969.

But the bill signed by the President cut in half—from $1.5 billion to $750 million—the proposed amount of money to be made available to low-cost housing through the Government National Mortgage Association.

Similarly, the two provisions which were designed to pump money into the housing industry from new sources were removed before the final bill was passed.

One, pushed by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), would have tapped the cash reserves of the Federal Reserve Board for $3 billion for the housing market.

In the House, another concept of "new money" was introduced in the form of a development bank, which would have utilized the resources of pension funds and foundations. It would have provided $4 billion of new funds for the low- and middle-income mortgage market.

At best, the new measure would provide for 1.3 million new housing units over the next three years. The AFL-CIO has repeatedly called for 2.6 million new units each year for the next 10 years to meet fully the housing goals set by Congress in 1968.

CAB Asked to Reject Northwest's Merger Bid

Four unions with 11,300 members on the struck Northwest Airlines asked the Civil Aeronautics Board to block Northwest's proposed merger with Northeast Airlines.

On the basis of Northwest's past performance, rejection of the merger proposal is the only way the employes' interests can be protected, the unions said. They are the Air Line Pilots, Railway & Airline Clerks, Machinists and Transport Workers.

About 3,500 clerks have been on strike since July 7. Members of other unions are respecting their picket lines. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged all affiliated unions to support the strikers.

The unions charged that Northwest's final offer to the clerks—an offer the company put into effect unilaterally—was substantially below terms negotiated on other airlines, including Northeast.

The contract rate for reservations agents on Northeast now ranges from $555 to $731 a month. Rates set by Northwest start at $510 and go to $661—$71 a month less at the top, the unions noted.

They said Northwest unnecessarily provoked the strike and rejected the services of the National Mediation Board even though the union agreed to resume talks.

If the merger is approved, Northeast employes will be "subjected immediately to the substantially inferior wages Northwest has instituted" for its own employes, the complainants said.

They declared that it is "inconsistent with the public interest to permit such a carrier to extend its economic influence" by acquiring another carrier.

FARM WORKERS' UNION leaders from around the country meet with AFL-CIO Executive Council in Chicago. UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez is seated, right, between Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland. The council adopted a statement hailing UFWOC's new table grape contracts as one of the greatest victories in American labor history.

'Crop-by-Crop' Drive Planned:

Farm Union's Victory Hailed As One of Labor's Greatest

Chicago—It took four long years of trial and battle but the AFL-CIO Farm Workers came back to this city to celebrate one of the greatest victories in the annals of trade union history.

As their leaders met with the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its summer sessions here, others were signing new contracts with table grape growers in the Fresno, Calif., area bringing to 85 percent the table grapes under union contract. Talks were scheduled for the Lodi area in a few days to complete, as the council said, "the most significant victory in the collective bargaining history of agricultural workers in the U. S."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, with Cesar Chavez and Larry Itliong, farm union leaders, at his side, told a press conference that he hoped to announce in the next 10 days that a complete victory had been achieved and the successful table grape boycott would be over.

Chavez, director of the federation's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, and Itliong, the assistant director, had reported to the council earlier on the step-by-step battle that flowed from the chartering four years ago in Chicago of the UFWOC.

To hear the council adopt its statement on the Farm Workers, leaders of the boycott movement from across the country sat in and won the applause of the council members for their tremendous efforts.

The council statement reviewed the history of the struggle, the "courage, determination and dedication" of the strikers and the contributions of millions of American trade unionists to supporting the boycott and said:

"The UFWOC and the AFL-CIO intend to jointly map, mount and win—on a crop-by-crop basis—collective bargaining rights for farm workers throughout America."

It pledged also an unremitting fight to win legislation to assure the farm worker of "exactly the same rights under all federal statutes that are held by all other workers." (Text, Page 6.)

At the press conference, Meany told reporters, in reply to queries, that the membership of UFWOC is about 15,000 and growing and that the AFL-CIO had spent over $2 million in about 10 years in the battle to organize farm workers.

Chavez said the AFL-CIO support was the "most significant help we could get," stressing the across-the-board backing for the boycott

SIU Indictment Assailed As Move to Gag Labor

Chicago—Atty. Gen. John Mitchell "is seeking to silence the American trade union movement for purely political purposes," the AFL-CIO declared.

In a unanimously adopted statement the federation's Executive Council asserted "we will not be cowed. We are going to continue to exercise our basic rights and we are going to the defense of those labor organizations which become the chosen target of the Justice Dept."

At a press conference, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the labor movement "won't be intimidated" by Mitchell's action in seeking the indictment of the Seafarers and that the unions will not curtail or cut back on their political activities.

The council statement, titled "Support of the SIU," cited the specifics of the indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Brooklyn, N.Y., in June charging the Seafarers and a number of its officers "with making and conspiring to

Vital Importance Of Elections Cited

By Saul Miller

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council put the domestic policies of the Nixon Administration under intensive scrutiny and found them wanting in most respects.

That was the major theme as the federation's 35-member governing body between conventions wound up a three-day mid-summer meeting here.

A companion theme was the critical importance of the 1970 elections, their effect on the policy decisions of the Administration and the liberal balance in Congress.

In a series of statements the council sharply assailed the Nixon economic policies that have placed "a major and growing share" of the burden of joblessness and shrinking purchasing power on the workers, the education policies that would delay integration and damage the public school and higher education systems, and the political policies designed to coerce unions to cut back their political activities.

The council cited also the Administration's opposition to strong occupational health and safety legislation, its united interest in wage-hour legislation and campaign financing.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, at a series of press conferences held during the meetings, said that after 18 months in office the President had a good record in foreign affairs but that his domestic record was the equivalent of "a 9.0 earned-run average," a baseball term denoting a very poor performance by a pitcher.

While running the record of the Administration, the council took time out to hail a major trade union victory—one of the greatest in many years—the winning of the strike against grape growers in California by the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

It took time also to approve a new budget for the Labor Studies Center, voted donations to various civil rights and educational organizations and named a new member, Alexander J. Rohan, president of the Pressmen, to succeed the late Herman D. Kenin. (Story, Page 3.)

In the international affairs area, the council declared that it could not stand complacently by and accept the "transformation" of the International Labor Organization "into an instrument for spreading Communist propaganda and attacks on genuine freedom and democracy." (Story, Page 2.)

It received a report also urging greater support of CARE and voted support of various AFL-CIO programs around the globe.

On domestic matters the council:

- Hailed the Farm Workers' victory and pledged to map, mount and win, with the UFWOC, on a crop-by-crop basis "collective bargaining rights for farm workers throughout America." (Story, this page.)
- Called for a reversal of Administration economic policies to stop the rise in unemployment and the continuing inflation, burdens currently being borne to an excessive degree by American workers. (Story, Page 2.)
- Attacked the education policies of the Administration on school integration, higher education costs and loans and the proposed demonstration voucher plan that "could do irreparable damage to the public school system." (Story, this page.)
- Declared that Atty. Gen. John Mitchell "is seeking to silence

Administration's Plans Seen Damaging Schools

Chicago—The Nixon Administration's education policies came under strong attack from the AFL-CIO Executive Council in a trio of statements dealing with higher education, school integration and "voucher" programs.

The council declared that:

- The Administration's bill "ostensibly to facilitate the process of school desegregation" could very well "result in delaying rather than speeding" integration.
- The proposed demonstration voucher project to be funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity "could do irreparable damage to the public school system" and is one of the "most bizarre proposals yet to emanate from within the Nixon Administration."
- Proposals on student loan programs and cuts in work-study funds are further compounding a "serious crisis in higher education" stemming from soaring costs and threatening to foreclose on the hope of college for millions of children of America's workers.

In its statement on the bill to aid school desegregation, the council said, nowhere has the Administration's "equivocal attitude" been more "nakedly revealed" than in the proposals in this bill on allocation of funds and various qualification procedures.

It called on Congress to make substantial changes to achieve the PROGRESS ON LABOR-BACKED BILLS pending in Congress is reported by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, background, at a session of the Executive Council in Chicago.

AFL-CIO Pledges Fight to Stem Communist Build-Up Within ILO

Chicago—The AFL-CIO declared that it cannot complacently stand by and accept the "transformation" of the International Labor Organization "into an instrument for spreading Communist propaganda and attacks on genuine freedom and democracy."

The federation's Executive Council adopted a statement that the AFL-CIO "will take whatever means are available to it to have the ILO return to its historic mission of defending human rights and workers' freedoms everywhere in the world."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the AFL-CIO is not considering "at this time" the question of whether it will continue to nominate a worker-delegate to the ILO. He said that labor's views of the trend of events in the ILO were shared by the employer representatives and the Labor Dept. in testimony before a House Appropriations subcommittee.

If the ILO becomes a "political instrument," it will cease to serve the function for which it was formed, Meany said. As part of the build-up of Communist strength in the organization, he noted the recent appointment of a representative of a Soviet bloc nation as an assistant director-general of the ILO, a position from which the Communists can exert pressure on the organization.

He said that the United States is the chief contributor to the ILO, paying about 25 percent of its total cost.

Noting its long association with the ILO and the role of Samuel Gompers, first president of the AFL, in helping launch the international organization, the council said the federation has become "increasingly concerned that while the ILO still pays lip service to human rights, it has in fact turned a blind eye to the most blatant violations of basic freedoms in its member countries."

The statement cited the ILO conference in June which it said "demonstrates this dangerous trend." The conference adopted a "ringing resolution" on trade union rights and civil liberties but yet rejected "rather mild resolutions calling for restoring trade union rights under the dictatorial regimes of Spain and Greece."

The ILO has increasingly adopted a "head-in-the-sands approach to Communist violations of human rights as if to ignore them would somehow obliterate them," the council said, adding:

"The result of this inconsistency between lofty ILO principles and the completely contrary practices under Communist totalitarianism which the ILO has failed to challenge has been to weaken the forces of freedom and strengthen the undemocratic elements of all stripes in the ILO."

The international organization, meanwhile, has allowed its annual conferences "to be taken over by the Communists and their allies for unrestrained political attacks" on Israel and the United States, the council said.

It noted that "year by year, the Communist elements have been gaining greater influence and control of the ILO almost without resistance from free trade union and other democratic elements."

The statement noted that the AFL-CIO had supported the ILO because of its unique tripartite structure of labor, employer and government representation, its goal of improving the conditions of work and life for all workers, its contributions towards enhancing the welfare of workers and its espousal of human rights. It is these approaches that are now being threatened by the growth of Communist strength within the organization.

Labor Dept. to Set Goals on Women's Jobs

Sec. James D. Hodgson announced that the Labor Dept. will institute goals and timetables to improve employment opportunities for women in federal contract work.

Hodgson said the department plans a series of consultations with women's groups, unions, employers and human resources experts to devise a program for elimination of job discrimination against women.

"The federal government is convinced that the under-utilization of women in employment throughout the nation constitutes a waste of national resources," the Secretary said, declaring that all discrimination prohibited by federal regulations "must be dealt with effectively."

Inflation Spurs Demand To Update Wage Floor

Chicago—The wage-hour law must be updated and modernized if the progress in pulling millions of Americans out of poverty is to continue, the AFL-CIO declared.

The inroads of inflation have halted and reversed the progress since 1966 when the minimum wage was set at $1.60 an hour, the federation's Executive Council said, and "millions of working Americans are slipping backwards down again to the lowest rungs. Others have never moved out of poverty."

The current $1.60 minimum wage is worth, in terms of purchasing power, only a "few cents more than $1.25 was in 1966," the council emphasized. The need, it said, is to increase the wage floor to "at least $2 an hour," and to extend coverage to 17 million workers now unprotected.

In addition, the council's statement called for doubletime for overtime work, premium pay for overtime in excess of eight hours a day as well as 40 hours a week and "shortening the workweek or workyear."

A $2 minimum wage is "not an adequate living wage," the council stressed, but it will help build purchasing power, eliminate some welfare costs and eradicate the blight of poverty from one "big sector of America."

Exclusion of workers from wage-hour law protection was never justified, the council declared in calling for universal coverage including workers in state and local government, retail trade, seamen, domestics and others—with special attention to farm workers, some of whom now get limited and inadequate coverage.

The farm worker situation, the council stressed, is a case of "double discrimination" and it is time that they be treated fairly and in the same terms as other workers.

The statement said "there is good reason for Congress to think seriously about creating new jobs by reducing the workweek or the workyear, with no reduction in pay." It urged also full enforcement of the wage-hour law to curb illegal underpayment of wages.

History has proved that the Fair Labor Standards Act works, but in light of current problems it must be updated to keep up with periodic changes, the council concluded.

'Revitalizing' Policies Urged:

Economic Failures Hit Workers Hard

Chicago—American workers are bearing "a major and growing share of the burden of the Administration's economic policies" in the form of joblessness and shrinking purchasing power, the AFL-CIO declared.

The Administration has spurned the use of selective measures advocated by the federation, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement, and has chosen "severe economic restraint" that has caused mounting unemployment while failing to stem the rise in living costs. (Excerpts, Page 7.)

This is the "worst combination of economic trends" that "continues to plague the American people," the council asserted, and can only be treated by policies that will "revitalize the economy" and get the nation "on the road to full employment as rapidly as possible."

The council called for the full funding of federal appropriations "for such socially vital requirements as housing, education, health care, community facilities and hospitals." It urged a public service employment program "to create jobs for the long-term unemployed and seriously underemployed in providing badly needed public services."

After more than 18 months, the council pointed out, the Nixon policies have "produced an economic recession and extortionate interest rates, while inflation is still not under control."

In June, the statement stressed, the real spendable weekly earnings of more than 47 million wage and salary earners "were below year-ago levels for the 15th consecutive month." It added:

"The buying power of weekly earnings after federal taxes was less than in 1965. Most workers have had little if any gain in the buying power of their earnings in the past five years, after only modest improvements in 1960-1965."

Between last December and June 1970, the statement emphasized, unemployment jumped 1.1 million persons, to 3.9 million, or 4.7 percent of the labor force. Twenty metropolitan areas are now classified by the Labor Dept. as having more than 6 percent unemployment.

Even if the decline should "bottom out" during the next several months, as the Administration predicts, the council said, unemployment is expected to rise through the remainder of 1970 and into 1971.

Noting again the President's failure to use the authority voted by Congress to impose selective credit controls, the council urged Congress to direct the Federal Reserve System to establish such controls and direct the flow of available credit at reasonable rates into housing, public facilities and regular operations of business.

The council reaffirmed the AFL-CIO position that if the President determines that the economic situation requires mandatory controls—after establishing selective credit controls—the AFL-CIO "will cooperate" if the controls are equitably placed on all costs and income.

But, it concluded, "the soundest way to balance the federal budget is to balance the American economy," and this means measures to produce job opportunities at decent wages for all those who are able to work and are seeking employment.

Unions Asked To Step Up Aid to CARE

Chicago—A report urging that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates step up "involvement with CARE for basic humanitarian reasons" was approved by the federation's Executive Council.

The report by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, who serves as a CARE vice president representing the federation, said that the AFL-CIO has been deeply involved but that "much still remains to be done" especially in developing additional financial support of CARE's efforts in underdeveloped areas.

"I strongly suggest," Minton told the council, "that we step up our involvement with CARE for basic humanitarian reasons."

His report reviewed the work of AFL-CIO funds in helping build schools in Guatemala, relief programs in South Viet Nam, food packages in a half-dozen nations, school kits, drug and hospital equipment and trade union organizational kits—mostly office equipment and machines.

Stresses Importance Of Coming Election

the American trade union movement for purely political purposes" in singling out for indictment the Seafarers for voluntary contributions to campaign committees of both parties. (Story, Page 1.)

● Called on Congress to provide for public financing of presidential campaigns before the 1972 election and to insure the availability of radio and TV on an equitable basis for congressional elections. (Story, Page 4.)

● Urged quick congressional action on occupational health and safety legislation because the nation can no longer "tolerate polluted workplaces and dangerous working conditions." (Story, this page.)

● Asserted the need for updating and modernizing the wage-hour law to continue progress in bringing millions of Americans out of poverty. (Story, Page 2.)

● Expressed its alarm and concern at published reports that the President will nominate Sidney Marland, Jr., as Commissioner of Education and pledged to oppose the nomination. (Story, Page 5.)

● Gave a top priority to an all-out register and vote campaign to assure that in the upcoming elections "Congress will retain its liberal balance." (Story, Page 4.)

Meany said that on the national economy the President's "game plan" was "mostly talk" and doesn't seem to be working very well. He noted that Congress had voted the President the power to use selective credit controls and that the President had not seen fit to use those powers. The federation president also said at a number of press conferences:

● Wage settlements in the first half of 1970 were justified as workers tried to make up for the shrinkage in the purchasing power of their dollars. The Administration's monetary and fiscal policies are basic causes of unemployment and not, as Nixon has been saying, the transition of the economy from war to peace.

● The Chicago Plan to help minority group workers to gain jobs in the construction industry is "sound" and is directing attention to the real problem of bringing minority workers into the building trades unions through the apprenticeship route. He termed the Administration's Philadelphia Plan a "total failure."

● Labor supports peaceful dissent by students that has a specific objective, but disagrees "very strongly" with the objective of violent destruction of the university. Student objectives are generally very unclear and unspecific in contrast to labor which knows what it wants "and what we're after."

● The use of violence begets violence and labor is opposed to the use of violence by any group anywhere, any time and that includes any violence flowing from so-called "hard-hat" demonstrations.

● The AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers have agreed to work together to win national health insurance legislation; the federation and the UAW are not very far apart on trade union matters and if the Auto Workers get into a strike situation in the auto industry they would get trade union support from the AFL-CIO and all the cooperation needed.

● The soaring of election campaign costs is a "tremendously serious" question for the country because it could bar a great many persons from holding public office because they lack the means to campaign.

In other actions, the council heard a report on meetings concerning relations with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and Meany reported that there has been no change and that the federation is not considering applying for membership. The AFL-CIO will continue its membership in the ORIT, a grouping of free trade unions in Latin America that is affiliated with the ICFTU. The council voted its annual appropriation of funds for the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

It approved also a $462,000 budget for the Labor Studies Center for the 1970-71 year after receiving a report on the center's operations.

It received progress reports on the work of its organizing committee and a special subcommittee on public employe organizing and legislation, as well as approving cooperation on a proposed study on labor-management disputes with the American Arbitration Association.

Strong support was voted for the strike against Northwest Airlines by the Railway & Airline Clerks, and the traveling public was urged to refrain from using the few Northwest flights still operating. (Story, Page 5.)

Contributions were voted to the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the League for Industrial Democracy, the Joint Council for Economic Education, the Jewish Labor Committee and to the American Red Cross to help with the relief program for Hurricane Celia.

The next meeting was set for Nov. 9 in Washington, D. C., at AFL-CIO headquarters.

ECONOMIC POLICIES of the Nixon Administration are causing American wage and salary earners to bear an increasing burden, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells reporters covering the federation's Executive Council meeting in Chicago. He said the President's "game plan" for the economy is mostly talk that doesn't "seem to be working."

SST Backed As Vital to U.S. Aviation Role

Chicago—The Senate was urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to vote funds to produce two prototypes of a supersonic transport to assure that the American aerospace industry maintains its leadership in world aviation.

The council adopted a statement noting that the Soviet Union and the French and British jointly are developing airliners to fly at supersonic speeds and will be flying commercially in 1973-74.

The House has voted $290 million for production of two SST prototypes and the Senate is scheduled to vote later this month.

Without an SST, the council said, the U. S. "will be unable to maintain its leadership in world aviation, losing most of the market for transoceanic airliners"—a loss to the United States of its principal manufactured export. In addition, aerospace workers will lose "sorely needed employment" since the prototypes would provide work for 20,000 employes of the contractor—the Boeing Co.

The council said it recognized "some of the reservations about the possible effect supersonic flight might have on the quality of the earth's environment," but said no harm can come from the production of two prototypes. It cited government statements that there is no evidence available now that a fleet of supersonic airliners will degrade the atmosphere.

It noted that the Dept. of Transportation has stimulated further research on the effect from supersonic flights of military aircraft, and that this information will be augmented when the Soviet TU-144 and the French-British Concorde begin their commercial flights.

McLaurin Appointed To City Labor Post

New York—Benjamin McLaurin, former New York divisional president of the Sleeping Car Porters, assumed new duties as labor services director for the city's Economic Development Administration with a pledge of aid to exploited workers.

McLaurin said he will seek the support of legitimate unions and employers; wage a vigorous drive against substandard wages and "sweetheart" contracts; and promote legislation to curb forms of exploitation now called legal.

Daniels Bill Termed Key To Effective Job Safety

Chicago—The nation can no longer "tolerate polluted workplaces and dangerous working conditions" and American workers "should never be called upon to pay for their jobs with their health or their lives," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The answer is for congressional passage of the Daniels bill to protect the lives and well-being of workers through a strong occupational safety and health law, the council said.

Citing the official statistics of 14,500 workers killed on the job every year, of 2.5 million disabled and another seven million injured, the council statement charged that these figures understate the extent of the tragedy.

An unpublished report, it noted, has concluded that as many as 25 million serious injuries and deaths on the job are not counted each year by the federal government. The council called on the Dept. of Labor to publish the report so that the public can know the true extent of the problem.

The Labor Dept. later said it had not yet received the full report and that it would be made public as soon as it is available.

In terms of the economy, the council estimated the loss in excess of $8 billion a year, "tantamount to a death and injury tax of $40 a year on every man, woman and child in the country."

Calling for passage of the Daniels bill reported out favorably by the House Labor Committee, the council noted that it has the wholehearted endorsement of organized labor and the strong opposition of the Administration, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

The opposing groups, the council warned, "will attempt to substitute a bill containing weaker enforcement powers, watered-down procedural rights for workers exposed to hazardous working conditions, and special industry-dominated boards and courts to handle enforcement matters."

The council spelled out the various protections and enforcement powers in the Daniels bill in demanding immediate congressional action. It concluded:

"At a time when the nation is intensely interested in environmental problems, it is inconceivable that there should be resistance to or apathy toward occupational safety and health legislation. For the workplace is the environment for millions of working Americans."

Council Elects Rohan to Fill Vacant Seat

Chicago—Alexander J. Rohan, president of the Printing Pressmen, has been elected an AFL-CIO vice president and member of the federation's Executive Council. The council chose Rohan to fill the vacancy created by the death of Herman Kenin, late president of the Musicians.

Rohan was born in Haverstraw, N.Y., and attended public schools in Yonkers. He started work in a commercial printing plant in 1932 and joined the Pressmen's union the same year.

After 19 years at the pressmen's trade, Rohan was named to the international union's staff as a representative. He was elected vice president in 1953 and secretary-treasurer in 1961.

Rohan has been president of his union since June 10. Nominated by an overwhelming majority of local unions, he was elected in a referendum to succeed Anthony J. DeAndrade, who died unexpectedly Jan. 20.

ALEXANDER J. ROHAN

Herman Kenin Mourned As 'Great Trade Unionist'

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council mourned the death of Federation Vice Pres. Herman D. Kenin as a "great trade unionist and a fine gentleman."

It adopted a resolution hailing his long career in the American Federation of Musicians, which he served as an official since 1936 and its president since 1958. It noted his service on the AFL-CIO Executive Council, his role as first chairman of the federation's Council for Professional, Scientific & Cultural Employes and his chairmanship of the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Committee.

The resolution pointed out his work as a director of the National Council on the Arts & Government, and as an outstanding spokesman for public support of music and the performing arts.

He was, the council said, "a man whose friendship, calm wisdom and dedicated devotion to his fellow man inspired all who knew him." The council voted a $2,500 contribution to Reed College, Portland, Ore., which Kenin attended.

make political contributions in violation of federal law."

The statement noted that the charges included making of contributions to both Democratic and Republican campaign committees through the Seafarers' Political Activities Donations account.

The council noted that many AFL-CIO affiliates have formed separate committees to collect voluntary dollars from members and that the formation of such committees and their use of "monies so collected to support candidates for political office has always been permitted under federal law." The statement continued:

"The indictment, however, charges, in essence, that the Seafarers' open and above-board campaign to secure voluntary contribution. . . somehow constitutes a conspiracy to violate the prohibition against using union dues monies for contributions to federal candidates."

American workers have the right "to associate together to make their voice heard in federal elections," they have the right to make voluntary contributions to political activity funds, and their unions have the right to convince the members that such contributions are vital to safeguard their interests, the council declared.

Therefore, the "broad and loosely drawn indictment in the Seafarers case," the council stressed, "can only be read as a device to coerce working men and women and their unions to forego their basic constitutional rights." It said the reasons of Mitchell, the Administration's "key politician," were "not hard to discern."

Labor's involvement in the 1968 presidential campaign, its fight to defeat the "unwise nominations of Judges Haynsworth and Carswell" showed that "the labor movement is the bulwark against the regressive and repressive policies the Executive Branch has sought to implement."

While "seeking to silence" the unions, the council noted, Mitchell has refused to "move forward against Republican campaign committees that did not file their reports on time during the 1968 campaign, despite the fact that the failure to file constituted clear violation of law."

The council concluded that "this is all of a piece with the trend of Administration policy which is to monopolize the press and the airwaves by silencing its critics."

21 Appointed To OEO Labor Advisory Panel

Dir. Donald Rumsfeld of the Office of Economic Opportunity has anounced the appointment of a 21-member Labor Advisory Committee.

Chairman of the committee is AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Sullivan, head of the Service Employes, and the vice chairman is Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The roster of other committee members is as follows:

Pres. Max Greenberg, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, Operating Engineers; Pres. C. J. Haggerty, AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Vice Pres. Douglas Fraser, Auto Workers; Vice Pres. W. Vernie Reed, Laborers; Vice Pres. Nelson Jack Edwards, Auto Workers; Dir. Walter G. Davis, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Legislative Rep. Jack Sheehan, Steelworkers; and Pres. John J. Driscoll, Connecticut AFL-CIO.

Also, Pres. Barney Weeks, Alabama AFL-CIO; Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., New York City AFL-CIO; Pres. Thomas Turner, Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO; Pres. Irvin Mazzei, Los Angeles County AFL-CIO; Mrs. Arline M. Neal, executive board member, Greater Washington Central Labor Council; William Gary, administrative assistant to the president, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; William Lucy, executive assistant to the president, State, County & Municipal Employes; Velma Murphy Hill, chairman, United Federation of Teachers Local 2, Para-Professional Division, American Federation of Teachers; Santo Ruiz, staff representative, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Doris Fleeson Dies, Early Guild Leader

Doris Fleeson, nationally syndicated newspaper columnist and a member of the Newspaper Guild's first executive board, died at 69. She had been incapacitated by a stroke for 18 months. Her death followed that of her husband, former Navy Sec. Dan A. Kimball, by 36 hours.

Miss Fleeson helped Heywood Broun, later the ANG's first president, organize the Guild in New York and nationally. She was a Guild witness at newspaper code hearings in 1933 and a delegate from New York City at the ANG's founding convention in Washington in 1933.

Voter Drive Held Vital to Elect Liberals

Chicago—The AFL-CIO gave a top priority to an all-out register and vote drive to assure that "Congress will retain its liberal balance."

The Executive Council adopted a strong statement pointing out that many liberals face difficult struggles for re-election and that "every effort must be made to help them."

In those races where the "incumbents are ultra-conservative, we must bend every effort to elect liberal opponents," the council stressed.

It cited also the continuing attacks on the democratic process and declared:

"The AFL-CIO believes all eligible citizens should vote, both as a means of signalling their preference among contending persons and programs, and—in a period when the very electoral process is subjected to attack—as an affirmation of confidence in the process as a means of resolving differences in the land."

The council urged redoubled efforts to give a top place to registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns to assure a record number of voters at the polls on Nov. 3.

It renewed its call, also, for tearing down "all artificial barriers to the voting booth, imposed by archaic and restrictive election laws," and noted the progress in congressional approval of lowering the voting age to 18 and extending the Voting Rights Act for five years.

CAMPAIGN OUTLOOK for the 1970 elections is discussed by Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) before the AFL-CIO Executive Council in Chicago. Jackson, who has an outstanding voting record on labor-endorsed measures, is up for re-election.

In Top Races:

Federal Aid Urged For '72 Candidates

Chicago—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to provide for public financing of presidential campaigns before the 1972 election and to insure the availability of radio and TV on an equitable basis for congressional elections as well.

The question of steeply spiraling campaign costs directly affects the "continuing vitality of the democratic system," the Executive Council declared in a statement. It said a start must be made "on a rational solution."

Pointing out that the AFL-CIO has long favored direct federal subsidies to help meet the costs of presidential campaigns, the council said "this is not a novel or radical idea: it was advanced by Theodore Roosevelt early in the century."

If a federal subsidy works well for a presidential campaign, the council added, it could be extended later to congressional races.

A small tax credit plan would be "an acceptable, though less desirable, alternative," the council said, but it stressed its opposition to a tax deduction plan for political contributions as making it "cheaper for those in the higher tax brackets to contribute than for those in the lower" brackets.

Urging that TV and radio stations be required "to provide specified amounts of free time for presidential and congressional political campaigns," the council said that "an acceptable alternative approach is the proposal by Sen. John Pastore (D-R.I.) to fix ceilings on TV and radio expenditures in political campaigns and to require licensees to sell time for campaigning at the lowest unit rate charged for the time segment."

The gravity of the problem of financing political campaigns was set out by the council with figures showing the costs of all political campaign spending at all levels increased 50 percent between 1964 and 1968—from $200 million to an estimated $300 million.

A major factor, the statement said, "is the increasing use and the increasing costs of television," which it estimated accounted for "nearly one-third of the total costs of all campaigns."

"This increasing cost of politics means that there will be ever greater reliance by parties and candidates on contributions by the very wealthy," the council said, "or that only the rich may run; or that the government must in some way start helping to finance campaign costs. We favor the last alternative, but it is the first two that are currently prevailing."

The council cited a recent study in Fortune magazine that Republican candidates have a great advantage because they usually gain the support of the wealthy. In 1968, the magazine showed, 46 of the nation's richest industrialists gave $948,000 to Republican candidates and committees but only $121,000 to Democrats.

In 1972, the council said, "Pres. Nixon will enjoy in addition the advantage that accrues to an incumbent President" not the least of which is "continual access to TV and other mass media."

The statement added:

"If the continuing vitality of the democratic system is to be assured, Congress must act now to assure adequate and equitable financing of presidential campaign costs."

Nevada Labor Asks Improved Aid to Jobless

Las Vegas — The Nevada AFL-CIO at its 14th annual convention called on the state to come to the aid of jobless workers by improving Nevada's unemployment insurance law now.

Receipts from tourism are down and resort hotels are laying off workers to such an extent that many have exhausted their unemployment benefits, the convention said in adopting a report submitted to the 300 delegates representing about 170 local unions.

Official statistics show an unemployment rate of more than 6 percent in the Las Vegas area, but since many jobless workers are being disqualified, the actual rate is closer to 7 percent—one of the highest in the nation, a convention resolution declared.

Delegates called for an increase in the amount of benefits, and extended benefits for workers who have exhausted their right to benefits. If the emergency continues, the governor should call the legislature into special session in advance of the regular session next January, the convention advised.

The state Committee on Political Education endorsed Sen. Howard W. Cannon (D) for re-election but deferred all endorsements for governor and other state offices until after the Sept. 2 primary election.

Re-elected to office in the state federation without opposition were Sec.-Treas. Louis Paley and Vice Pres. Boyd Manning of Ely, a member of the Plumbers. Newly elected were Vice Presidents James Arnold of the Operating Engineers, Las Vegas, and Primo Bertoldi of the Carpenters, Reno. The current term of Pres. Al Bramlet does not expire until next year.

Those elected will serve two-year terms.

The convention adopted a 36-point legislative program and changed the constitution to conform to AFL-CIO requirements on open voting.

Major speakers included Gov. Paul Laxalt (R), who is not a candidate for re-election; James C. O'Brien of the Steelworkers and William L. Gilbert, assistant AFL-CIO regional director.

Administration Policies:

Threat to Schools Assailed by Labor

purpose of aiding school integration, especially in those sections that appear to reward "lawlessness and recalcitrance."

It urged tuition-free community colleges located within commuting distance of students' homes as the "best hope for expanding higher educational opportunities," as well as a wide variety of other free higher education institutions.

The statement singled out the Administration proposal to discontinue federal subsidization of student loans for young persons coming from families with an annual income of $10,000 or more. The council pointed out that this would discriminate against a student each of whose parents is working and earning $5,000 a year and would saddle the student with a tremendous loan-repayment burden.

The council emphasized that "the AFL-CIO has never wavered in its support for school desegregation. The founding convention of the AFL-CIO expressed its support for the Supreme Court decision of 1954 which outlawed segregation in the nation's schools. In 1963 the AFL-CIO extended its concern to declare that 'de facto segregation is no more morally defensible than segregation arising out of the law.'"

The statement on the OEO voucher plan said it would only bring chaos in its attempt to allow parents to enroll their children in any school of their choice, turning in educational vouchers to the school which would submit them for payment to the government.

Under the system, the council declared, "hardsell hucksters would promote their private educational institutions with the reckless disregard for facts now used by makers of detergents. Religious sponsorship would become the excuse for increasing the number of racially segregated schools. Costly and tragic damage could be done to the public schools unable to compete with the glittering promises of private enterprise educational salesmen, greedy for a lion's share of vouchers."

Organized labor has championed the public schools since their inception, the council stressed, adding: "It is a sorry commentary upon the Nixon Administration's educational policies that it is necessary for us at this late date to reiterate our belief that for all children, rich or poor, black or white, the best hope for American education lies in strengthening the public schools throughout the nation."

On higher education, the council said the progress of recent years is in danger of being wiped out by rising costs so that only the rich will be able to afford college and "the sons and daughters of working people will find college beyond their means if present trends continue."

It pointed to a diminishing of federal funds and private contributions while tuition and other costs have more than doubled in a decade. The AFL-CIO believes, the council reaffirmed, that tuition-free higher education like elementary and secondary education "is to the benefit of the entire society and the cost should not have to be borne by the students who receive it."

HANDSHAKE CONSUMMATES the signing of contracts between the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and 26 major table grape growers in California at ceremonies in Delano. Principal participants are from left: AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, UFWOC Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong, Dir. Cesar Chavez, Bishop Joseph F. Donnelly of the Catholic bishops committee on farm labor and John Giummarra, Sr., of the world's largest grape vineyard.

at all levels of the AFL-CIO structure.

He said that the boycott weapon will be used as long as employers employ strikebreakers to smash legitimate strikes.

Unionization of farm workers, Meany stressed, will mean improved living conditions as well as higher wages, with funds from health and welfare contributions by employers and the use of the economic development fund set up under the contracts all adding up to a better life for workers covered by a union contract.

Itliong stressed that more than grapes were involved—either the wine or table variety — and that present UFWOC contracts cover 19 different crops. Grape growers, he noted, also produce other fruits and vegetables and those who had signed had covered workers on all crops.

The struggles to win legislation to give farm workers protection of the nation's labor laws, unemployment compensation, full wage-hour coverage, etc., were all being fought and held up by a powerful lobby in Washington of farm and grower interests, Meany said.

In hailing the accomplishments of the Farm Workers, the council statement said that the UFWOC and the AFL-CIO know "that this must be only the beginning. We are determined to bring the benefits of collective bargaining to other farm workers around the country. We, and the UFWOC, intend to do this in the same kind of a systematic, sensible program that achieved victory in Delano."

Mississippi Labor Vows To Lift Wages in State

Biloxi, Miss.—The Mississippi AFL-CIO, meeting in annual convention, called for an all-out effort by the labor movement to help lift wages in Mississippi from the "bottom of the economic ladder."

More than 200 delegates from 90 local unions in the state condemned a slogan devised by the State Research & Development Dept. as "imbecilic" and said only labor unions, working together, can raise the income of Mississippi citizens and "stop the exploitation of working people in this state."

The rejected slogan is "75 by 75" —said to call for raising the income of state residents to 75 percent of the national income average by 1975. The convention said it was "conceived by imbeciles" to "confuse imbeciles." It charged the department has not over the years "raised wages one iota or contributed a single job" to the state's work-force.

The delegates called for united action by every segment of labor to intensify organizing efforts in the state, to use the full extent of the law against companies and officials that interfere with worker organization, and to help workers improve their per capita income.

The convention called for other state reforms also. It urged the legislature to reapportion the three state districts from which judges are elected in line with the one-man, one-vote formula approved by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The delegates also called for the abolition of the justice-of-the-peace fee courts, establishment of a small claims court in each county, and the restructuring of the Mississippi Insurance Commission to represent broad community interests instead of only the interests of the insurance industry.

Walter Holmes, labor liaison officer with the American Red Cross, reported that organization spent $20 million to aid victims of Hurricane Camille. The convention adopted a resolution of thanks for the Red Cross, the Salvation Army and all others who worked or contributed to the relief of counties hard-hit by the Aug. 18 disaster.

The delegates, mindful of a report by State AFL-CIO Pres. Claude Ramsay that insurance adjusters swarmed into the devastated areas "like vultures," called on Congress to replace the 50 state insurance commissions with a nation-wide system of regulation.

Candidates for state office were put on notice that their position on two legislative matters will be reviewed by COPE next year. The two are a revision of the state income tax law to exempt the first $8,000 of income and a law to require all state legislators to reveal their outside income in excess of $500.

Ramsay and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight were re-elected without opposition for new two-year terms.

Teachers' Foe Opposed For Top Education Post

Chicago—The AFL-CIO has expressed "alarm and concern" at the possibility of Sidney Marland, Jr., being appointed U.S. Commissioner of Education and vowed to oppose his confirmation in the Senate if he is nominated by Pres. Nixon.

Marland is "the avowed enemy of collective bargaining for teachers," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said, citing his public role in attacking the American Federation of Teachers during a representation election in Pittsburgh, where he was superintendent of schools.

"When the AFT won the election, Marland quit," the council noted. "Since then he has been engaged in the so-called 'school voucher' campaign which we denounced earlier as an attack on the public school system."

Marland, currently president of the Institute for Educational Development in New York, has been identified in press reports as the "No. 1 candidate" for the post of commissioner, vacated recently by Dr. James E. Allen, Jr., after public differences with the Administration.

Dr. Allen was also Assistant Secretary for Education at HEW, but press reports indicate Marland is being considered only for the commissioner's post.

"We hold in high regard the office of Commissioner of Education," the council statement said. "We believe it must be held by a man who believes fully in the public school system and the need for quality education.

"Marland meets none of these tests," the council concluded.

The education voucher plan being tested by the Office of Economic Opportunity was condemned by the council as "one of the most bizarre proposals yet to emanate from within the Nixon Administration."

The voucher plan would undermine the public school system by opening the way for private corporations to get into education for profit, the council said.

Airline Clerks Pledged Full Strike Support

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted its "wholehearted support" of the Railway & Airline Clerks on strike against Northwest Airlines and urged travelers not to patronize the carrier until settlement is reached "on an equitable basis."

Nearly 3,500 members of BRAC have been on strike since July 8 for improved wages and working conditions, the council noted in a statement.

The strike has reduced Northwest flight operations to less than 10 percent of normal but the company has "refused to negotiate salary and benefit payments on a par with those prevailing on many other airlines," the statement said. It declared:

"We wholeheartedly support the BRAC strike and call upon the management to begin to negotiate a fair and equitable settlement to end this dispute at an early date."

Cornell Appoints 2 ACWA Officials

Ithaca, N.Y.—Two vice presidents of the Clothing Workers, Jacob Sheinkman and Louis Hollander, were elected to posts by the board of trustees of Cornell University.

Sheinkman, who also is general counsel of the ACWA and a graduate of Cornell, was named a trustee. Hollander was designated trustee-emeritus and re-elected to another one-year term on the advisory council of the university's New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations. Hollander also received a medallion for 25 years of service to Cornell.

Pitfalls Cited In Amendment To Aid Women

Warning of hidden dangers, the AFL-CIO has urged the House to reject the so-called equal rights for women amendment to the Constitution in its present form.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, in a letter to all congressmen, pointed out that the amendment, as it is now written, "will jeopardize, if not destroy, existing state laws designed to protect working women."

These state laws "provide protection needed for such women workers from low wages, long hours and other substandard conditions of employment," Biemiller said. "They are important laws and should be protected."

Since the House will consider the measure under discharge procedures, which makes amendments impossible, Biemiller said there was no alternative but to defeat the bill. "In its present form, it could have serious adverse effects and consequences, many of them now unforeseen, in such fields as family relations, social security, property laws and the draft, to name only a few," Biemiller wrote.

The bill would amend the Constitution to assure that "equality of right" shall not be denied to any person on account of sex.

Victory in the Fields

IN 1960, THE AFL-CIO embarked on a campaign to organize California farm workers and established the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee.

Over the years, the AWOC, while never forming a viable union, did succeed in raising wage scales for farm workers and it did win better conditions in the field. In 1965, the AWOC started the strike in the grape fields in Delano. That strike was shortly joined by an independent organization headed by Cesar Chavez.

Four years ago this month, in this city, these two organizations merged and the AFL-CIO chartered them as the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Now, after four years of trial and battle, the UFWOC has won the most significant victory in the collective bargaining history of agricultural workers in the United States.

The success of the UFWOC in achieving victory in the table grape fields in California is a story of courage, determination, and dedication which will always rank high in the annals of trade union history.

The heroes of the UFWOC victory were the strikers in Delano. But their victory would not have been possible if it had not been for the help and assistance of countless trade union members across the land, who supported the grape boycott—one of the most successful in history.

Today the AFL-CIO hails the accomplishments of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, under the leadership of Director Cesar Chavez, Assistant Director Larry Itliong, and their fellow officers. They have succeeded in their first major fight, but they know, and we know, that this must be only the beginning.

We are determined to bring the benefits and rights of collective bargaining to other farm workers around the country.

We, and the UFWOC, intend to do this in the same kind of a systematic, sensible program that achieved victory in Delano.

The UFWOC and the AFL-CIO intend to jointly map, mount and win—on a crop-by-crop basis—collective bargaining rights for farm workers throughout America.

At the same time, we intend to continue the AFL-CIO's legislative fight to assure the farm worker of exactly the same rights under all federal statutes that are held by all other workers.

The AFL-CIO has constantly reiterated its belief that the farm worker deserves and must have exactly the same rights, privileges and benefits as held by all other free American workers. And that goal we intend to achieve.

The 1970 Election

THE AFL-CIO has always encouraged full voter participation. We work among union members and members of their family in campaigns to see that all are registered, informed about the issues, aware of the candidates' voting record and vote on Election Day.

This year, we must redouble our efforts. We must make registration and get-out-the-vote a priority activity to the end that a record number of voters goes to the polls on Nov. 3.

We call on all segments of organized labor to make this year's election drive the best in labor' history.

The Grapes Are Sweet Again

A Word Edgewise:

Vietnamese Prison Scandal Was an 'Avoidable Mini-Crisis'

By John P. Roche

THERE ARE TIMES when it seems as though our efforts in Viet Nam were simply jinxed from the start. Certainly events there over the past decade have provided strong support for Murphy's Law: "If anything can go wrong, it will."

Of course, these misfortunes brighten the day of Americans opposed to our intervention. But for those of us who believe in our strategic objectives in Southeast Asia, it has been one sad headline after another. There are times when I almost share Theodore Draper's somber assessment that since the United States is incapable of intelligent, effective intervention, we ought to stay home.

Almost—but not quite. The stakes are too great and the power of the United States is such that isolationism becomes a form of intervention. In the Middle East, for example, American disengagement would concede the field to the Soviets and Arabs and lead to the destruction of Israel. (Even Draper puts the Middle East in a special category.) So we have to keep trying. . . .

The Con Son prison scandal is another completely avoidable mini-crisis. Leaving aside some of the doubtful evidence—an amazing number of Americans seem to be fluent in Vietnamese; at least so one might gather from the detailed stories of what ex-prisoners confided to American relief workers—the conditions in Vietnamese prisons are dreadful.

Not perhaps by Asian standards, though that is no excuse. Few Americans are prepared to judge by Asian standards, and in fact this is one of our great virtues. We may be hopeless naifs, but by God, we do believe our allies should behave differently from, say, the North Vietnamese or Red Chinese.

For several years various Americans, both inside the government and out, have been urging that prison reform be given a high priority by the American Mission in Saigon.

At least one authority urged that Con Son be closed down as a prison and made into a memorial to the Vietnamese patriots who suffered there under the French. (It was then called Poulo Condore and was the equivalent of Devil's Island.) He thought this would be a striking symbol of the Thieu government's break with the past.

These suggestions fell on deaf ears, although the Saigon government did take steps to clean up the capital's prisons. Inevitably critics hit a stone wall—the Public Safety Division of the American Mission, technically a branch of the Agency for International Development. Staffed in my experience by former small town police chiefs, county sheriffs, and other surplus peace officers, the PSD was living in a world of its own.

A personal recollection may provide the flavor. Two days after I arrived in Saigon in the spring of 1966, I was gassed. I was standing peacefully on the sidewalk on Tu Do street when 40 or 50 kids in saffron robes came rushing by yelling. They stopped in the center of town and put up a Buddhist flag.

Suddenly the riot police appeared and started throwing tear gas grenades. My guess is they threw one for each kid, which at $20 each was an expensive exercise. Beyond that, they gassed me, and everybody else within 100 yards. A hell of a way to control a micro-riot.

NEXT MORNING in a wheezing rage I started inquiring why the police didn't use water to break up such riots. I was referred to one of the chiefs in Public Safety, who condescendingly told me water wouldn't be strong enough.

I told him my father had been a fireman, so he shifted gears: in Saigon there were no fire hydrants. I told him there were no hydrants in roughly 90 percent of the United States, but there were water trucks and 1,000-gallon pumpers. He said snipers might shoot the firemen. I quit and went in search of the AID director, who—perhaps fortunately—was off in IV Corps.

This was no way to handle riots. Sure, the high school kids were hired by the An Quang Buddhists, for a couple of hundred piastres, to tear up the town, but New York police deal with tougher situations every Saturday night without gassing up the neighborhood.

In Saigon, however, high policy was at the mercy of nitwits who taught the police to deal with a mob of 50 kids as if the latter were 50,000 armed professionals.

The first principle of the Public Safety advisers was to avoid "politics," which meant that the Vietnamese were left to run their own jails, riot police, etc. We are now paying the penalty for our reluctance to intervene enough.

Executive Council Statement:

Balanced National Economy Needed for Full Employment

The following is excerpted from a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the national economy, Aug. 3, 1970, Chicago, Ill.

THE WORST combination of economic trends continues to plague the American people. Unemployment is rising, the cost of living continues to climb, and interest rates remain close to record levels.

After more than one and one-half years, the Administration's policies have produced an economic recession and extortionate interest rates, while inflation is still not under control.

All Americans are being squeezed by the accelerated rise of living costs—from 4.2 percent in 1968 to 5.4 percent in 1969 and about 6 percent since December. Wage and salary earners are being pressed further by cuts in working hours which reduce take-home pay, and by layoffs.

In June, real spendable weekly earnings of non-supervisory workers in private non-farm employment—over 47 million wage and salary earners—were below year-ago levels for the fifteenth consecutive month. Moreover, the buying power of weekly earnings, after federal taxes, was less than in 1965. Most workers have had little if any gain in the buying power of their earnings in the past five years, after only modest improvements in 1960-1965.

Unemployment started its upward trend in the spring of 1969, as the Administration's tight squeeze on the economy began to choke off economic activities. Between last December and June, unemployment jumped 1.1 million—to 3.9 million or 4.7 percent of the labor force. While the growing numbers of unemployed are concentrated among unskilled and semi-skilled workers, there have also been increasing layoffs of skilled, technical and professional workers.

Residential construction has been set back drastically, both by a lack of available funds and by extortionate interest rates.

Cutbacks of business plans for plant and machinery outlays, in the coming weeks—with accompanying cuts of inventories—can deepen the recessionary trend.

But even if the decline should bottom out during the next several months, as the Administration predicts, unemployment is expected to continue to rise through the remainder of 1970 and into 1971. Moreover, high unemployment is expected to remain into 1972, on the basis of the Administration's own forecast. A major and growing share of the burden of the Administration's economic policies is being borne by wage and salary earners.

There is no substantial rise of economic activities in sight.

A small increase of sales and production, in the year ahead, will be far from sufficient to create the large and growing number of job opportunities that are needed.

Last December, Congress granted the President broad authority to curb the specific causes of credit inflation, to impose interest rate ceilings and to expand credit for needed housing, public facilities and regular business operations.

Confronted by the President's failure to use this authority, we urge the Congress, again, to direct the Federal Reserve System to establish selective credit controls, to establish maximum interest rates on specific types of loans and the allocation of credit to where it will do the most good for America. We believe this is a matter of great urgency—to direct the flow of available credit, at reasonable interest rates, into housing, public facilities and the regular operations of business.

We urge the Congress to adopt the legislation needed to require that a portion of such tax-exempt funds as pension, college endowment and foundation funds—as well as bank reserves—be invested in government-guaranteed mortgages to help meet the goal of 26 million housing units in 10 years.

Government action is needed to curb the price-raising ability of the dominant corporations and to curtail the greatly increasing concentration of economic power in a narrowing group of huge corporations and banks. In pursuit of this objective, a thorough investigation by the Congress of the structure of the American economy is long overdue.

THE SPECIFIC CAUSES of soaring pressures on living costs, such as physicians' fees, hospital charges, housing costs and auto insurance, should be examined and practical, sensible measures to dampen these pressures should be developed.

Above all, policies are needed to revitalize the economy—to get America on the road to full employment as rapidly as possible.

If the President determines that the situation requires overall stabilization measures—after the establishment of selective credit controls—the AFL-CIO will cooperate. But such mandatory controls must be equitably placed on all costs and incomes—including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation, as well as employes' wages and salaries.

The House has already given these powers—with the exception of profit controls—to the President on a stand-by basis. Obviously profit freezes would have to be included to achieve equity if controls are ever imposed.

We need an expanding supply of money and credit, at reasonable interest rates, to stimulate the required expansion of economic activity.

We need the full funding of federal appropriations for such socially vital requirements as housing, education, health care, community facilities and hospitals—and the federal government must establish a public-service employment program to create jobs for the long-term unemployed and seriously under-employed in providing badly needed public services. The soundest way to balance the federal budget is to balance the American economy.

We urge the Administration and the Congress to move immediately to measures that can quickly get America on the road to full employment—with job opportunities, at decent wages, for all those who are able to work and seeking employment.

Federal Subsidies Urged:

Political Cost Spiral Favors Rich, GOP

THE CONGRESSIONAL and other elections this year, and the 1972 presidential election even more sharply, raise again the issue of the financing of political campaigns. This problem grows even more acute, due to the spiraling costs of campaigns, yet not even a start has been made on a rational solution.

It has been authoritatively estimated that political campaign spending for all offices, federal, state and local, totaled at least $300 million in 1968, an increase of 50 percent from the $200 million estimated for 1964. A major factor in this rising cost of political campaigns is the increasing use and the increasing costs of television. The FCC estimates that over $59 million was spent on TV in 1968 political campaigns, up from $34.6 million in 1964; and if production and other costs are added, the 1968 total was about $90 million. That is nearly one-third of the total costs of all campaigns.

This increasing cost of politics means that there will be ever greater reliance by parties and candidates on contributions by the very wealthy; or that only the rich may run; or that the government must in some way start helping to finance campaign costs. We favor the last alternative, but it is the first two that are currently prevailing.

These developments not only increase the not always wholesome political influence of the rich, but give a great advantage to Republican candidates, since the rich usually support Republicans. A recent study in Fortune Magazine (March 1970) discloses that in 1968, 46 of the nation's richest industrialists, i.e., those with fortunes of $150 million or more, gave $984,000 to Republican candidates and committees, but only $121,000 to Democrats. During the same year, 68 members of the Business Council (and their wives) gave $257,925 to the Republicans but only $83,000 to the Democrats. Thus it is hardly surprising that during the 1968 presidential campaign the Republicans outspent the Democrats more than two-to-one.

In view of the closeness of the 1968 election, it is quite likely that the result would have gone the other way had the candidates had equal financial resources. In 1972, Pres. Nixon will enjoy in addition the advantage that accrues to an incumbent President, not least in continual access to TV and the other mass media. If the continuing vitality of the democratic system is to be assured, Congress must act now to assure adequate and equitable financing of presidential campaign costs.

THE AFL-CIO has long favored direct federal subsidies to help meet the costs of presidential campaigns. This is not a novel or radical idea: it was advanced by Theodore Roosevelt early in the century. If a federal subsidy works well for presidential campaigns, it could later be extended to congressional races.

Other forms of federal financing that have been suggested are tax credits and tax deductions. We regard a small tax credit as an acceptable, though less desirable, alternative; but are opposed to any tax deduction for political contributions. A tax deduction would make it cheaper for those in the higher tax brackets to contribute than for those in the lower and there is no conceivable justification for that.

TV and radio stations operate under license from the federal government, and the frequencies they use are owned by the public. We see no reason why licensees, who pay nothing for the use of the airwaves, should make a profit from campaigns for public office. We urge that TV and radio stations be required to provide specified amounts of free time for presidential and congressional political campaigns.

An acceptable alternative approach is Sen. Pastore's proposal to fix ceilings on TV and radio expenditures in political campaigns, and to require licensees to sell time for campaigning at the lowest unit rate charged for the time segment.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council urges the Congress to enact legislation. (1) for public financing of presidential campaigns, and (2) to insure the availability on an equitable basis of TV and radio for political broadcasts in presidential and congressional campaigns.

Statistical Gaps Leave Story Of Job Injuries Only Half-Told

WIDELY-ACCEPTED statistics may tell only half the "appalling" story of the yearly toll of job-related injuries, AFL-CIO safety specialist George Taylor disclosed as he renewed the call for a strong federal occupational safety and health law.

As many as 4 million workers—twice the number reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics—probably suffer disabling on-the-job injuries each year, said Taylor, executive secretary of the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health.

He pointed out that the BLS figures are based on "information submitted by 17 states." Even less is known about the toll of occupational health hazards from chemicals and other substances, he said, because they are harder to identify than "conventional safety hazards."

Appearing on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Taylor said the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions have mounted a campaign both on Capitol Hill and at the local level for passage of the occupational health and safety measure sponsored by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.).

Taylor said chances for winning a federal job safety law are better this year than in the past, "since the President has already sent Congress an occupational health and safety message, together with proposed legislation."

"The issue now . . . is not if there is to be a bill, but what kind," he declared.

The Daniels approach, he said, is much more effective than the Administration's proposal to create a board to "promulgate the standards of safety and health," which would "break the regulatory processes . . . and decision-making into too many independent elements to get a coherent and day-to-day program going."

THE "APPALLING" STORY of job-related injuries is only half-told in the widely-accepted statistics published by the government, George Taylor, center, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Gershon Fishbein, left, editor of Environmental Health Letter, and Roy McGhee of United Press International.

August Rise in Living Costs Keeps Pace with Thermometer

By Sidney Margolius

AUGUST IS A MONTH of high food prices, home furnishings sales and continued high living costs. These now are running about 6 percent higher than a year ago on top of last year's 6 percent jump—steepest rise since 1951.

What are the main problems causing these increases in living costs—those a family might need to concentrate on to protect itself at least a little from the ravages of inflation? These are the items that have gone up a lot recently and take a big share of your budget in any case.

Some of these troublemakers may lend themselves to closer family control. Others you may not be able to do much about, at least on your own. The four leading culprits this years are:

Meat—This is the item that has had the single most important impact on your living costs, because of its steep rise and the large part of your living costs it takes. Meats have gone up over 9 percent in the past 12 months. Meat, poultry and fish usually take one-fourth of all your food costs and actually about 6 percent of all of the living expenses of the working family. This is more than you spend for fuel and utilities, or furniture and appliances.

What is especially damaging to moderate-income families is that some of the meats usually considered "cheap" have gone up most as families turned to these to replace the usually expensive cuts. For example, hamburger, by last spring, had gone up 11 percent (fattier and whiter than ever, too), and frankfurters and bologna, 14 percent. Bologna at a national average of $1.13 a pound now is not much less expensive than round steak at $1.33. Don't let those 3½, 4 and 6-ounce packages dupe you into thinking bologna is still a cheap food.

Pork has gone up even more than beef since last year, especially sausage and hams.

Homeownership Costs—These have gone up 11 percent, with the sharpest rise in mortgage interest —15 percent. Housing costs in general take 33 percent of a typical working family's budget.

Medical Care—Costs in general have been the most persistent inflationary force, rising 6 percent again this year for a total rise of 63 percent since 1957-59. Medical care now takes 6.5 percent of a typical budget. The main culprits are the rise in hospital charges of 12 percent in the past 12 months, and of 7 percent in doctors' fees.

Auto Insurance—It has become the third largest expense of car ownership outranked only by car purchase and gasoline expenses. Car costs themselves are now the third largest item in your cost of living, outranked only by housing and food. The jump of 14 percent in auto insurance prices this year has had a noticeable inflationary impact on the entire cost of living. The average family now spends more for auto insurance alone than for all public transportation.

OTHER COSTS TO WATCH—While less important in your total expenses than the big four listed above, several other items have gone up unduly and need extra comparison-shopping. One is white bread, with a total rise of over 33 percent since 1957-59—much higher than for other baked goods.

The other noticeable sharp jump is on coffee, with both the roasters and retailers making extra profit on their inventory as prices rise.

One alert housewife reports she found three price changes on a three-pound can of the private-brand coffee she buys. The top sticker said $2.62; the sticker under that, $2.54; sticker under that, $2.45; price stamped on the can itself, $2.39.

White Sales—August is a white sale month. The Justice Dept. has charged five big companies with conspiring to fix retail prices on their top brand-name lines of sheets. The companies are J. P. Stevens, Cannon, Spring Mills, Westpoint-Pepperell and Lowenstein.

The second-line sheets are little different in quality for a saving of 40 percent, and are available in current sales around the $2.50-$3 price for twin no-iron sheets of 50-50 polyester and cotton.

Furniture Sales—August is the month of furniture and rug sales. Furniture business has been slow this year and stores are promoting hard with some deception noticeable again. Especially beware stores that advertise a complete room or rooms of furniture at a seemingly cheap price for the group. For example, the Detroit Better Business Bureau reports a furniture store advertised: "A Four Room Outfit, $118." But investigation showed that the "outfit" really cost $118 for each room.

38,000 Injuries:

Defensive Driving Aids Cyclists, Too

THE NATION'S approximately 50 million bicycle riders have been appearing on streets, sidewalks and parks. The National Safety Council urges that both cyclists and motorists operate their respective vehicles defensively. In 1968, there were about 800 fatalities and 38,000 injuries resulting from collisions between bicycles and motor vehicles.

About three-quarters of the bicycle-motor vehicle collisions take place in the six-month period from April through September.

According to a recent council study, more boys than girls become involved in these collisions. The study also determined that bicycle-motor vehicle accidents were about 50 percent more prevalent among children in the 10 to 14 age group than children below age 10. The reason seems to be that younger cyclists are more likely to ride on sidewalks and other non-traffic areas.

Parents are advised not to buy bicycles that are too big for their children, and then provide blocks for the bicycle pedals. The council's study suggests that the child riding a bicycle too big for him is involved in more accidents—due to falls—than a child on a bicycle of the correct size. These accidents often result in head and face injuries to the young cyclist.

THE COUNCIL OFFERS some tips on riding a bicycle in traffic. These should be observed by every cyclist interested in safety:

- Ride with traffic on the right side of the road, not against traffic on the left.
- Walk bicycles across heavily traveled intersections. To turn left at an intersection, stay to the right, dismount and walk the bicycle across one street, then head left to the opposite corner.
- If you ride in a group, travel single file, not side by side.
- Use hand signals to show the direction you intend to turn.
- If you ride at night, have a white front lamp and a red rear light in good working order. Reflective tape and light-colored clothing are also recommended.
- Use both hands to control the bicycle at all times (except when signaling). Attach a basket or rack to the bicycle if you intend to carry books or packages when riding.

The council feels that because a large proportion of bicycle accidents take place in residential areas, closer parental supervision is necessary.

According to the council, the basic problem seems to be that the average child primarily considers his bicycle as a toy rather than a vehicle. What is needed is proper safety education for the child, parental responsibility, and further awareness of the presence of cyclists by the motoring public.

Dream About the Good Times, But Don't Try to Relive Them

By Jane Goodsell

ONCE IN AN AIRPORT I got into conversation with a very nice couple who were on their way to Hawaii for a second honeymoon. They told me that they'd asked for, and been lucky enough to get, the very same room in the same hotel they'd stayed at 28 years ago when she was a blushing bride and he an ensign in the Navy.

I never saw them again so I've no idea how things turned out, but I hope they had a better time than I imagine they did. I thought about them a lot. Couldn't get them out of my head.

I'd see them in my mind's eye gazing in dismay at a small, dark hotel room which they'd romantically remembered as being airy and spacious with a beautiful view of the ocean. I imagined them doggedly re-enacting the roles of honeymooners—dancing cheek-to-cheek in the Starlight Room—when both would have preferred to sit on the veranda and talk about their grandchildren.

I kept hearing them, too. Her saying, "Every time we went dancing, you asked the orchestra leader to play our song, remember, honey?"

And him saying, "Of course I remember, sweetheart, as if it were yesterday. Funny your mentioning it because I was just about to do it as a surprise for you. Say—uh—sweetheart, what's the name of that song of ours anyway?"

I hope it wasn't like that at all, and that their second honeymoon turned out to be everything they hoped for. But it seems to me highly unlikely. Nothing is ever the same the second time around, and no amount of careful planning can make it so.

A FEW YEARS AGO, my husband and I vacationed at a remote beach resort on the west coast of Mexico. We found it utterly charming, and we cocked our eyebrows at the disgruntled souls who thought it crowded, touristy and outrageously expensive. To our remonstrances that we considered it anything but, they told us that we should have seen it several years ago when it was unspoiled.

Undaunted by the lesson this should have taught us, we ourselves made a return trip several years later to our Shangri-La. Needless to say, we found it crowded, touristy and outrageously expensive, not at all the same place we remembered.

Thomas Wolfe put it aptly in the title of a book he wrote: You Can't Go Home Again. Indeed you can't, and you shouldn't try. There is a time and a place for everything, and the past ought to stay safely tucked away in memory where it belongs.

Register-Vote Drive Pressed By IUD Board

Chicago—Increased participation in the 1970 election campaigns was urged on the 6 million members of the 60 affiliates in the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

A resolution adopted by the IUD executive board called for full cooperation in voter registration drives, get-out-the-vote activities and other political action programs "on behalf of candidates and office holders who have demonstrated their dedication to human dignity and progress."

The resolution also commended "those forward-looking congressmen and senators who have stood up for social progress during the last two years" and recommended intense efforts toward their re-election.

The IUD further called for affirmative steps by the Nixon Administration to solve the nation's economic crisis.

"What is needed, is application of selective measures that curb specific trouble spots and permit workers and consumers to share in the benefits of economic expansion," the resolution declared.

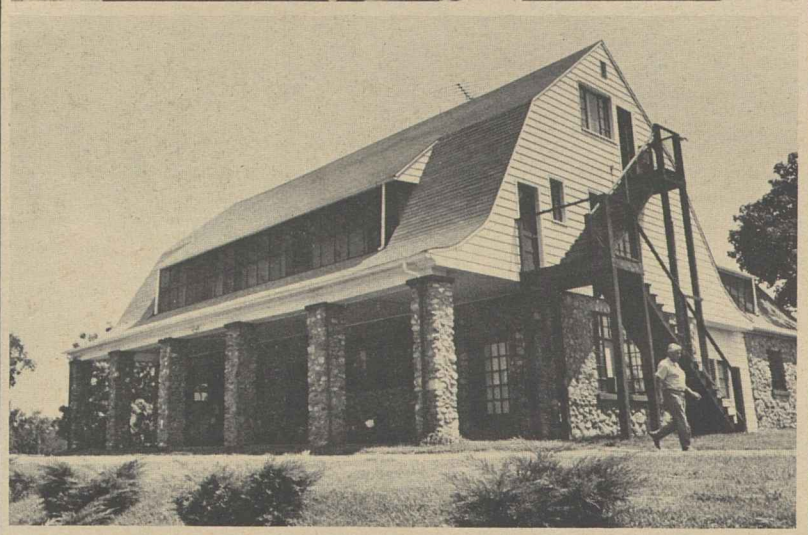
IUD Pres. I. W. Abel said that "it is our belief that the Nixon Administration's efforts have been misguided and misdirected. The anti-inflation program simply is not working."



The board also urged affiliates, their members and the public to support the occupational health and safety bill sponsored by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.). It called for a continuing campaign to get the bill through the House Rules Committee and onto the floor for a vote.

In other action, the IUD board:

- Pledged full support of the Auto Workers efforts in their industry-wide contract negotiations.
- Endorsed the strike of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers against the RCA Corp.
- Congratulated the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee on its success in negotiating collective bargaining contracts.
- Praised the contributions to the labor movement of Walter P. Reuther, late president of the UAW who also served as president of the IUD from 1955 to 1968. The board announced that the IUD had made a substantial gift to the memorial fund for Reuther and his wife May.

Pres. Matthew Guinan of the Transport Workers was elected to the IUD executive committee.

PROPERTY DEED for the Front Royal Institute, including training facilities and 74 acres of land on the Shenandoah River in northern Virginia, is turned over to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers. The CWA has owned the property for the past 15 years. The federation will continue to allow the site to be used by the American Institute for Free Labor Development as a training center for Latin American labor leaders. The main building, below, houses the dining room, library and student lounge.

Fire Fighters Adopt 1-Man, 1-Vote Policy

Miami Beach—The Fire Fighters adopted a "one-man, one-vote" procedure for use in the election of officers and on convention roll call votes.

Nearly 1,000 delegates to the IAFF's 30th convention voted overwhelmingly to adopt the procedure as the first major piece of business.

The proposal to change the union's voting procedures developed after leaders of a so-called Metro group of big city locals complained that the larger locals were inadequately represented at conventions.

A three-man committee of AFL-CIO Executive Council members evolved the compromise solution which was adopted here. The committee was appointed by Federation Pres. George Meany at the request of the IAFF leadership and the leaders of the big city locals.

Members were Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. Emeritus Paul Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, and the late Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians until his death last month.

The procedure adopted by the Fire Fighters increases the number of delegates for large locals, permits locals with fewer than 100 members to vote by proxy at the convention, and provides that voting on roll calls and for union officers will be on the basis of the total size of each local's membership.

Immediately after the vote, IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan sent telegrams to Meany and Beirne thanking them for their assistance in resolving the one-man, one-vote issue.

In another action, the convention defeated a proposal to allow IAFF officers to establish trusteeships over locals that had violated or ignored provisions of the IAFF constitution.

In his report to the convention, McClennan noted that the union had chartered 213 new locals and gained 12,995 new members since its 1968 convention, setting new records for the union.

"We have built up a momentum of which all of us can be proud," McClennan said, noting that the union now has organized over 65 percent of its jurisdiction.

McClennan also reported that since the 1968 Fire Fighters' convention removed the no-strike clause from the IAFF constitution, collective bargaining negotiations at the local union level have proved increasingly effective.

Rail Yardmasters Elect A. T. Otto as President

Chicago—The Railroad Yardmasters elected A. T. Otto, Jr., of Wellsburg, W.Va., as president at the union's 30th convention here. He had been a vice president of the union and its representative on the National Railroad Adjustment Board, fourth division.

Otto was unopposed as successor to R. H. Wachowiak, president since 1965, who anounced his retirement on the second day of the four-day convention. Wachowiak was elected president-emeritus, the first the organization has ever had.

The delegates, in a resolution, also appointed Wachowiak to the national negotiating committee, to serve until the completion of current negotiations. Talks with the carriers' National Railway Labor Conference opened in Washington, July 20.

Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Culver, appointed by the executive board Aug. 1, 1968, to fill the unexpired term of retiring W. A. Snyder, was elected without opposition to a four-year term.

Major speakers at the convention included Chicago Mayor Richard J. Daley, Neil P. Speirs and Howard W. Habermeyer of the Railroad Retirement Board; and Pres. C. J. Chamberlain of the Railroad Signalmen.

In his president's report, Wachowiak summed up achievements of the past four years listing last year's merger with the rival Railroad Yardmasters of North America as a major step forward. Two major wage-rule movements were completed and a third, calling for substantial wage increases and other benefits has been progressed to national handling, he noted.

Several changes in the constitution and by-laws were approved by the delegates, largely to provide for more efficient communication within the union.

Offices of the union here were recently moved to the Consumers Building on State Street, which houses many railroad union headquarters and all divisions of the National Railroad Adjustment Board.

Georgia Cable Plant:

Anti-Union Firm Ruled in Contempt

Atlanta—A company which for nine years has illegally interfered with all attempts by its employes to organize a union has been ruled guilty of civil contempt of court for ignoring two previous court orders to stop its unfair practices.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit voted to enforce findings of a special master that the Southwire Co., which makes wire cable at a plant in Carrollton, Ga., must stop defying the courts and the National Labor Relations Board.

A three-judge panel called the evidence of wrong-doing by Southwire and its president, Roy Richards, "very nearly a textbook model of union-harassment techniques."

Granting a petition by the NLRB for a contempt citation, Judges Bryan Simpson, Lewis R. Morgan and Joe M. Ingraham enforced an order directing Southwire to quit interfering with organizing attempts by its employes and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The order is the fifth by the courts or the labor board since 1961.

The contempt petition charged that, in defeating a 1967 organizing campaign launched by the IUE and another union, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Southwire management violated rulings by the same court in 1963 and 1965.

Judge Simpson wrote the latest decision for the 5th Circuit. He pointed out that in the earlier orders the court forbade Southwire to discourage union membership by unlawfully discriminating against or discharging employes, unlawfully questioning workers, or promising them things of benefit to discourage union support. Yet the firm and Richards smashed the latest organizing efforts by committing exactly the same forbidden acts, the court found.

Among the illegal actions of the company before the 1967 election, the court cited:

- A poll of employes conducted in a "stark anti-union atmosphere."
- The hiring of detectives to spy on the union activities of workers.
- A six-month delay of a wage increase in an obviously timed effort to influence the voting.
- The threatening of three employes for wearing union buttons.
- Discrimination against seven union activists and the firing of a woman because her husband was a union supporter.

The judges rejected a company argument that the hearing officer, appointed by the court in 1968, had prejudiced the company case by "taking judicial notice" of four cases in which the court affirmed board findings of unfair labor practices by Southwire.

The court quoted the master's findings that unquestionably "the company possesses deep-seated anti-union animus not only as recorded in prior proceedings of this court, but as clearly demonstrated by its vigorous opposition to the 1967 union organizing campaign" reflected in printed matter distributed to its employes.

There was "abundant proof of anti-union animus independent of the prior labor history and the prior court decisions," the judges found.

They said the master's finding that the company's poll of employes was unlawful is supported by "convincing evidence." They cited this language of one poll: "Now I ask all of you who are (1) undecided and (2) want the question settled by a secret-ballot election and (3) all of you who do not want a union here at Southwire to raise your hands."

ACWA Post Goes To Jane O'Grady

New York—The Clothing Workers named Miss Jane O'Grady as the union's Washington legislative representative, a post she had held until 1968, when she left to work in the same capacity for the Committee for Community Affairs.

ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky said in announcing the appointment that Miss O'Grady has been a "very effective spokesman" and a valued staff member. She succeeds Mrs. Esther Peterson, who was given a leave of absence to become a consumer affairs adviser for Giant Foods, a Washington supermarket chain.

Miss O'Grady attended Douglass College in New Jersey and has a master's degree in sociology from the University of California. She started work for ACWA in 1956.

LABOR'S HIGHEST AWARD—the Murray-Green medallion—is presented to John W. Gardner, chairman of the National Urban Coalition, by AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis, left, in Chicago. The award was to have been made in May at the CSC national conference, but the conference banquet was cancelled because of the death of Walter P. Reuther, late president of the Auto Workers. Gardner was Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare in the Johnson Administration.

Postal Reform Bill Sent to President

A postal reform bill that includes an historic breakthrough on collective bargaining and an 8 percent pay raise for some 730,000 postal employes moved toward final enactment.

The bill will also compress pay schedules to enable a postal worker to reach top pay after eight years instead of the previous 21 years. The 8 percent pay increase is retroactive to April 16 and is in addition to the 6 percent raise postal and other government employes received earlier this year.

The final version of the bill, which was worked out in conference committee, was passed by the Senate on a 57 to 7 vote and subsequently by the House on a 339 to 29 vote.

The postal reform bill has had a long and tortuous route through Congress since an agreement between the AFL-CIO and the Administration last April paved the way for the new legislation. That agreement came on the heels of strikes by postal employes in several cities.

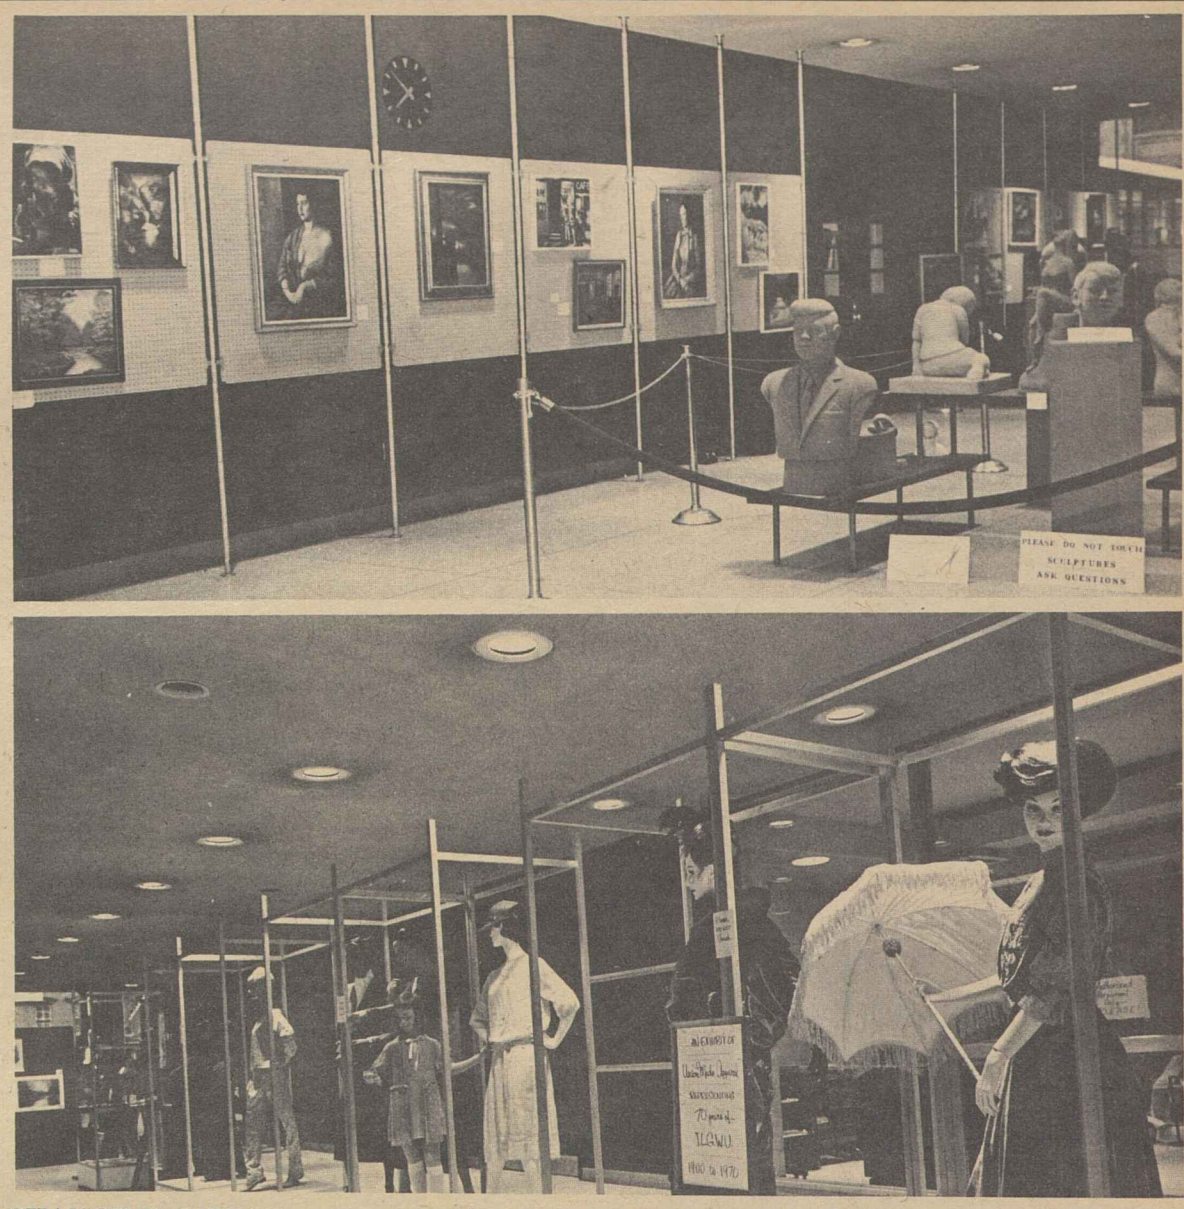
The final version of the bill gives postal workers the right to bargain collectively over wages and working conditions for the first time in history. Strikes are forbidden, but the new law provides for binding arbitration.



The earlier Senate version of the bill gave unions and management the right to negotiate a union shop, but that provision was stricken in conference committee. The Senate accepted the deletion after the full House had instructed its conferees to hold out for elimination of the union shop clause.

During the two-year transition period before the service is fully turned over to an independent board, only the seven AFL-CIO unions which have exclusive, nationwide contracts will be allowed to bargain over wages. After the transition period, the two regional independents can also bargain with the new board.

One of the last differences delaying passage of the bill was House insistence that Congress retain the power to set postal rates. That was finally worked out in conference committee with the authority turned over to the new service—but with some restrictions on how fast the rates can be increased.

Some of the provisions in the measure creating the new United States Postal Service include:

- The appointment by the President of nine members of the board of governors, with Senate confirmation required. Those nine will then choose a Postmaster General and a deputy, bringing the board to its full strength of 11. The Postmaster General will be the chief executive officer for the board of governors but will no longer serve in the Cabinet.
- Appointment of five members to a special rate-setting commission. These five, appointed by the President without Senate confirmation, will serve staggered, eight-year terms and their decisions on postal rates may be overridden only by unanimous vote of the 11 governors. If the commission can't reach a decision in 90 days, the governors may install a temporary rate schedule, but with increases of not more than one-third—thus the 6-cent, first-class rate could be increased only to 8 cents.
- A restriction on the rates set by the commission during the first five years. It may not raise second- and third-class volume rates more than 20 percent in any year for profit-making mailers or more than 10 percent in any year for nonprofit institutions.
- Government subsidies on a declining scale so that the new service is totally on its own after 12 years.

An exhibition of arts and crafts by ILGWU members also is being held at the institute to mark the 70th anniversary of the union.

Virginia Labor Backs Constitution Revisions

Norfolk—The Virginia AFL-CIO at its 15th convention came out in support of revisions of the state constitution to be voted on at the Nov. 3 general election.

The delegates accepted an officers' report urging no slackening of labor's effort to assure that all union members register and vote. They agreed that full affiliation of every AFL-CIO local union with the state body is essential to continue the progress that made 1969 a "golden year of achievement" for labor in the state.

Pres. Julian F. Carper said the past year was "golden" because labor helped break the domination of the formerly all-powerful Harry Byrd political machine and in that year also bought and moved into a permanent home.

For the first time in many years, Carper said, Virginia now has a genuine two-party system.

The convention was host to Gov. A. Linwood Holton (R) and most candidates for the U.S. Senate and House. At a COPE convention, the delegates endorsed George Rawlings, Fredericksburg Democrat, for the seat now held by Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., who is running as an independent without Democratic party endorsement.

The convention was originally scheduled to be held in Roanoke but was moved to Norfolk because of a labor dispute with a contractor building an addition to the Roanoke hotel.

Endorsement of the revised state constitution was made on the ground that the change will "increase borrowing capacity to meet the state's needs, conservation and the quality of our environment; and give increased flexibility for local governments to deal with their problems," better protection of the right to vote, annual sessions of the legislature, and "a commitment to high-quality education for our children."

In other convention actions the delegates:

- Called on the city of Norfolk to repeal an "unconstitutional law" prohibiting membership in the Fire Fighters.
- Supported a campaign of the Office & Professional Employes to organize bank employes.
- Opposed the award by the Virginia Electric & Power Co. of contracts to non-union contractors "using imported labor while consumers pay the bill in increased rates."

The governor expressed his appreciation for labor's "support and cooperation" in the 1969 election and announced he intends to appoint a representative from labor on the Virginia Port Authority.

Sen. Gurney Challenged on Legality Of Fund-Raising Drive for Carswell

Sen. Edward J. Gurney (R-Fla.), one of the most outspoken opponents of unions in Congress and fund-raiser for the National Right to Work Committee, is in hot water again.

Earlier this year he was charged by the St. Petersburg Times with violating Florida law with his own fund-raising gimmicks and now he has been cited in a Washington Star article as in possible violation of the federal election laws.

The two developments are not related, but both came to light in the wake of Gurney's letter writing efforts—first for a "right to work" attack on the union shop and now on behalf of G. Harrold Carswell's bid for the U.S. Senate from Florida.

According to an article in the Star, Gurney's pitches on behalf of the rejected Supreme Court nominee have contained an enclosed envelope addressed to the Senator at Suite 5109, U.S. Senate.

The Star writer, Pete Laine, goes on to point out that the U.S. Code provides a $5,000 fine and three years in jail for officials, including senators, who receive "money or anything of value for any political purpose" in "any room or building occupied in discharge of official duties."

In answer to a query, Gurney's press aid, Jack Hord, claimed the mailing to the office had been a "slipup" by the fund-raising firm of Richard Viguerie, and that money was no longer being mailed to Gurney's office.

The story notes that Viguerie's firm recently handled fund-raising letters sent out by Republican Senators Barry M. Goldwater (Ariz.) and Howard H. Baker, Jr. (Tenn.), to members of Congress and their employes—also an "apparent violation" of law.

Gurney's latest difficulty brings to mind the letter-writing campaign he conducted from last December into the early months of 1970 to raise a $115,000 war-chest for the National Right to Work Legal Defense & Education Fund.

The cause he championed was an attempt by the "right-to-work" group to finance a legal attack on the union shop, aimed at crippling labor's political activities. His letters then, like his latest ones, were written on his U.S. Senate stationery.

The vehicle for the legal attack, so Gurney boasted, was a court challenge to an agency shop negotiated by Teachers Local 231 in Detroit.

When Gurney continued his letters, even after a state court had dismissed the suit and found that it did not even contain an issue of political use of union funds, Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, charged Gurney with promoting "a semi-fradulent money-raising scheme."

Hord dismissed the effort for "right to work" as "a one-shot deal" that is no longer being tried.

In April, the St. Petersburg Times brought out that Gurney had received a half dozen contributions for his own 1968 campaign that exceeded the Florida election law limit of $1,000 per person or committee.

Symington Wins Easily, Mrs. Romney Edges In

Democratic Sen. Stuart Symington was renominated in a landslide in Missouri and Lenore Romney survived a narrow escape to win the Republican Senate nomination in Michigan.

Symington had almost 375,000 votes to a combined total of 45,000 for four opponents in his bid for a fourth Senate term. He will be opposed in November by 33-year-old State Atty. Gen. John C. Danforth, who won easily in the GOP primary.

Mrs. Romney, wife of George Romney, a three-term governor of Michigan and now Secretary of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, had a surprisingly close race in winning the right to oppose incumbent Democratic Sen. Philip A. Hart. With 92 percent of the vote counted Mrs. Romney had 267,000 votes to 249,000 for conservative State. Sen. Robert Huber.

Michigan Republican Gov. William G. Milliken was renominated and will be opposed by State Sen. Sander M. Levin, who won the Democratic nomination over Zolton Ferency and two others.

All 19 incumbent congressmen were renominated in Michigan, as were all nine incumbents in Missouri.

In other primaries, Kansas Republicans nominated State Atty. Gen. Kent Frizzell to run against Democratic Gov. Robert B. Docking, who had labor backing in 1966 and 1968. None of Kansas's five incumbent congressmen, all Republicans, was opposed.

In Idaho, conservative Gov. Don Samuelson was renominated and will be opposed by former State Sen. Cecil Andrus, who won the Democratic primary over two opponents. Idaho's two congressmen, both Republicans, were unopposed and only one will have a Democratic opponent in November.

'Half-Loaf' Measure:

Jobless Benefits Bill Cleared by Senate

The Senate passed and sent to the President a bill extending unemployment insurance coverage to 4.75 million workers.

The bill, regarded as a "half-loaf" measure by organized labor, leaves some 12 million workers still unprotected, including more than 1 million farm workers.

A final effort to extend coverage to about 275,000 of the nation's farm workers died on the Senate floor, just as it did in the House two weeks earlier. Senate liberals sought to send the bill back to conference committee with instructions to the conferees to hold fast for the farm workers' provision, but they lost a 50 to 19 vote.

The provision was in the original Senate bill but was killed in conference. It would have extended unemployment coverage to large corporate farms with eight or more employes on the payroll for 26 weeks of the year.

The new law includes a special increase in jobless benefits for times of severe unemployment. It includes a "trigger" point of 4.5 percent percent insured unemployment for three consecutive months. When that point is reached, workers who have exhausted their state benefits and are still jobless become eligible for 13 additional weeks of coverage beyond the 26 weeks under present law.

However, the insured unemployment rate lags far behind the national rate, and it is estimated that it would take an overall rate of joblessness in excess of 6 percent for the insured rate to reach 4.5 percent.

Of the 4.75 million workers newly covered by the bill, some 3.1 million are employes of nonprofit organizations such as hospitals and schools. Coverage for another 436,000 public employes is at the option of the state.

The bill also increases the federal payroll tax for unemployment insurance from 3.1 percent to 3.2 percent this year and increases the taxable wage base from $3,000 to $4,200 in 1972.

One of the most vital omissions in the bill is any progress toward a federal floor under the benefits, which the AFL-CIO has sought for some years.

In other congressional developments:

- The House cleared by a 343-to-0 roll call vote, a 15 percent increase in railroad retirement benefits, retroactive to last Jan. 1. The increase parallels the increase in social security benefits passed earlier this year.

The bill also provides for long-range planning on possible revisions of the rail retirement system, with a five-man independent commission instructed to report by June of 1971.

- A bill to put some restrictions on the use of foreign bank accounts by U.S. citizens was approved by the Senate Banking Committee. A similar measure has already passed the House.

The bill calls for U.S. banks to maintain records of certain foreign transactions and would require the disclosure of the name of a person dealing in securities through foreign banks.

It would also require any person importing or exporting more than $10,000 at one time or $20,000 in a year to report such transactions to the U.S. Treasury Dept.

- An $18.1 billion appropriations bill for several independent agencies was passed by the Senate and sent to the White House. The vote was 70 to 8.

The bill, which contains appropriations for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development as well as the Veterans Administration and NASA, is $541 million over the amount requested by the Administration. Consequently, it was one of the measures faced with the possibility of a presidential veto—but the veto threat was mentioned in Senate debate on the bill and 29 of the 37 Republican senators voted for it.

- The House authorized more than $500 million for construction and training of personnel for facilities for the mentally retarded over the next three years. The action came in two bills that will have to be reconciled with Senate versions passed earlier.

The House passed one of the measures 338 to 0 and the other 341 to 1, with the lone dissenting vote coming from Rep. John Schmitz (R-Calif.), one of the two members of the John Birch Society elected in California in special elections this year.

- The House has passed and sent to the Senate a farm bill that puts a $55,000 ceiling on federal subsidies to growers of cotton, wheat and feed grains. The action came after Pres. Nixon wrote to a GOP House member recommending the $55,000 limit.

Musicians Pick Hal Davis as New President

New York—The executive board of the Musicians named Hal C. Davis of Pittsburgh as AFM president succeeding Herman Kenin, who died July 21 after 12 years as the union's chief officer.

Davis had been vice president of the AFM since 1963. He and Kenin were re-elected for new one-year terms at the AFM's Houston convention in June.

To succeed Davis as vice president, the board named Victor W. Fuentealba, president of Baltimore Local 40-543, a long-time member of the AFM governing board. Max L. Arons, president of New York City Local 802, was named to the board.

Davis, 56, is a former professional musician who has headed the Pittsburgh local for 22 years. He worked from 1930 to 1943 as a percussionist, playing drums in night clubs, theaters, and as a staff musician for Pittsburgh radio stations KDKA and WCAE.

He is a vice president of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO and a member of the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts, the Allegheny County Port Authority and the St. John's Hospital board in Pittsburgh. Formerly he was executive director of the Pittsburgh AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Davis attended Duquesne University and served with the Marine Corps in World War II.

Standby Power Given Nixon on Wages, Prices

The House has completed action on a bill to give Pres. Nixon powers to impose wage and price controls if necessary to stem the current tide of inflation.

The measure was attached to a two-year extension of the Defense Production Act, which passed by a vote of 270 to 11. The bill now goes to conference committee to be reconciled with the Senate, which passed the extension of the defense act without the controls provision.

In lengthy debate, the floor manager of the measure, Rep. Wright Patman (D.Tex.), described the bill as "giving the President all the tools that he might need to combat the twin evils of inflation and recession."

House Republicans countered with a charge that the measure was politically motivated, designed by Democrats to place the blame for the nation's economic problems on Nixon when he doesn't use the powers given him. The President has said he will not use the authority.

One maneuver by Republicans was to get the House to impose the controls themselves, rather than giving the power to the president. That proposal was beaten, 270 to 11.

The measure was amended by voice vote to add interest rates to the provisions on wages, prices and rents. Under the authority granted him in the bill, Nixon could apply a temporary freeze at the rates in effect May 25.

The legislation was written by members of the House Banking & Currency Committee, of which Patman is chairman. Democrats on that committee have argued that if nothing else, the bill would give the President more leverage in "his persuasive powers" to hold down increases in prices and wages.

As the House passed the measure, the AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting in Chicago, was repeating its willingness to cooperate in such controls, "if the President determines that the situation requires overall stabilization measures after the establishment of selective credit controls."

"But such mandatory controls must be equitably placed on all costs and incomes," the council said, "including all prices, profits, dividends, rents and executive compensation as well as employes' wages and salaries."

51 Multinational Firms Fight Import Quota Bill

Fifty-one multinational corporations—under the guise of being "all-American" companies—are pressuring Congress to block proposed import quota legislation, the AFL-CIO pointed out in a message to all House members.

"In the interest of fair play—if not fair trade—we believe that Congress should be aware of these companies' non-American interests, particularly that many of these companies have large foreign operations and export goods to the United States," the letter from Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said.

It noted that the so-called Emergency Committee for American Trade ran a full-page advertisement in the Washington Post urging Congress not to enact a trade bill that would place quotas on imports.

These imports have recently cost 700,000 Americans their jobs and threaten many thousands more, Biemiller declared.

The list of firms includes Boeing, Ford, Honeywell, IBM, Singer and Xerox.

The 51 companies in the ad have foreign affiliates in 108 countries and 32 firms have ownership in Japanese companies, many producing the same goods abroad they once produced in the United States, the AFL-CIO said.

"These companies are not American firms in the textbook sense," Biemiller observed. "In matters of U.S. imports, they are no different from any other foreign corporations which ship foreign-made products —often made at pitifully low wages —into the United States to compete with U.S.-made products at the same or only slightly lower prices."

The letter asked: "Wouldn't it be fairer to the reader and to the Congress, for example, if Xerox had identified itself as Fugi-Xerox and Caterpillar Tractor . . . as Caterpillar-Mitsubishi, Ltd.?"

The corporations that paid for the ad should level with Congress and the public by using their real names, the letter urged.

"It would then be clear that these 'American' companies . . . seek more investment abroad, more manufacturing abroad and thus more goods to be shipped into the United States."

Biemiller warned of the impact of these operations, noting that "the losers are American citizens who lose their jobs in machinery, electronic plants, sewing machine plants and many more. Eventually, the loser is the entire American standard of living."

24 Job Centers Hit by Severe Unemployment

Nearly one-sixth of the nation's 150 major job centers are suffering from "substantial" unemployment as the Labor Dept.'s list grew by four to 24—the highest since April 1965.

An area is listed in the category of substantial unemployment when the jobless rate is 6 percent or more and is expected to remain that high for at least two months.

The four new additions are New Britain, Conn.; South Bend, Ind.; Springfield-Chicopee-Holyoke, Mass., and Portland, Ore.-Clark County, Wash.

There were also 27 smaller areas added to the substantial joblessness list for an overall total of 575 across the nation.

Three large cities and 24 counties were listed as having "persistent" unemployment — when a 6 percent or more jobless rate runs for a long period. The cities are Oakland, Newark and Cleveland.

Jobless Rate Jumps Back to 5 Percent

Employment Cut Sharply In Factories

By John R. Oravec

The nation's unemployment rate jumped back to 5 percent in July—the same as the five-year high reached in May—after easing to 4.7 percent in June, the Labor Dept. reported.

A key factor in the increase was the continuing decline in payroll jobs—down 145,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis to 70.5 million. Since March, nonfarm payroll employment has plunged 800,000, an average of 200,000 a month.

Manufacturing jobs were most severely affected by cutbacks last month, the Bureau of Labor Statistic noted.

But even workers who kept their jobs, lost out to rising prices as average weekly earnings were down 1.7 percent for the first six months of the year when adjusted for the increase in living costs, the BLS pointed out.

The July increase in joblessness occurred almost entirely among men under 25 and women over 24, the report showed.

The unemployment rate for men 20-24 years old rose from 7.2 percent in June to 9.1 percent. For all men workers the rate was 3.7 percent, compared with 3.5 percent in June.

For women 20 years old and over, the jobless rate rose from 4.5 percent to 5 percent in July, a return to the May level. This increase takes in women 24 and over, whose rate moved up to 4.5 percent—the highest since 1965.

While workers, the BLS noted, accounted for all the July increase in unemployment as their rate moved up from 4.2 percent to 4.7 percent, the highest in six years. Joblessness for Negroes dipped slightly to 8.3 percent from the June level of 8.7 percent.

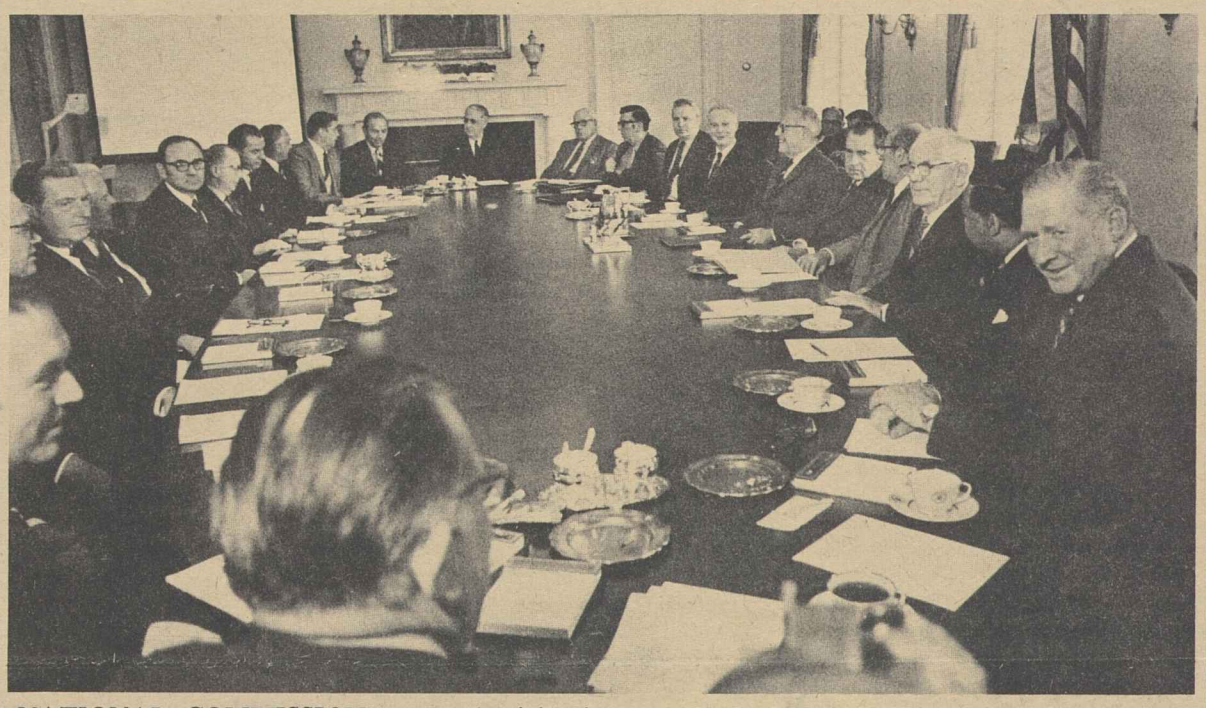
While the number of unemployed persons dropped by 160,000 from June to 4.5 million, the decline was less than usual for the month. After seasonal adjustments, joblessness was up 275,000, the BLS said.

In addition to the 4.5 million workers reported unemployed, the BLS estimated that 600,000 others are also without jobs but are no longer counted as part of the labor force.



Harold Goldstein, assistant commissioner of the BLS, said many

NATIONAL COMMISSION on Productivity is greeted by Pres. Nixon, Dir. George P. Shultz of the Office of the Management & Budget and the Council of Economic Advisers at the commission's first session. The labor contingent on the panel is headed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Bid to Save HUD Funds Is Defeated

The House dealt Pres. Nixon his second jolt in 45 days by overriding his veto of the $4.4 billion federal aid to education bill, but then sustained his veto of an $18.8 billion appropriation for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and several other agencies.

The vote to override Nixon's veto of the education measure was 289 to 114. The measure now goes to the Senate, where Democratic leaders predict they have the 66 votes necessary to override.

The vote to override the second veto was 203-195, decisively short of the two-thirds needed. The House Appropriations Committee will begin work on a new version of the bill, which funds the Veterans Administration, NASA and several other agencies in addition to HUD.

The AFL-CIO strongly urged overriding the vetoes on both measures, terming the President's action "ill-advised." In a letter to all House members, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the federation was "dismayed at the President's refusal to accept congressional efforts to re-order the nation's spending priorities and more adequately fund critical domestic needs."

A bitter exchange of political charges surrounded the two vetoes, with congressional Democrats fighting back at Nixon's attempt to brand them as "fiscally irresponsible" ahead of the 1970 elections.

Democrats responded that the

New Loopholes Cited:

Ways & Means Unit Clears Import Curbs

The House Ways & Means Committee has approved a major revision of foreign trade legislation that could serve to curb some of the export of U.S. jobs.

But the legislation also includes some provisions that are vague and flexible enough to render it ineffective. And it includes a "tax incentive" clause that amounts to a major new tax loophole for large U.S. firms.

The bill, the first overhaul of the Trade Expansion Act since 1962, was approved by the House committee by a vote of 17 to 7. It will be taken up by the full House after a recess which runs through Labor Day.

A strong foreign trade bill keyed to the new realities of the 1970s had been sought by the AFL-CIO and the unions affected by the export of more than 700,000 jobs in the last four years.

A major aspect of the new bill is that it provides import quotas that could grant relief to two of the hardest hit industries, textiles and shoes. The bill provides for quotas based on the average level of foreign imports in the years 1967, 1968 and 1969.

The bill also provides for procedures that could bring relief on other products when imports into the United States rise decisively. But the measure grants such wide discretionary powers to both the Tariff Commission and the President that it leaves the effectiveness of some of its provisions in question.

The bill gives the Tariff Commission wider discretion to act through liberalization of the so-called escape clause. Previously, the Tariff Commission could seek

Manpower Bill Asks Public Service Jobs

A new Manpower Training Act that contains some provision for the public service employment the AFL-CIO has long urged has been recommended to the Senate by its Labor Committee.

The proposed revision of the training act authorizes a total of $10.5 billion over the next three years for the program. It would incorporate public service employment, which would mean help for sorely-pressed community facilities such as schools, hospitals and police and fire departments. Families of the participants would be lifted out of poverty at the same time.

The Administration had asked for $6 billion, or $2 billion per year, for the program, an increase over the $1.4 billion of last year, but with provision for training only and not for public service employment.

When the Senate committee approved the three-year, $10.5 billion package, Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson said he would recommend that Pres. Nixon veto the measure. Administration officials have strongly opposed public service employment, deriding it as "make work."

However, none of the seven Republican members of the committee voted against the provision.

Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.), chairman of the subcommittee which developed the program, said the bill "would take people off welfare and off the streets,

TV Campaign Limits Ready for Final Action

House and Senate negotiators reached agreement on a bill to limit the amount of money a political candidate can spend on television advertising in this fall's congressional elections.

The action of the conferees came just one day after the House passed the bill on a 272 to 97 vote, but with the provision that it not become effective until 1971. The conference committee adopted the Senate provision making the measure effective in this fall's general elections for federal offices.

The AFL-CIO has hailed such a measure as "an acceptable alternative approach" to correcting the skyrocketing cost of political campaigns.

The bill would limit the amount of money that can be spent on TV and radio campaigns to 7 cents per vote cast in the previous election for the office. For primary elections, the limit would be 3.5 cents per vote, but that provision will not go into effect until after this year's remaining primaries.

Similarly, a House provision for extending the limits to state races

DISASTER CENTER for victims of Hurricane Celia in Corpus Christi, Tex., was established by the Red Cross in the headquarters of Machinists' Lodge 2049 near the waterfront with the help of volunteers including many union and women's auxiliary members. Among the unionists were Chief Steward Dave Jones and Pres. Charles Keenan of the IAM lodge.

Millions of Dollars Needed:

Meany Asks Unions to Help Victims of Hurricane Celia

Millions of dollars will be needed "to meet the immense human needs caused by the destructive force" of Hurricane Celia, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in calling for labor contributions to the Red Cross drive for disaster relief funds.

In a letter to all AFL-CIO unions and state and city central bodies, Meany noted that more than 65,000 Texas families suffered loss Aug. 3 in the nation's third most devastating hurricane. Many, he said, are union members living in or near Corpus Christi.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted to make a $10,000 contribution to the Red Cross disaster fund, and Meany urged widespread union contributions to the drive. The Red Cross is seeking a minimum of $6 million in extra assistance.

So many area workers were laid off because of the storm that Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson allotted $500,000 in additional federal funds for unemployment insurance payments. The money will provide jobless benefits for workers ordinarily considered not eligible and for those who previously had exhausted their benefits, the Labor Dept. said.

Many union staff members lent a hand to rescue workers in the five-county area off the Gulf of Mexico. The hurricane winds damaged homes and flattened buildings within a 30-mile radius of Corpus Christi.

Early arrivals on the disaster scene were staff Rep. Edward Carlin of AFL-CIO Communities Services Activities; Walter Holmes, AFL-CIO CSA liaison man with the area Red Cross, and Miss Rosa Walker, Women's Activities Dept. director for the Texas AFL-CIO.

"Practically every structure in town was damaged in some way," in 30-mile radius of Corpus Christi.

Nearly a week after the punishing storm, electric power and telephone service had been restored to not much more than half the area.

Emergency food and shelter operations were provided by the Red Cross and its 200 national staff members who flew into Texas. When the need tapered off, the rehabilitation phase of the rescue operation began.

The Machinists turned over their hall near the Corpus Christi Naval Air Station as a disaster relief intake center.

The Coastal Bend Labor Council and the Building & Construction Trades Council rounded up volunteer workers to help man the relief operations and to assist in clean-up, mop-up and repair activities, which will continue for several more weeks.

An estimated 10,000 to 15,000 union families live in the area. About 30 percent of them were hurt by the hurricane.

Major area unions whose members were affected in addition to the Machinists include the Government Employes, Steelworkers, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Plumbers and other building crafts, Postal Clerks and Letter Carriers, the Longshoremen, National Maritime Union and the Communications Workers.

Out of a dozen or more mobile feeding vans put into service by the rescue teams, two had been donated by the Texas AFL-CIO after earlier hurricane experience.

Holmes and other labor representatives will stay in the area for the next two or three months to help union families rehabilitate their homes, identify the services available to them, and cope with repairs, insurance problems, loans and other needs.

More than 100,000 persons in the area—half the estimated population—have received emergency care since the visitation by the hurricane, the Red Cross estimated.

The Red Cross budgets $10 million a year for disaster relief but expenditures in the last five years totaled $88 million, well above the expected amount. The $6 million goal of the current campaign for emergency relief is topped only by two other relief campaigns. Relief costs surpassed $21 million after Hurricane Camille in 1969 and $17.5 million after Hurricane Betsy in 1965, the organization reported.

Farm Union, Teamsters Sign 'Peace' Agreement

Salinas, Calif.—An agreement designed to "restore peace" to the fields and advance the organization of all agricultural workers was signed here by the Farm Workers and the Teamsters.

Dir. Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and leaders of the unaffiliated Teamsters agreed not to interfere with each other's organizing efforts and to cooperate in bringing full union organization to the non-union segments of the growing, packing and canning industries.

The pact provides that the Teamsters will halt their incursions into the lettuce and celery fields of the Salinas, Imperial Valley and El Centro areas and cancel the contracts they signed recently with some 200 growers.

That will leave UFWOC free to continue its drive in the fields to win bargaining rights for agricultural workers and to negotiate agreements with employers of its members.

The truce is for a one-year period and is subject to later review. It provides also that the Teamsters will continue to represent the cannery and processing workers they have organized in off-the-field operations. The latter group has a maximum potential of 80,000 workers. The lettuce workers involved in the settlement total about 15,000, UFWOC said.

Chavez told a news conference here that the peace pact is "more than just a no-raiding or jurisdictional agreement." It is, he said, "a mutual effort to organize the unorganized and to bring the agricultural industry a measure of peace."

The settlement binds both unions to participate jointly in consumer boycotts by agreement, forbids either to picket work locations of the other without consent, and provides that any disputes shall be referred to the committee of Catholic bishops that brought farm workers and growers together this year to negotiate settlement of the five-year dispute over the organization of field workers.

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Urban Life Division of the United States Catholic Conference, and Msgr. Roger Mahoney of Fresno, secretary of the bishops' farm labor committee, called the settlement a "good one" reached with good faith on both sides.

The agreement ended the possibility of another five-year struggle over organization of farm workers, Msgr. Higgins said.

After the settlement, Chavez advised UFWOC members on strike against Teamster-signed growers to return to work. After a breathing spell, UFWOC will renew its organizing and bargaining drive, he indicated.

The dispute with the Teamsters started shortly before UFWOC reached agreement with major table grape growers on contracts benefiting several thousand organized workers. When growers and Teamsters signed contracts for Salinas area workers, UFWOC charged the other union with breaking a no-raid settlement and began picketing. The Salinas area growers include Pic-n-Pac, said to be the word's largest grower of strawberries.

Aug. 17. The committee has authority to conclude an agreement but decided to wait until after the members at RCA have voted, it said. Terms of the agreement were withheld pending the vote.

The strike began June 2 after the conference board rejected what it called an inferior company offer. The company had settled shortly before on terms of a 42-month contract covering 23,000 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at 12 other RCA plants.

The plants at which the IUE will maintain picket lines until members have voted are at Camden (two plants), Deptford, Moorestown and Somerville, N.J.; Scranton and Mountaintop, Pa.; Cincinnati, O.; Plymouth, Mich.; Lewiston, Me.; Memphis, Tenn. and Los Angeles, Van Nuys and Burbank, Calif.

Schoemann Award Goes to Painter

Milwaukee, Wis. — Herbert N. Peterson, a union Painter since 1916, won the 1970 Peter T. Schoemann award—the symbolic "hard hat" of the construction industry —for unselfish service to the industry.

Peterson, business manager of Painters Local 781, has pushed health information programs on materials used in painting and worked hard to aid apprentices, the Allied Construction Employers said in making the award, named for the president of the Plumbers & Pipefitters union, a Milwaukee native.

Railroad Talks Resume On Size of Safe Crews

The United Transportation Union and railroad managements agreed to resume bargaining Aug. 25 on the number of crewmen needed in locomotives for safe operation of trains.

The agreement came less than a week after a presidential emergency board urged both sides in the 11-year dispute over the place of fireman-helpers to accept the "basic ingredients of a long-range settlement" they had informally agreed to during mediation talks last June.

Negotiations broke off after the June talks and the UTU struck three railroads in an effort to bring management into "meaningful" direct bargaining over the size of engine crews. Pres. Nixon intervened when the carriers threatened a nationwide lockout and named the emergency board.

The major recommendation of the board was that the dispute over the role of the fireman on diesel engines be settled by creating a new job classification combining the duties of firemen and brakemen.

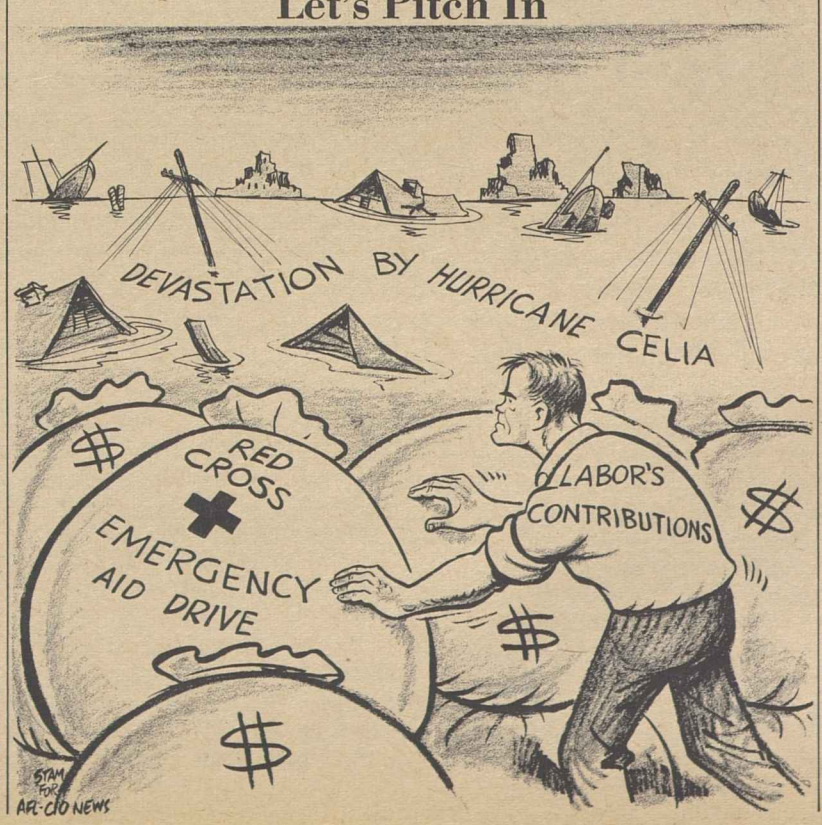
At UTU headquarters in Cleveland, Ohio, Assistant Pres. H. E. Gilbert, who headed the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen before merger, said the report provides the basis for resuming negotiations.

Gilbert reiterated the UTU stand against arbitrating the dispute. He said, "I believe as the board does that this controversy will be solved finally and conclusively only at the bargaining table with a negotiated settlement."

The UTU is not in accord with every aspect of the board recommendations, Gilbert said, but recognizes that the board took note of aspects of the dispute "that other bodies have failed adequately to assess in the past."



On other phases of the recommendations, Gilbert praised the three-man panel for seeing the need to protect all firemen who now hold a right to a job.

The board's recommendation for "meaningful" distribution of savings between engineers and other crew members whose responsibilities will increase, Gilbert said, is of "great significance" and proper application of it is "basic to a final conclusion of this dispute."

He agreed with the board that the issue of the use of walkie-talkie radios on trains be handled separately from the basic question of the need for firemen-helpers on trains. The carriers had insisted that the walkie-talkie issue must be part of any settlement.

Gilbert's union initiated bargaining in the dispute in 1965, after a compulsory arbitration award mandated by Congress had expired. The UTU took up the dispute after the merger 18 months ago of four railroad unions — the Trainmen, Firemen & Enginemen, Switchmen, and Conductors & Brakemen.

Let's Pitch In

Firemen & Oilers Name Curan a Vice President

The executive board of the Firemen & Oilers named John Curan, assistant to union Pres. William E. Fredenberger, as an international vice president.

Over a 16-year period Curan has been a local union business agent, director of research and education, legislative representative and managing editor of the Firemen & Oilers Journal.

Curan got his first union card at 16, when he worked as a bricklayer's helper and joined the Hod Carriers.

First Puerto Rico Plant:

Striking Machinists Break GE Barrier

Palmer, Puerto Rico—A determined band of 1,100 Machinists stuck it out on the picket line for nine months to win a breakthrough contract with the General Electric Co.—the first in the company's 12-plant Puerto Rican chain.

New to unionism, the pickets had the full backing of the IAM, the Puerto Rico labor movement and the AFL-CIO in holding out against a full arsenal of anti-union tricks employed by GE, the IAM reported.

Management at one point attempted to bus strikebreakers through picket lines with the aid of Puerto Rican riot police, who used cattle prods in attempts to smash the strike, the union charged.

Not once during the nine-month struggle was GE "able to walk one strikebreaker across our lines," the union said.

A major factor in the strikers' determination was the aid of the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee, which turned over to the union the funds remaining from last winter's strike by 140,000 GE workers on the mainland.

While the contract is the first at a GE plant on the island, it will not be the last, IAM Pres. Floyd Smith said in a report to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The IAM "intends to use this breakthrough" in organizing the other plants, he declared.

The strike was one of the most difficult in IAM history, according to Smith. The strikers, he said, were "greatly sustained by the help we received from the GE Strike Fund which was so generously made available to us through your efforts."

Without that help and the aid of other unions with representatives in Puerto Rico, the victory would not have been possible, Smith said.

The strike ended when thousands of GE workers scheduled a march through San Juan to the governor's palace and the corporation capitulated. The strikers were demanding that the commonwealth force GE to respect the labor laws or lose its 15-year tax exemption.

The Palmer plant, which makes circuit-breakers, is the largest in GE's Puerto Rico chain, and the company is among the island's largest employers.

IAM Rep. Juan Maldonado said the one-year agreement calls for an immediate pay increase of 12 cents an hour above the present average rate of $2.35; full company payment of the cost of employes' hospital insurance and a 40 percent reduction in employe payments for coverage of dependents; automatic progression and seniority systems; shift differentials of 5 and 10 percent, and a military service clause making up the difference between military pay and regular pay.

The agreement also provides nine holidays, including Election Day; funeral leave up to two days; immediate reinstatement of 26 discharged strikers and prompt arbitration of the cases of 26 others, including eight who were fired before the IAM was certified as their legal bargaining representative.

TEACHER AIDES and other paraprofessional workers in New York City schools celebrate winning of new "landmark" contract agreement announced by Pres. Albert Shanker, center, of United Federation of Teachers—Local 2 of the AFL-CIO Teachers. The pact represents gains of 140 percent over three years for 4,000 schoolroom assistants and will set a nationwide precedent for thousands of other minority group workers, Shanker said.

School Aides Win Gains In First N.Y. Contract

New York—A first contract giving professional status and union conditions to 4,000 teaching assistants in the New York City public schools has been won by the AFL-CIO Teachers after intensive negotiations that began last December.

Members of the paraprofessional unit of AFT Local 2—the United Federation of Teachers—voted 1,461-42 to ratify terms of the agreement whose gains represent an increase of 140 percent in wages and fringe benefits over three years.

UFT Pres. Albert Shanker called the pact a "landmark" agreement that will "set a nationwide precedent for bringing thousands" of minority group workers into the profession "in a meaningful career ladder program."

Shanker said the contract is "once again proof that meaningful employment and trade unionism are the greatest vehicles for ending poverty."

The agreement with the Board of Education covers teaching aides, education assistants, associates and auxiliary trainers in the school system's pre-kindergarten, early childhood and More Effective Schools programs.

Retroactive to last Jan. 1, minimum salaries will be raised to an average of $100 a week in the final contract year for the beginning category of paraprofessionals, and to $151.50 for those with 60 to 90 college credits.

Starting next Feb. 1, bargaining unit members with a work schedule of 27.5 hours a week will be granted 2.5 hours of released time with pay to attend an approved college or high school equivalency program. Participants must complete at least five semester hours of study or training per week, the contract provides.

Similar training incentives are provided those who work 20 hours per week, and also those working 30 or more hours.

The contract guarantees 42 weeks of employment per school year, including four weeks of vacation; six weeks of summer work at the union-negotiated wage rate, and a special four-week summer college program open to all paraprofessionals.

Besides full hospitalization coverage, the employe and his family will get full dental expense coverage. By the final contract year, covered employes will receive all the other benefits provided by the UFT Welfare Fund.

Mrs. Velma Hill, new chairman for the group, said "this historic victory gives the lie to those anti-labor forces that have tried to drive a wedge between teacher unionists and the black community through spurious charges of racism." Teachers, she noted, fully supported paraprofessionals in their drive for decent salaries and conditions.

Nixon Advisers Produce First 'Inflation Alert'

The President's Council of Economic Advisers has published a 100-page document on the causes and background of inflation, but it says in its foreword that "no listing of major conclusions is in order here."

Thus the report is a diffuse collection of economic data dealing with inflation from 1955 through the first half of 1970. The report is titled "Inflation Alert" and was ordered by Pres. Nixon last June.

A study of changes in consumer prices "in selected non-food items and groups" shows that medical costs have risen the fastest among 235 items.

Four hospital items—semiprivate rooms, daily service charges, private rooms and operating room charges—sweep the top four places in the listing and are the only prices that increased more than 50 percent between 1965 and 1969. Mortgage interest rates place 13th, having increased 33.7 percent in the same period.

The study says wage increases, like price increases, are "difficult to identify as inflationary or non-inflationary" and again concludes "that is not the purpose" of Inflation Alert, anyway.

The report says that median wage increases in non-residential construction in 1969 and the first half of 1970 were approximately twice the increases in manufacturing in the same period. But it also concludes that "most collective bargaining agreements expiring in 1970 were negotiated in 1967 or 1968. During this period the rate of increase in prices accelerated, eroding much of the negotiated increases in wages."

The study also cautions that "highly-publicized large collective bargaining settlements can give a distorted view of overall wage developments. Although the calendar for collective bargaining negotiations is heavy in 1970, only about 6 percent of the total labor force will be covered by settlements reached under major agreements."

Jobless Rate Jumps To 5 Percent Level

of these persons dropped out of the labor force because they had given up hope of finding jobs. Others were sick and some are formerly working housewives.

For the first time since the unemployment climb began last winter, the jobless rate for workers covered by state unemployment insurance dropped in July to 3.5 percent from 3.7 percent. But Goldstein noted that this decline is attributable partly to unemployed workers who have exhausted their benefits.

For blue-collar workers the jobless rate rose to 6.6 percent from 6.3 percent the month before. Unemployment in manufacturing rose from 5.3 to 6 percent in July, the highest since 1963. Construction unemployment was up to 11 percent from 10.9 percent a month earlier.

Nearly all of the July decline in manufacturing jobs occurred in the durable goods industries, especially in lumber and wood products, transportation equipment and electrical equipment, the report showed.

White-collar workers also felt the impact of the economic slowdown as their jobless rate rose to 3.1 percent from 2.6 percent in June.

Seasonally adjusted employment declines also occurred in services, down 30,000; trade, down 20,000 and government, down 15,000.

The average workweek for rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls edged up one-tenth of an hour to 37.3 hours seasonally adjusted, the BLS reported.

In manufacturing, the workweek was up one-tenth of an hour to 39.9 hours, only slightly higher than the nine-year lows of May and June. Factory overtime was down slightly to 2.9 hours. This compares with 3.5 hours in July 1969.

Average weekly earnings increased by $1.02 over the month to $121.07, with gains coming in all major industries but manufacturing and mining.

Although average weekly earnings rose 4.2 percent for the first six months of the year, they were down 1.7 percent after adjustments for increases in consumer prices, the BLS said.

The civilian labor force increased by 150,000 to 84.8 million in July, a month when there is normally no increase. This was about 2 million above the level for July 1969, with nearly all of the rise divided evenly among adult men and women.

Total employment was 80.3 million in July, up about 400,000 more than usual for the season. Compared with July 1969, total employment was up by 675,000, with more than two-thirds of the employment gain among part-time workers.

Gleason, Abel Are Delegates to TUC

Two fraternal delegates will represent the AFL-CIO at the 1970 Trades Union Congress, Sept. 7-11, in Brighton, England, Federation Pres. George Meany announced. They are Pres. Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen and Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers.

Gleason and Abel are both AFL-CIO vice presidents and Abel is also president of the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

House Unit Urges Denial Of Contribution to ILO

A House Appropriations subcommittee has recommended that Congress cut off U.S. funds to the International Labor Organization, a move urged by the AFL-CIO because of the ILO's growing tendency to become "an instrument for spreading Communist propaganda."

The subcommittee urged that a $7.5 million U.S. contribution to the ILO be stricken when the State Dept. appropriations bill comes up in the Senate. An appeal to the Senate was the only action the House group could take because the House had already passed the measure May 14.

That was before it was known that C. Wilfred Jenks of Great Britain, the new director-general of the ILO, intended to appoint a Soviet bloc representative as assistant director-general.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before the House subcommittee on the appointment and other American grievances with the ILO. It has since been announced that a Russian, Pavel E. Astapenko, had been named to the post.

The subcommittee's appeal to the Senate was announced by Chairman John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.). Rooney said the appeal had been made to Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.), chairman of the corresponding Senate Appropriations subcommittee.

Rooney said that if the money for the ILO is left in the Senate bill, he is prepared to "make sure" it is taken out in the conference committee. "We intend to do all we can to shut off their water," Rooney said of the ILO.

Meany's objections to the ILO actions were seconded by the other two parts of the tripartite U.S. delegation—government and business. Deputy Under Sec. of Labor George H. Hildebrand told the subcommittee that the ILO had suffered a "poisoning of the atmosphere" by political attacks on the United States. Edwin P. Neilan, employer delegate to the ILO, predicted that with a Russian in the assistant director-general's office, the strategy of the USSR would be to tell the ILO, "Okay, unless we get this, we are not going to give our full 10 percent contribution."

Meany had pointed out that the United States has paid 25 percent of the ILO's budget while the Soviet Union pays only 10 percent.

Since the subcommittee hearings, the AFL-CIO Executive Council issued a condemnation of the ILO for its favored treatment of the Soviet bloc and vowed that the AFL-CIO would take "whatever means available" to arrest the ILO's transformation "into an instrument for spreading Communist propaganda." (Text, Page 7.)

LATIN AMERICAN trade unionists are praised by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks, on their graduation from AIFLD Front Royal Institute. The 32nd graduating class was made up of 18 labor leaders from the Caribbean and 16 from Brazil.

Postal Union Eliminates Prohibition on Strikes

Omaha—The Post Office & General Services Maintenance Employes voted to remove a no-strike clause that had been in their constitution since 1937 and authorized officers to negotiate a transitional bargaining agreement with the new postal corporation when it takes over the postal system.

Meeting in convention, 225 delegates from 176 local unions agreed to campaign vigorously to bring every unorganized maintenance employe in covered service into the union.

In other actions, they gave the national officers power to negotiate a merger with like-minded federal unions; called for wage scales based on living costs; and returned Pres. Monroe Crable to office for another two-year term. He defeated Robert Harmon of Houston, Tex., 154 to 72.

William Kaczor of Buffalo, N.Y., was elected secretary-treasurer to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of David M. Hendricks. Kaczor was chosen over three other candidates.

The convention also revised the constitution and by-laws to conform with changes in federal laws and raised per capita taxes from $1.50 to $2.25 a member per month, largely to finance organizing and collective bargaining programs.

Crable said in his president's report that membership has grown by about 2,000 since 1968 and that vastly greater growth is essential in the years ahead.

Legislative Dir. Richard Wevodau, who was re-elected without opposition, reported an increasing number of promotional opportunities for lower-level maintenance employes.

The union and the Post Office Dept., acting jointly, have started training programs to qualify workers for higher-level positions. Some are at the National Maintenance Training Center in Norman, Okla., and others at the local level.

Wevodau said he and Crable attended sessions of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center and began to make extensive use of center facilities after the three-day work stoppage of other postal unions last March. Maintenance employes honored the picket lines at that time.

The convention featured a one-day seminar on unionism, with Dir. John McCart of the Government Employes Council and Education Dir. Arthur Kane of the Government Employes participating.

Gore Wins Narrowly In Tennessee Primary

Sen. Albert Gore has been renominated by Tennessee Democrats for what will probably be the toughest re-election battle in his 30-year political career.

The margin of Gore's victory in the Democratic primary, 30,000 votes over a candidate who had never run for office before, indicated he faces a close race in November against millionaire GOP Rep. William Emerson Brock III.

Brock drew 160,000 votes to win by more than 3-1 over cowboy singer Woodward (Tex) Ritter and J. D. Boles. Gore drew just under 250,000 votes to 220,000 for Hudley Crockett, a TV newsman and former press secretary to Gov. Buford Ellington.

In the governor's race, the Democrats nominated John Jay Hooker, Jr., a liberal who lost to Ellington in 1966. Republicans nominated Winfield Dunn, a Memphis dentist who scored an upset with his 10,000-vote victory over multimillionaire apparel manufacturer W. Maxey Jarman.

Gore, 62, described himself in the campaign against Crockett as "the No. 1 target of the Republicans' southern strategy" as a result of his constant criticism of Administration economic policies and his votes against Supreme Court nominees Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., and G. Harrold Carswell.

Gore and Sen. Ralph Yarborough of Texas were the most outspoken liberals seeking re-election in the South this year, and Yarborough has already been beaten by a conservative.

Indications were that a heavy Republican cross-over vote was cast against Gore in the primary. For instance, the Nashville area cast 44,000 GOP votes in the 1968 presidential election, but only 13,000 for the three GOP Senate candidates.

Ritter said after the election that he lost because of the large number of Republicans who asked for Democratic primary ballots to vote against Gore.

Brock is a 39-year-old heir to a candy fortune who already has a public commitment from Vice-Pres. Spiro T. Agnew to campaign for him. Brock gave up a relatively safe congressional seat to oppose Gore.

AIFLD Class Urged to Spur Labor Unity

The need to unite all workers as a means of reinforcing democratic processes and benefiting all people was stressed at the 32nd graduation exercises of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's training program.

Tacito Tani of Brazil, speaking for the 18 Caribbean and 16 Brazilian trade unionists, declared that "the bringing together of all the workers is not only necessary, it is absolutely indispensable for the strengthening of democracy, with all layers of society sharing consumer goods produced by labor."

The graduation ceremonies were held at the AFL-CIO headquarters for the Latin American unionists who completed seven weeks of training at the AIFLD institute at Front Royal, Va.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James A. Suffridge, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks, praised the graduates for their achievements in the study programs. He and Emanuel Boggs, director of the Front Royal Institute, presented diplomas to the 34 graduates.

On hand for the ceremony were 75 representatives of the Washington diplomatic corps, government and labor.

Gaston Benjamin, secretary-treasurer of the Caribbean Labor Congress, called on the unions of his area "to assume a greater share of the burdens of society."

A former student of the AIFLD center, Benjamin stressed the contributions of the AFL-CIO and AIFLD toward the progress of trade unionism in the Caribbean.

At the graduation, Clifton C. Caldwell, a vice president of the Meat Cutters, was made an honorary citizen of Porto Alegre, Brazil, for his work with the Union-to-Union Exchange Program in 1968. Caldwell received the citation from Mario Provensi of Porto Alegre.

The Caribbean group specialized in advanced leadership training and the Brazilians studied advanced collective bargaining.

Boilermakers Win In North Carolina

Marion, N.C.—McDowell County got its first union when employes of Air Preheater Co. voted for the Boilermakers in a National Labor Relations Board representation election. The vote, with 325 workers eligible, was 192 for the union, 116 against.

The plant is a subsidiary of Combustion Engineering Co. An in-plant organizing committee was assisted by members of the Boilermakers and AFL-CIO regional staff. It won a majority after two previous organizing attempts had failed.

Talks with Pressmen:

ITU Delegates Back Merger Negotiations

Buffalo—Delegates to the 112th convention of the Typographical Union voted full support of officers' efforts to negotiate a merger agreement with the Printing Pressmen, and approved two constitutional amendments to be voted on by the members in an October referendum.

The amendments would increase the length of officers' terms from two years to four and raise the ITU per capita tax from $1 a month to $1.50 for operating expenses of the international union.

In a resolution adopted without a dissenting vote, the convention noted that executive officers of the ITU and the Pressmen have in joint discussions accomplished much of the groundwork needed for full merger and have eliminated "many obstacles formerly separating our two unions."

The resolution called for full support of Pres. John J. Pilch and the ITU executive council "to accomplish, at the earliest possible date, unity and merger" of the two organizations, which have been separate for many years.

Pilch said that merger talks have been delayed by the death of Anthony J. DeAndrade, former Pressmen's president, but will be resumed after the election of a successor to former Sec.-Treas. Alexander J. Rohan, who took DeAndrade's post.

The convention also took action urging:

- Discontinuing the "archaic" formula used by the Government Printing Office in setting wages of printers and reducing the 25 cities in the formula to a maximum of 10 for wage comparisons.
- Enactment of the Occupational Safety & Health Act awaiting action with the support of the AFL-CIO.
- Support for the proposed National Health Insurance Act sponsored by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and others.
- Renewed support of the 2,000 union members on strike since 1967 against Hearst's Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

The convention's committee on legislation reported that eight more communities have adopted job-protection ordinances forbidding the importation of professional strikebreakers. The eight are Washington, D.C., Newark, O., Peoria, Duluth, Kenosha and Herrin, Ill., Tacoma, Wash., and Albany County, N.H. That brings the total to 114 communities in 14 states.

Guest speakers included Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), Pres. James H. Sampson of the Stereotypers and Vice Pres. William Stasiak of the Bookbinders.

Rockefeller reported that 455 printing firms have moved into the state since 1958 and 7,000 additional printing jobs have been provided. The state government itself is a $12-million-a-year customer of the industry, and nearly all commercial printing bears the union "bug" or label, he said.

Pilch warned the delegates of the danger of no-strike injunctions posed by a recent Supreme Court decision, and said strike-lockout benefits paid by the ITU because of work stoppages by other unions have increased "tremendously."

AFL-CIO Aids Farmers Union In Philippines

Philippine rice farmers, plagued for years by inadequate water supplies in under-developed provinces, are expected to increase their crop yields by 40 percent with the aid of American labor.

Five irrigation pumps donated by the AFL-CIO were presented to the Federation of Free Farmers through the Asian-American Free Labor Institute in June.

Within a month, four pumps were installed at newly drilled wells and the fifth was set up on a river bank to boost the supply of vitally-needed water.

Not only will the additional water give the farmers a bigger yield per crop, but it will also allow them to increase their output from three to four crops in every two-year period, reported AAFLI Dir. Len Yarborough.

The AAFLI will donate 10 additional pumps and other commodities to the farmers unions this year, Yarborough said.

The AAFLI is also assisting in the training of 700 members of the farmers' federation on the operation of its union and cooperative programs.

DRILLING RIG is erected in an under-developed Philippine province to tap a water well for rice farmers. The AFL-CIO donated five irrigation pumps to the Federation of Free Farmers to help expand the rice production of its members.

Plan Would Preserve Crafts:

Clerks' Convention Approves Move for Postal Unity Talks

Los Angeles—The Postal Clerks' 36th annual convention here approved the principle of one big union for postal workers in a resolution calling for the appointment of a nine-man committee to "implement merger discussions with any or all" postal unions with a structure representing all crafts.

The delegates acted on a proposal submitted by the organization committee that the UFPC seek a union of all postal crafts with a single national head in a single national headquarters, but with vice presidents and other officials elected by the various crafts.

The plan, hailed by Pres. Francis S. Filbey, is in line with his invitations to other postal unions for merger talks issued prior to the convention.

Filbey is directed to appoint the committee before the end of the convention. It will consist of two national officers and seven other officers or members from UFPC locals, branches or state federations.

Earlier Filbey had issued invitations to five other AFL-CIO postal unions as well as the unaffiliated National Postal Union and the National Alliance of Postal & Federal Employes.

The Letter Carriers are expected to consider the proposal at their convention in Honolulu, later this month.

Filbey also looked forward to a time when all postal unions would become part of a giant union of workers in all fields of communications within the AFL-CIO.

The resolution approving merger negotiations requires ratification of any agreement by referendum vote of the full membership of the federation.

Delegates also directed the national executive board to call a nation-wide strike if protection and rights guaranteed under the constitution, particularly the First and Fifth Amendments, are denied employes by the postal service. The action came as an amendment to a resolution offered by the organization committee declaring that management has treated postal employes as second class citizens.

A resolution calling for a strike if full amnesty is not granted those who participated in the recent postal strike was defeated and the other approach was adopted instead.

Attendance at the convention reached a record high with 586 locals represented by a total vote of 2,130 cast by 1,379 delegates.

The convention limited the number of guest speakers to devote more attention to union business.

As a result, a number of procedural changes were instituted and scores of resolutions were passed calling for correction of inequities and working conditions.

These ranged from alleviation of clerks' financial liability through health and medical matters and organizational issues. One resolution urged amendment of the Hatch Act restricting political activities of government workers to insure first class citizenship for federal employes.

Others call for at least quarterly drawer checks on all employes with financial responsibility, holders of fixed credits to be present when they are counted, requiring the post office to provide safeguards and take responsibility for losses by window line clerks due to human error, bonding all window clerks against shortage and insuring without subrogation window clerks and those with money stocks.

Better and cleaner equipment, first aid improvements and reduction of excessive machine noise levels, also were requested.

The delegates heard Walter Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education say they would be "full planners in a whole new field of collective bargaining."

Davis outlined the program of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center aimed at producing skilled union officers to help all AFL-CIO affiliates.

During a brief recess, the delegates collected $1,023 for the striking and locked-out workers at the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner.

PRESIDENT NIXON SIGNS legislation giving life to the new independent postal corporation as Postmaster Gen. Winton Blount (left) watches. The president praised the postal unions and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for their role in the agreement that led to the legislation. As a part of the package, the postal unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO gained legal collective bargaining rights and an 8 percent pay increase retroactive to April 16.

Rail Discussions Seek To Improve Bargaining

Top government representatives met separately with railroad union and management leaders in an effort to facilitate negotiations on a number of contract disputes nearing the showdown stage.

Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., who briefed newsmen, said the purpose of the government-arranged conferences was to try to secure some type of joint negotiations and seek "avenues for better bargaining in the industry."

Four unions nearing a climax in separate wage movements are the United Transportation Union, Railway & Airline Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes and Dining Car Employes (Hotel & Restaurant Employes). The Railroad Signalmen also are bargaining on wages with the railroads.

Leaders of the four unions say that all efforts to negotiate settlements of long-pending disputes have proved fruitless. Following their expected rejection of an arbitration offer by the National Mediation Board, all four will be free to strike in 30 days. Members of all four unions have voted to strike if necessary.

However, under the Railway Labor Act, the strikes can be halted for 60 days by appointment of presidential emergency boards. Usery indicated the board action would be taken, if necessary.

Among the government leaders who met with the representatives of 17 unions were Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson, Sec. of Transportation John A. Volpe and members of the Mediation Board.

Usery said that the meeting with the unions brought "general agreement that better methods of bargaining must be found" even though the union officials didn't commit themselves to any particular procedure and weren't asked to.

The next step, he said, will be to arrange a joint meeting of a representative committee of the unions with a similar one from management.

He said the unions were briefed on the Administration's proposed legislation to allow special boards to impose settlements of labor-management disputes in transportation.

Asked what reaction that got, Usery replied, "Well they all let us know they didn't like compulsory arbitration." He said, however, that there was no discussion of the merits of the proposal and "no attempt was made to sell anyone on it."

Musicians Ratify Pact With Major Networks

New York—Ratification of a new two-year contract between the Musicians and the major television networks has been announced by AFM Pres. Hal C. Davis.

The secret ballot vote on the new contract was 497 to 78.

Highlights of the pact, which is retroactive to Aug. 1, and expires July 31, 1972, are:

- Wages for casual musicians are increased 12 percent in the basic air rate from $34.10 to $38.19 for a half-hour show, from $44 to $49.28 for an hour show, and from $66 to $73.92 for shows of 90 minutes. Twelve percent increases also are provided for additional time and in participating sponsor rates.
- Rehearsal rates for casual musicians are raised from $13.42 to $15 per hour. The rate on the hour-long variety special is increased from $13.42 to $15.50, beginning with the 16th hour.

In addition, wage increases of 12 percent now apply to the rates for music preparation work and for rehearsal musicians.

An important gain, Davis said, is a commitment by the networks that they will furnish within 30 days a list of all shows using music, and the producer of each show. They will also require each outside packager of a show to sign an agreement or a letter of adherence with the AFM.

"This is extremely important in terms of policing both the domestic re-use and foreign-use provisions of our contracts," Davis said.

The contract marked the start of employer contributions to the health and welfare funds, where they exist, in behalf of casual musicians. Also negotiated was a substantial increase in welfare contributions for staff musicians from $3 per week per man in New York only to $4.70 per week in New York and Los Angeles.

For staff musicians, weekly wages are increased to $300, up from $277.70, and there are corresponding increases in overtime and doubling premiums. Staff musicians' rehearsal fees also were increased, as were cartage allowances.

With respect to job security provisions for staff musicians, the agreement sets forth the following terms:

All staff musicians in Los Angeles and New York (with minor exceptions at ABC) who were employed on July 31 are guaranteed employment until next July 31. At that time, the NBC quota of 25 in Los Angeles will terminate. However, all present NBC staff employes in Los Angeles are guaranteed a special severance payment based on four weeks of pay for each year of service, with a minimum of 12 weeks and a maximum of 60.

In New York, there will be a reduction of 15 staff musicians (five from each of the networks) next July 31. They, too, will get a special severance payment similar to that in Los Angeles. The remaining New York staff musicians will be guaranteed employment for the second year of the contract.

Rogin Takes Post With State-County

Labor educator Lawrence Rogin has been appointed to direct an expanded State, County & Municipal Employes staff intern program which will be launched next January.

Rogin has been director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education from 1960 to 1966 and until recently was on the faculty of the American University Labor Studies Center in Washington.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf, in announcing Rogin's appointment, said the intern program is designed to develop local and national union leadership. Rogin also will be responsible for training SCME field representatives and staff members.

Kirkland Pledges All-Out Drive To Extend Federal Bargaining

Denver—A pledge of total support of collective bargaining rights for all federal workers was made by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the 1,800 delegates at the Government Employes Convention.

"That is the great unfinished task of the Federation of Government Employes, the AFL-CIO, and the labor movement," Kirkland said, "and it is a task we mean to complete."

Kirkland pointed out that federal employes have been whipping boys in all fiscal crises.

"The answer is always the same—cut the federal payroll, eliminate jobs, refuse pay increases, scoff at the service of federal workers."

He emphasized that the AFL-CIO does not enjoy that sport.

"America" he said, "should be proud of its public workers."

The delegates earlier had heard an optimistic report on legislative and organizing gains from AFGE Pres. John F. Griner.

The union, he said, now represents some 550,000 federal employes under exclusive recognition and has been organizing at the rate of 10,000 members per month for the past four months.

"In serving our membership," Griner added, "we have kept pace in elevating classified and other statutory system pay schedules. Two pay raises have been won in the past two years for some 1.5 million federal white-collar employes.

"We have obtained millions in back pay thru the implementation of the Monroney amendment and the raising of hazardous pay differential for wage board employes," he said.

The Monroney amendment broadens the framework of prevailing wage determinations in areas where no comparable jobs exist. It has already brought $12 million in back pay to Oklahoma's Tinker Air Force Base employes and is expected to bring $150 million for 800,000 federal blue-collar workers eventually.

Griner stressed the nearness of key legislative goals for labor-management relations, wage board pay survey administration, annual statutory salary determinations, and "our long-sought dream of eventual payment of all fringe benefit costs by the employer."

Among other speakers addressing the convention where Senators Gale W. McGee, Jennings Randolph, Frank E. Moss, and Ralph Yarborough; Representatives Arnold Olsen, Charles Wilson, and Thaddeus J. Dulski; Colorado's Gov. Mark Hogan; Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., Civil Service Commission Chairman Robert E. Hampton, and Colorado AFL-CIO Pres. Herrick Roth.

The agenda facing the delegates included election of officers, proposed revision of the union's constitution, and resolutions concerning AFGE's legislative goals.

A Task to Complete

REORGANIZATION of the U.S. postal service has now been signed into law by the President, a little more than four months after the plan emerged from the settlement of the mail strike last spring.

In some respects, the modifications of the plan wrought by Congress fall short of the terms agreed upon by the Administration and the postal unions.

But this should not obscure the historic significance of the gains won by the postal workers that remain intact under the new system.

Among these, the press has given most attention to the 8 percent wage increase and the compression of wage step-ups to eight years instead of 21—both urgent corrections of long-standing inequities.

In the long run, however, the most important gain is the government's recognition that its own employes—like all other workers—are entitled to the benefits of collective bargaining on all phases of employment, including wages, working conditions and grievance matters.

When agreement on this principle was announced by Postmaster Gen. Winton Blount and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a joint news conference last Apr. 2, Meany underscored it as "a tremendously significant forward step in the history of labor relations in this country."

"I think that this will not be lost on the people whose job it is to deal with public employes at the state, county and city levels," he said.

"I think this means that the federal government is taking the lead in solving this question of representation for public employes, and they're resolving it by the method we know best—collective bargaining. I think this is a very significant advance."

UNTIL THE POSTAL employes scored their breakthrough, "bargaining" in the federal service had always meant politics, hat-in-hand appeals to Congress for "catch-up" wage increases and no uniform procedures for resolving grievances or improving working conditions.

The new postal plan points the way out of this second-class citizenship. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, addressing the Government Employes' convention in Denver a few days ago, put it this way:

"Federal workers have exactly the needs and aspirations of all workers. They need an adequate income, sound job security, realistic protections against the hazards of illness and old age, and the opportunity to make tomorrow better than today. All workers—no matter what color collar they wear and no matter who their employer—want to clothe, house, educate and care for their families. . . .

"So I am convinced the American people would see it as right and proper for the principle of collective bargaining to be extended to every federal worker and every public employe, at every other level of government throughout the land.

"That is the great unfinished task of the Federation of Government Employes, the AFL-CIO and the labor movement. It is a task we mean to complete. It is an aim that we mean to gain, for the sake of human progress."

Love and Understanding Alone Aren't a Viable Foreign Policy

By John P. Roche

WHEN I WAS in grade school back in the early 1930s, every year at Christmas we did our bit for world understanding, we sent Christmas cards to youngsters in other countries. The dominant notion was that wars broke out because of failures in communication, that lack of understanding between people was the source of conflict. Whenever a crisis arose, it was explained in these terms.

Take Nazi Germany as an example. The wild behavior of Adolf Hitler registered only gradually (there was no TV), but by the time we reached the 10th grade, it was clear that something very peculiar was underway in Germany. So we set out in history class to understand it. We had a wonderful teacher—she gave me one of the few A's I got in high school, which could account for the bias—and under her guidance we did primitive research, clipped newspapers, and prepared reports.

To make a long story short, we reached the following conclusions: (1) that the Treaty of Versailles was unfair to Germany; (2) that the Germans had many legitimate complaints; (3) that Hitler came to power because we had failed to remedy these legitimate German grievances; and (4) that if we demonstrated sympathy and understanding for German problems, Hitler would abandon his aggressive course.

This perspective was not limited to our 10th grade history class. It was shared by the principal statesmen of the era. For Neville Chamberlain in particular, understanding "Herr Hitler" became almost a passion. He knew that if he could only have a frank, face-to-face, private talk with the German chancellor, the tensions in Europe could be eliminated.

Indeed, much to the annoyance of the French (and some of his advisers), Chamberlain did manage on one trip to sneak off for a heart-to-heart chat with the Fuehrer and emerged convinced that all would now be well. (Hitler was apparently much amused and—of course—promptly raised the ante.)

What brought all this to mind is the popularity of the "failure of communication" formula in dealing with our current crises, foreign and domestic. For years we were told, for example, that if we could prove our sincerity to Hanoi, the North Vietnamese would rush to negotiate peace in Vietnam. Now the message is that if the Israelis would just stop being suspicious of the Arabs and demonstrate their good intentions by evacuating the occupied territories, a new era of good will would sweep the Middle East.

EARLY IN THE KENNEDY Administration there were those who similarly thought that the hard-line segregationists could be appeased by a little communications therapy. In fact, Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy went down to Alabama in that spirit—and emerged in a rage, muttering to associates that the segregationists "lived in a different country." Today Pres. Nixon is being told that his student problems arise from a communications gap.

Nobody can oppose improving communications, whether with Red China, Egypt, South Africa, hard-hats, Yippies or John Birchers. However, there is a big and highly questionable jump from that common-sense proposition to the assumption that improved communications will result in improved relations.

Contrary to rumor, we had extremely good communications with Hanoi, but the message we got was wholly unacceptable: "Bust the Saigon government and go home."

In the same sense, one can understand perfectly why the Arabs are mad at Israel, or why the students don't like the war, or why the hard-hats don't relate to the peace demonstrators, and still be unwilling to accept their terms. Communication is obviously a precondition for understanding, and understanding is essential to any process of rational accommodation of conflicting views. Yet, it is delusive—indeed, romantic anti-intellectualism—to believe that strongly held views will dissolve into ecumenical goo if those who hold them are only loved and understood.

Rights of Workers Weakened By ILO's 'Double Standard'

Following is a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the International Labor Organization, Aug. 4, 1970, Chicago, Ill.

THE AFL-CIO IS PROUD of the long record of constructive support the American trade union movement has given to the International Labor Organization. Samuel Gompers, first president of the American Federation of Labor, presided over the group which 51 years ago, during the Paris Peace Conference after World War I, laid the groundwork for launching the ILO. Since the United States joined the ILO in 1934, U.S. trade union representatives have played a leading role in the work of that organization.

The AFL-CIO has supported the ILO for four basic reasons:

First, because of its unique tripartite structure, the ILO is the only international body in which trade union representatives have an equal voice with employer and government representatives in policy determination.

Second, the ILO was set up for the purpose of improving the conditions of work and life of workers all over the world. This is a goal to which the American trade union movement has always been committed.

Third, despite very modest resources, the ILO has made a significant contribution toward enhancing the welfare of workers. It has made its mark by adopting international labor standards on such matters as maximum hours of work, minimum wage-fixing machinery, occupational health and safety, social security, and in a host of other areas of vital concern to workers. In recent years, ILO technical cooperation programs have aided social and economic progress in developing countries.

Fourth and most important, the ILO has espoused principles and policies dedicated to the protection of basic human rights. These are best summed up in the following excerpt from the Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted by the ILO in 1944:

"All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity;

"The attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy."

In line with these basic principles of human rights, the ILO has adopted international conventions on forced labor, freedom of association and the right to organize, and discrimination in employment.

But the AFL-CIO has become increasingly concerned that while the ILO still pays lip-service to human rights, it has, in fact, turned a blind eye to the most blatant violations of basic freedoms in its member countries. What happened, and did not happen, at the ILO annual conference last June demonstrates this dangerous trend.

A major item on the agenda of that conference was "trade union rights and civil liberties." A ringing resolution unanimously adopted resulted from discussion of that vital issue; it:

- Asserted that the absence of civil liberties removes all meaning from the concept of trade union rights;
- Expressed deep concern about repeated violations of trade union rights;
- Urged efforts to strengthen machinery for securing national observance of ILO principles concerning freedom of association and trade union rights; and
- Called for comprehensive ILO studies with a view to considering further action to secure full respect for trade union rights and related civil liberties.

Yet, that same conference rejected rather mild resolutions calling for restoring trade union rights under the dictatorial regimes of Spain and Greece.

EVEN MORE SHOCKINGLY inconsistent with the ILO's professions of devotion to freedom and democracy was its failure even to consider the depredations against trade union rights and civil liberties under the despotic regimes in the Communist countries. Indeed, the ILO has increasingly adopted a head-in-the-sands approach to Communist violations of human rights as if to ignore them would somehow obliterate them.

The result of this inconsistency between lofty ILO principles and the completely contrary practices under Communist totalitarianism which the ILO has failed to challenge has been to weaken the forces of freedom and strengthen the undemocratic elements of all stripes in the ILO.

Moreover, the ILO's failure even to criticize government domination of the so-called "trade unions" in the Soviet Union and the other Communist countries has tended to place a false stamp of legitimacy on those compliant tools of totalitarian governments. Only U.S. trade union representatives at ILO meetings have called attention to the fact that the so-called "trade unions" of the USSR are bossed by Alexander Shelepin, one-time head of the Soviet secret police.

While the ILO has ignored the most flagrant violations of liberty and human rights in totalitarian countries, it has permitted its annual conferences to be taken over by Communists and their allies for unrestrained political attacks on Israel, a bastion of democracy and social justice in the Middle East, and the United States. Year by year, the Communist elements have been gaining greater influence and control of the ILO almost without resistance from free trade union and other democratic elements.

The AFL-CIO, in good conscience, cannot and will not complacently accept this transformation of a once worthy organization into an instrument for spreading Communist propaganda and attacks on genuine freedom and democracy. Neither in the ILO nor anywhere else will we accept a double standard involving favored treatment for one group of totalitarian countries, the Soviet Bloc.

The AFL-CIO will take whatever means are available to it in order to have the ILO return to it historic mission of defending human rights and workers' freedoms everywhere in the world.

Role of Skilled Union Craftsmen Stressed in Peace Corps Work

THE UNION-BACKED drive to help recruit skilled craftsmen for the Peace Corps may be the greatest contribution unions can make to the developing countries, Pres. S. Frank Raftery declared on Labor News Conference.

Raftery, a vice president of the AFL-CIO and a member of the National Advisory Council of the Peace Corps, noted that for nine years the Peace Corps has helped the developing nations meet their literacy and educational needs. Now, he said it is time to turn to more fundamental training to help them "develop their own economies and their own work operations."

Raftery said the initial goal of the skilled-trades recruitment is to fill 68 slots in 14 countries, where experienced union craftsmen will help teach workers the skills they need.

Appearing with Raftery on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program was Ray Dolan, labor liaison man with the Peace Corps, who said that the new skilled-trades program doesn't mean a "change of philosophy or policy" for the Peace Corps.

"THE HEART AND SOUL of the Peace Corps is always going to be the young" volunteers, mostly of college age, Dolan said. Noting that less than 2 percent of the 8,500 Peace Corps volunteers now working overseas are skilled workers, he said that even "if we doubled, or tripled, or quadrupled the number of skilled tradesmen in the Peace Corps, the bulk would still be the younger people."

Raftery and Dolan agreed that assigning union members to Peace Corps projects in countries "where the AFL-CIO already has a presence" through its international efforts holds a dual advantage, in that they can "work together, without losing sight of (their) individual objectives."

By Press Associates, Inc.

AT THE VERY MOMENT that the entire Eastern Seaboard was cloaked in a suffocating smog that actually threatened visibility and breathing, Congress was saving the taxpayers some money.

The taxpayers, though, were really the victims, not the beneficiaries, of such economy since the funds were destined to combat the frightening growth of pollution of our environment.

Specifically, a House-Senate conference committee voted to chop off one-third of the appropriation for the White House Council on Environmental Quality—cutting it from $1.5 billion to $1 billion.

The council was created in the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969. It established a three-man council to advise the President on matters relating to the environment. Federal agencies, under the act, are required to notify the council—which means the President—of any action they plan that would affect environment protection.

The cutback in funds for the council is not reported here to point a finger only at Congress, since other branches of the government and industry at least share the blame for the man-handling of our ecology.

Rather, this episode shows the serious problem of misplaced priorities.

In point of fact, the President has been far less responsive to the urgencies created by our cluttered air and water. His expressions of concern have been convincing, but when it comes to priorities the environment seems to be way down the list.

The President has submitted a plan to bring together all federal agencies dealing with environmental protection, Congress will soon pass legislation to assist in trash disposal, and the House has approved legislation setting federal, state and regional standards for reducing smokestack emissions.

All of these actions and more are commendable, but everywhere the question arises as to whether they even begin to keep pace with the frightening growth of the pollution problem.

SOME INDICATION of the severity of the pollution crisis is seen in the 1970 report of the National Pollution Control Administration.

The report ranked cities in two different categories.

One ranking listed cities most heavily polluted with sulphur oxide from coal and fuel burning. New York and Chicago had the dubious distinction of leading the list.

The second listing dealt with visible particulates in the air—dirt, smoke, and soot. Topping the list was Steubenville, O., followed by Charleston, W.Va., and Scranton, Pa.

Officials of the National Pollution Control Administration declared that "national average levels of ambient urban air concentration for both particulates and sulphur oxides are close to levels that have been observed to have an adverse effect on our environment."

Seemingly, in bureaucratic language, the NPCA is saying the picture is bad. Any stronger words could produce a panic.

Federal officials estimated that more than 33 million tons of sulphur oxides will foul the atmosphere this year or 3 million tons more than in 1968.

The agency also estimated that each year some 26 million tons of particulate pollution are released by industry. And while there seems to have been limited progress against this in the last decade, "in the case of manufacturing plants using coal only 60 percent of potential emissions are being removed."

Despite some pollution controls on emissions from new cars, the auto industry is asking for 10 more years before it can give us clean cars. The question is whether we can afford 10 more years.

As many Americans discovered recently, this country is not alone in despoiling its environment. It's a worldwide problem. But whether restricted funds, administrative reorganizations, some limits on emissions can ever do the essential job of saving our air and water is doubtful.

SKILLED UNION CRAFTSMEN are needed by the Peace Corps to assist and train people in under-developed countries, reporters on Labor News Conference are told by Pres. S. Frank Raftery, of the Painters, center right, and Ray Dolan, labor liaison man with the Peace Corps. Reporters are Harry Conn, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Murray Seeger, right, of the Los Angeles Times. The AFL-CIO produced program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Inadequate Labels Aggravate Lead Paint Poisoning Hazard

By Sidney Margolius

AFTER ALL THE CHILDREN who have died or been poisoned to the point of brain damage by eating lead paint, some of America's leading manufacturers still sell paints with relatively high lead content and inadequate warnings.

This revelation was made by William White, executive director of the National Commission on Product Safety, and Michael Lemov, general counsel, in testimony before the House Housing subcommittee. The subcommittee is considering three bills introduced to try to help eliminate peeling lead-based paint in interiors of old houses and apartments.

There are really two lead-paint problems. One is that young children sometimes develop an appetite for flakes of old lead paint. Doctors call this appetite for inedible objects "pica."

Such eating of lead paint is responsible for more than 100 deaths and many cases of substantial mental retardation every year. New York City alone reported 642 cases of lead poisoning in children in 1967. Chicago officials have testified that over a 10-year period there were 2,815 reported cases of lead poisoning with 163 deaths. Rochester, Baltimore, Washington and other large cities have reported significant numbers of lead-poisoned children.

Most of the children who develop "pica" are between one and three years old. They get this taste for scraps of paint especially in older inner-city housing, but even where maintenance is better they will nibble on window sills and other projecting surfaces.

This problem is hard to control in older homes. It involves covering up the walls, possibly even with wallboard or other durable coverings.

The second problem is the continuing sale of paints with higher than standard lead content. There is a voluntary standard that limits the lead content of indoor paint to 1 percent by weight of the solids. But since the standard is voluntary, manufacturers do not really need to observe it.

Moreover, there is no requirement, except in New York City, Baltimore and the state of Connecticut, that the label on new paint cans must state the lead content.

A survey by commission attorney James Michael, based on tests by the National Bureau of Standards, found that all of seven samples purchased contained some lead. The most was found in DuPont Lucite Spray Paint, Bronze Green. It had 9.64 percent lead in the solids, far above the 1 percent voluntary standard. An auto enamel spray in Bermuda Green under the Wizard brand had 3.82 percent lead.

The DuPont label had a warning in small type on the back of the can. While better than some of the other labels, the warning was not prominent enough, White commented.

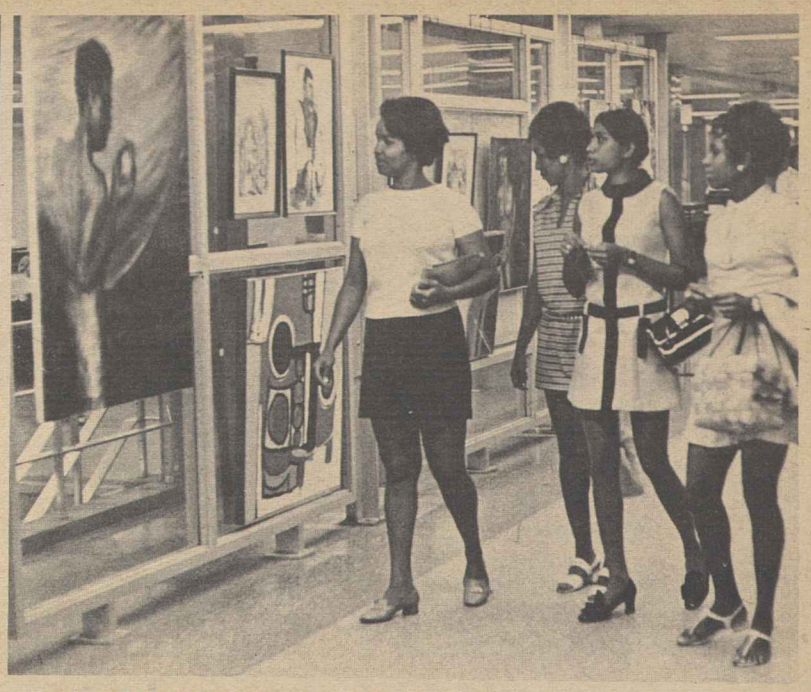
He also expressed concern over a Glidden Spred Gloss All-Purpose Enamel in Tulip Yellow which had a lead content of a little over one-half of 1 percent.

IF YOU HAVE small children, or even small visitors, you can see the need for looking closely at the labels of any interior or furniture paint you may buy.



What about painted toys or child furniture you may buy for children or grandchildren? In most cases you can be fairly sure that those now on the market do not have lead-based paints. The federal Child Protection Act bars such toxic items. But there is one possible exception. You can't always be sure on imported toys, White advises.

Even a brand of Japanese-made green dishes decorated with red berries was the subject of a warning of potential lead-poisoning danger by the Baltimore health commissioner. Tests showed that the dishes, sold on the Lefton brand name, contained a high percentage of lead in the glaze that could leak into liquids or other foods.

Another potential source recently discovered was "frosted" highball glasses. These had the frosting inside. The doctor of one woman who got sick had tests made and found the lead used for the frosting dissolved in alcohol a little at a time.

The problem of scraps of lead paint flaking off walls of older homes is even more complicated, because of the expense of covering such walls with something more protective than just other paint. That is why federal assistance is being considered.

Breakfast-Table Battle:

Nutritionists Agree—Cereals Oversold

The cereal manufacturers had their day before the Senate Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs in an effort to refute charges that many of their products offer little more than "empty calories" at high prices.

Charges made at earlier sessions of the subcommittee by a former White House consultant on nutrition have caused an uproar at the American breakfast table where dry cereals have become a staple food.

Robert Choate contended that 40 of 60 breakfast cereals were of little value and "fail as a complete meal even with milk added."

The cereal makers brought their own paid consultants and nutritional experts with them to refute these charges. They all contended that Choate was not an expert on food and nutrition.

Dr. Frederick J. Stare, chairman of the Harvard School of Public Health's Dept. of Nutrition, said the chart was "meaningless" and ignored the fact that most cereals are consumed with milk.

Dr. W. H. Sebreell, Jr., director of the Institute of Human Nutrition at Columbia University's School of Public Health, said eating cereal "actually is a good way to get children to use more milk."

A Quaker Oats executive contended that "if milk were added, every single one of the 60 cereals on Mr. Choate's list would have ranked higher by his system than eggs, bacon or any of the typical bakery products which are often used for breakfast."

At the conclusion of the testimony Sen. Frank Moss (D-Utah), chairman of the subcommittee, commented: "Were I scoring a contest between Mr. Choate and the cereal industry I would have to conclude that Mr. Choate emerges from this session today relatively unscathed."

Some independent nutritionists who examined the conflicting testimony offered this information to the Senators:

Dr. Michael Latham of Cornell said that dry cereals are generally neither poor nor superior foods but they are expensive compared with cheaper alternatives like bread, rice, corn grits or beans.

Cereals are all right if they are just one part of a generally balanced diet, but they have been oversold as a complete or even super food, he added.

Other nutritionists agreed. Dr. Ancel Keys of the University of Minnesota said "bread is as good nutritionally as dry cereals and a darned sight cheaper."

Latham noted that dry rice at 18 cents a pound has about twice as much protein and more calcium, iron and thiamine than "puffed rice" at 93 cents a pound.

What the cereal makers did not answer is Choate's charge that the most expensive, over-sweetened cereals are the ones sold to families through children. They are advertised particularly on children's Saturday morning TV shows. Choate said that nutritional information should be offered instead.

If Society Must Be Polarized, Make It Bathers vs. Showerers

By Jane Goodsell

IF THE WORLD can be divided into two kinds of people (it can't, but that's not going to stop me from trying), the best system is to classify them as Bathers and Showerers. How we choose to wash ourselves reveals a good deal about our psyches, our character, our self-image and our basic approach to life.

Those who prefer to sink into a warm, soothing tub are a different breed than those who stand upright beneath a needle-spray shower. Bathers are apt to be rather insecure, hesitant souls who yearn for comfort and reassurance. They are cautious, sensitive, romantic, and enjoy feeling pampered. They view the world as a very dangerous place which nobody gets out of alive, and they operate on the premise that one can't be too careful. People who buy flight insurance from airport vending machines are almost always Bathers.

Showerers are more aggressive types who welcome challenges, love excitement and are easily bored. They pride themselves on standing on their own two feet, even if it means trampling on somebody else's. Ladies who take showers almost never phone around to find out what other women are wearing to a party.

Most cat-lovers are bathers, probably because they can best identify with an animal that loves warmth and coziness as much as they do themselves. Showerers feel more rapport with Irish setters.

Showerers seldom make good chess players but they usually win at poker, especially if they're playing against Bathers.

BATHERS ARE six times as likely as Showerers to use cream in their coffee. They also have a fondness for bland, soothing foods—such as cottage cheese, cream soups and mashed potatoes. Showerers prefer stronger stuff—chili, spaghetti and pizza.

People who keep diaries are almost always Bathers. Showerers are more likely to write letters to the editor. Not all Bathers dot their i's with little circles, but Showerers never do.

Bathers wash paint brushes and get their shoes re-soled.

They buy things marked down to one-third off the original price. Showerers buy lottery tickets.

Bathers use more water than Showerers do. It upsets them to hear this, but it's a fact. Which is more than can be said for the other statements in this article.

House Ignores Danger Warnings, Votes Women's Rights Amendment

The House has passed the so-called equal-rights-for-women amendment to the Constitution despite the protests of the AFL-CIO and several women's groups.

The measure passed the House by 346 to 15—well over the two-thirds majority needed on Constitutional amendments—and was sent to the Senate, where it will need 66 votes to pass. It then must be ratified by three-fourths of the states, or 38 of the 50.

After House passage, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted to take up the amendment. The committee anounced its attention of holding three or four days of hearings, getting the measure to the Senate floor no later than mid-September.

Before the House vote AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote to all House members urging the defeat of the measure because "it could have serious adverse effects, many of them now unforeseen, in such fields as family relations, social security, property laws and the draft."

A similar appraisal was issued by six women and five trade union leaders. Their statement said the problem of inequality of women could be corrected only on an issue-by-issue basis.

"We who want equal opportunities, equal pay for equal work and equal status for women know that frequently we obtain real equality through a difference in treatment, rather than identity in treatment," the statement said.

The signers said they would continue their efforts "to achieve equality of opportunity for men and women without impairing the social legislation which promotes true equality by safeguarding the health, safety and economic welfare of all."

Specifically, the group said the amendment would jeopardize existing labor laws and standards that apply to women and would create havoc in the wide field of laws relating to property, personal status and marriage.

The six women signing the statement were Dorothy Height, president of the National Council of Negro Women; Mary Keyserling, former director of the Dept. of Labor's Women's Bureau; Olya Margolin, Washington representative of the National Council of Jewish Women; Margaret Mealey, executive director of the National Council of Catholic Women; Sarah Newman, executive secretary of the National Consumers League, and Myra Wolfgang, vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

They were joined by leaders of five unions with numerous women members: Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Patrick E. Gorman of the Meat Cutters, Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers and Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The amendment was brought to a vote through a discharge petition, which in effect "discharges" the House Judiciary Committee from handling the bill, introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.). The discharge petition passed, 332 to 22, paving the way for the lopsided final vote.

The amendment that passed says, "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex. Congress and the several states shall have the power, within their respective jurisdiction to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Some form of the amendment has been around Congress for 47 years. The Senate has held hearings on it several times and passed a version of it twice before. But the House had never acted previously.

For the past 21 years, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) has been the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, where the amendment lay dormant. Celler was outspoken in his criticism of the bill in House debate, citing the legal tangles that could result from its passage.

Of the 10 women House members, only Rep. Patsy Mink (D-Hawaii) and Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.) failed to sign the petition which brought the measure before the House. Nine voted for it in final passage, with Mrs. Sullivan, who had announced her opposition, not present.

Sends Pledge to Convention:

President to Name Fire Research Panel

Miami Beach—Pres. Nixon will soon appoint a 24-member National Commission on Fire Prevention & Control, the White House informed the Fire Fighters during the union's 30th convention.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan announced word of the President's decision to the convention delegates. The union has been calling for appointment of the commission since it was authorized by the Fire Research & Safety Act of 1968.

McClennan told the convention he was "tremendously heartened by the news that the White House is acting to make this program have real meaning for America." He added:

"It is essential that the commission, once it starts to function, move with determination to improve our record on fire safety. The problem gets worse every year. There is much to be done to make American fire research and safety reach acceptable levels. We have no time to lose."

The IAFF, a prime mover in winning enactment of the Fire Research & Safety Act, has considered activation of the commission the first major step in implementing the act. The commission's role is to seek out and publicize new ways of fire prevention and control.

During the convention, nearly 1,000 delegates representing some 150,000 U.S. and Canadian fire fighters, made clear the union's "complete opposition to the assignment of fire fighters and equipment as instruments of law enforcement, crowd control or dispersal at any time, for any purpose, whether in civil disorders, strikes, public gatherings or similar occasions."

The IAFF pointed out that state, local and national governments have the responsibility for protecting fire fighters from snipers, rock throwing and other forms of harassment. It called for legislation to provide fire fighters with protective equipment and assistance by peacekeeping agencies. It said fire fighters should have the right to withdraw from scenes of harassment if adequate protection is not provided.

The convention delegates re-elected McClennan, Sec.-Treas. Albert E. Albertoni and 15 of the 16 IAFF vice presidents. One vice president, Ross Ritto of Rochester, N.Y., did not run for re-election, and was succeeded by Frank Palumbo of New York City.

McClennan was re-elected by acclamation to his second two-year term. Albertoni defeated Pat Mangan of Buffalo, N.Y., by a three-to-one margin for election to his fourth term.

Lyle Cass of Westminster, Calif., and John Melnick of Winnipeg, Manitoba, were re-elected trustees, and James Neelon of Cleveland, O., defeated Robert Welch of Cincinnati for the third trusteeship.

In another action, the convention adopted a "one-man one-vote" proposal made by a committee composed of three AFL-CIO Executive Board members. The proposal to change convention voting procedures developed after leaders of a group of big-city locals had complained that the larger units in the union were under-represented at conventions.

The committee appointed by AFL-CIO President George Meany which developed the compromise, included Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. Emeritus Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, and the late Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians until his reccent death.

The resolution adopted by the Fire Fighters increases delegate strength of large locals, permits locals with fewer than 100 members to vote at conventions by proxy, and provides that voting on roll calls and for union officers will be on the basis of the total size of each local's membership.

In other actions, the convention raised monthly per capita dues from $1 to $1.25, effective next Jan. 1, with 10 cents of the increase earmarked for a new "emergency" fund, and raised McClennan's salary to $35,000 annually and Albertoni's to $33,000.

In raising the per capita dues, the convention rejected a proposal to increase them an additional 10 cents in 1972.

Minority Youths Start Training in Chicago Plan

Chicago—In little more than two months after the operators of the Chicago Plan received the first down payment of funds from the Labor Dept., minority group youths have started training for jobs in the construction trades.

The first installment of federal aid was received on May 26. It was for $106,553 of the $449,111 five-year grant that the Labor Dept. has authorized for the program.

A recruiting center was opened in mid-June to enlist the first class of trainees for the volunteer program sponsored by the building trades unions, contractors and black community groups.

The first class is made up of 75 trainees—75 percent Negro and 25 percent Latin-Americans—who are being tutored by the Operating Engineers at a Boy Scout camp in Crete, Ill.

Fred D. Hubbard, a Chicago alderman who is director of Chicago Plan, said that by mid-August three recruiting centers will be opened. A fourth center is expected to be opened later, Hubbard added.

Operators of the Chicago Plan are currently focusing on locating the new centers and hiring staff members to man the program's operations, Hubbard said.

The Operating Engineers are the first of 19 building trades unions expected to participate in the program. The initial class will receive eight weeks of training and familiarization in the use of heavy earth-moving equipment at the camp. Another class of 75 trainees is scheduled to follow the first group, Hubbard reported.

Sponsors of the plan have set an immediate goal of 4,000 more construction jobs for minority group members in the Chicago area.

Besides the Chicago & Cook County Building Trades Council, the Chicago Plan is administered by the Coalition for United Community Action, the Chicago Building Construction Employers Association and Illinois State Employment Service.

Hubbard noted that all these groups participated in putting the first phases of the plan into operation.

Glass Workers Approve Union's Reorganization

Miami Beach—A major structural reorganization of the Glass & Ceramic Workers was approved by delegates to the union's 19th biennial convention here.

The changes would eliminate the second international vice president's post and create three regional vice presidencies to provide better coordination of organizing and servicing.

The convention action must be ratified through a referendum vote of all locals, scheduled for Sept. 29, before the changes can be implemented.

The union's present structure of six districts will be retained within the regional set-up and membership on the international executive board expanded.

Other convention proposals to be submitted to the membership urge that conventions be held every four years instead of biennially and that convention actions be final except those relating to dues, election of international officers, and action upon merger proposals.

The convention changes would also include one-member, one-vote representation by delegates.

The convention also voted to change the period between the start of a strike and the first payment of strike fund benefits to 14 days instead of 21 days. Weekly strike benefits were increased by $5 to $12 depending upon the number of dependents.

The regional plan is designed to permit greater use of organizers and service staff personnel formerly restricted to districts. Organizing, while under the immediate supervision of vice presidents within the regions, will be controlled overall by Pres. Ralph Reiser, who would be permitted to shift organizers from region to region.

The 488 delegates heard major addresses by Dir. Al Barkan of COPE; AFL-CIO Assistant Organizing Dir. Edward Haines; David Lewis, deputy leader of Canada's New Democratic party; Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse of the Auto Workers; Sec.-Treas. William Dodge of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Pres. Lee Minton of the Glass Bottle Blowers.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph Stanzione reported the union's assets totaled more than $1 million.

Appropriations Gap:

Fund Lag Starves Needed Programs

Programs for the health and welfare of the American people are being starved by fiscal gimmickry, a recent study shows, and the situation has been growing worse in the past five years.

The study identifies the problem as the lag between congressional authorizations and appropriations—the difference between what is promised and is really made available.

Prepared by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and the Council of State Governments, the study reviews 169 federal grant programs between 1966 and 1970.

In that time, authorizations for the 169 programs grew from $14 bililon to $24 billion. But the amount actually appropriated was only $11.6 billion of the $1.4 billion in 1966 and only $15.9 billion of the $24 billion in 1970.

Thus, the study showed, the gap between authorizations and appropriations is widening. The difference was only $2.7 billion in the first of the five years, when some 80 percent of the authorization was appropriated. But in the last year, the gap was $8.5 billion, with only 65 percent appropriated.

"The point must be underscored," the report says, "that despite the authorization-appropriation gap, the outlays for these programs registered a 70 percent rise in the five years studied." But the increases were still not as much as the authorization bills would make them appear.

Most severely affected, the report says, are the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Office of Economic Opportunity. In contrast the two newest cabinet-level departments, Transportation and Housing & Urban Development, are not so severely affected because they are funded "under arrangements specifically calculated to keep authorizations and appropriations in close alignment, such as trust funds and debt service grants."

Of particular interest to the sponsors of the survey is the bind a local or state government is left in when it counts on federal "promises" only to have the appropriation fall short.

For instance, the study traces the history of appropriations for federal grants to build waste treatment plants.

In 1966 and 1967, a relatively modest $150 million was authorized and was fully appropriated.

But beginning in 1968, when public attention to environmental problems began to heat up, the authorizations jumped—to $450 million for 1968, $700 million for 1969 and $1 billion for 1970. And that's when appropriations began to sag. Less than one-half of the $450 million for 1968 and less than one-third of the $700 million for 1969 was actually appropriated before a return to 80 percent for 1970, or $800 million of the authorized $1 billion.

The Council of State Governments, one of the two sponsors of the study, is a 40-year-old organization while the advisory commission is a 26-member bipartisan body created by federal law in 1959.

Senior Citizens Set Up New Watchdog Unit

The organization of Concerned Seniors for Better Government was announced by Matthew DeMore, retired secretary-treasurer of the Machinists and chairman of the new group.

"The purpose of Concerned Seniors is to spread information to retired citizens, now dependent on social security income, on the voting records and concern for the elderly of various candidates for national and state office," DeMore said.

"In the 1965-70 period, Medicare and Medicaid programs have come into existence," he pointed out.

"There have been three increases in social security benefits, and final action may be completed in this session of Congress on a small additional benefit beginning in 1971," he said.

"Retired seniors also have a natural interest in consumer legislation such as the truth-in-packaging law, housing laws, the rent-supplement program and adequate meat inspection," he added.

REORGANIZED OPERATIONS of the Human Resources Development Institute are detailed for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by HRDI Pres. Julius F. Rothman, right, and Executive Dir. Robert M. McGlotten. The restructuring includes the appointment of eight regional directors at key locations across the country.

TV Campaign Limits Cleared for Final Action

for governor and lieutenant governor will not go into effect until 1971.

House action came only a few days after the AFL-CIO Executive Council, meeting in Chicago, issued a call for federal subsidies to candidates to end their reliance on the very wealthy to meet today's increased campaign costs.

But, the council said, in the absence of the absolute equality of federal subsidies, a limit on TV spending and a reduction in the cost of TV air times are acceptable approaches.

The bill also requires that TV stations sell time to candidates at their lowest rates, those used for large buyers of TV time. It is estimated this alone would reduce the TV cost of a political campaign by 30 to 40 percent.

And it also provides for suspension of the equal-time provision in elections for president and vice president. This will pave the way for debates between the principal candidates like those held in 1960, without the fear that splinter candidates will be entitled to equal time.

In a presidential election, the 7-cents-per-vote limit would mean that each candidate could spend about $5 million on a TV campaign. This would be about what the Democrats were able to raise for the Humphrey-Muskie ticket in 1968, but less than half the $12.8 million spent on behalf of Nixon-Agnew.

Applied to some states, it could also mean drastic reductions. The estimated $430,000 allowed for TV time in New York, for instance, would be only a fraction of what Nelson Rockefeller spent in 1966.

The limit for primaries will be 3.5 cents per vote cast. That would be about $215,000 in New York, or decidedly less than Richard L. Ottinger spent in winning the Democratic senatorial nomination this year. The limits for Pennsylvania and Ohio would be about $350,000 to $400,000 for primary and general election expenditures.

The 7-cent formula would apply to small states and congressional districts only down to a minimum of $20,000. It is expected that the $20,000 floor would take effect for many congressional districts in general elections.

The bill, which now has to go back to the House and Senate for final approval, may face a partisan political battle.

As the Executive Council pointed out in its statement on campaign spending, any limits would generally curtail Republicans far more sharply than Democrats.

Senate Democrats — 24 of whom are up for re-election this year—had the numbers to pass the bill. But in the House, the measure didn't move until the compromise was reached of making the law effective in 1971.

That brought Administration support and paved the way to final passage. GOP strategists reasoned that limits would work for the incumbent against a lesser-known opponent, so they were willing to see the measure go into effect for 1972.

But with the conferees approving the measure for this fall's elections, the battle lines are likely to be drawn all over again.

FTC Critic Named To Head Agency

Miles W. Kirkpatrick, who last year said the Federal Trade Commission should be abolished if it does not do more to protect consumers and enforce antitrust laws, was nominated by Pres. Nixon to head the regulatory agency.

Kirkpatrick was named to succeed Caspar Weinberger, now deputy director of the new Office of Management & Budget. A. Everette MacIntyre is currently serving as acting chairman of the FTC.

House Overrides School Veto, Sustains Nixon on HUD Funds

fiscal 1971 appropriations would not be much, if any, above Administration budget requests by the time all bills are handled. Besides, they argued, the measures he has chosen to veto — on education, housing, medical facilities and veterans care—are among the nation's most critical needs.

The vetoes were the third and fourth of the year for Nixon. He suffered his first reversal just June 30 when both the House and Senate voted to override his veto of a $2.79 billion measure for building and modernizing hospitals, outpatient clinics and other medical care facilities.

In January, Nixon's first veto as president was sustained by both houses. That one was on a $19.7 billion package for the Depts. of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare.

The latest two vetoes came on measures calling for about $1 billion more than the Administration had requested in the first place. It was pointed out in House debate on the education bill that the Administration had sought 95 percent of the money in that bill.

The $4.4 billion final total was $453 million more than the Administration had requested and $606 more than was voted for the federal aid to education program in the previous year.

Of the $4.4 billion, full funding of $1.47 billion was retained for Title I of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act. Labor and education groups were particularly anxious to retain that funding, which provides special aid to the nation's 16,000 school districts with concentrations of poor children.

Some parts of the bill were reduced from Administration requests, including the $1.5 billion sought for emergency desegregation measures. That was sliced in half, to $750 million, on the grounds that the money could not be spent constructively by the time school opens in September.

The Senate had originally passed a total of $4.8 billion in federal funds to education, with the conference committee arriving at the $4.4 billion figure as a compromise with the House's $4.1 billion.

The $18.8 billion appropriation for HUD and related agencies was $541 million over the Administration's requests, with most of the extra money inserted for urban renewal, water and sewer projects and veterans' medical care.

Of the $18.8 billion in the bill, $3.6 billion was for HUD. That amount was $650 million more than the Administration sought, but cuts in other parts of the measure reduced the overall total.

The 289-114 House vote to override the education veto compared with its vote of 279-98 when it overrode Nixon's previous veto of the medical facilities bill. The Senate voted 76-19 to override on that one.

Originally, the education bill passed the House on a 357 to 30 vote and the Senate 88-0. The HUD and independent agencies measure passed the House by voice vote and the Senate by 70-8.

Reorganization Seeks to Widen HRDI Services

The Human Resources Development Institute has reorganized its national offices and field operations in an effort to improve services and to work more closely with various AFL-CIO departments.

Under the new set-up, HRDI appointed eight regional directors who are spotted at key cities across the country. Previously, field operations were directed by three national coordinators.

In announcing the restructuring, which will be effective in September, HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman and Executive Dir. Robert M. McGlotten said the changes are designed to undertake a more comprehensive effort in the AFL-CIO manpower programs.

Among the higher level positions in the national offices, Alfred P. Love was named assistant director of the institute. Charles Hollowell was appointed national field director and will oversee the operations of the regional directors. James Boyle was named job placement director.

The regional directors are Paul Flynn, with operations in Boston and Connecticut; John Burnell, New York state, Newark and Trenton, N.J.; Ben Stahl, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Camden, N.J.; James Boyle, Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Virginia and West Virginia.

Other directors are Lyle Eller for the West Coast region—Portland, Ore., Seattle, San Diego, Los Angeles and Oakland; Michael Arnold, Southwest—Dallas, Houston, San Antonio, Oklahoma City, Phoenix and Denver; Charles Bradford, Midwest—St. Louis, Kansas City, Nashville, Louisville, Chicago, Wisconsin and Memphis; Peter Babin, South—New Orleans, Atlanta, Birmingham, Miami, Tampa and North Carolina; and Kara Coates, Central States—Detroit, Akron, Cincinnati, Dayton, Cleveland, Toledo and Indianapolis.

Boston Crafts Join Minority Training Plan

A Boston training program involving the area's AFL-CIO building and construction trades will receive a $608,105 federal grant to recruit, counsel and place minority group members in all levels of the building crafts, the Labor Dept. announced.

Operating on a one-year contract, the program is designed to enable all participants to achieve full journeyman status and union recognition.

Trade unionists will be employed by the Construction Jobs Program of Boston, Inc., a non-profit corporation, to recruit applicants for the project. They will be seeking members of minority groups who have backgrounds in mechanical skills and want to work in the construction trades.

The non-profit corporation is made up of the Building & Construction Trades Council of Metropolitan Boston, the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts, and the Black Community Construction Coalition.

CONVENTIONS

The Bricklayers have announced that the union's 1970 convention, previously set to start Sept. 14 in Atlantic City, will be held at the Washington Hilton Hotel in Washington, D.C., Aug. 31-Sept. 4.

The New Hampshire AFL-CIO has scheduled its 1970 convention Oct. 2-4 at Shelburne.

Senate Unit Backs Plan:

Manpower Bill Asks Public Service Jobs

train them and put them to work in necessary jobs under competent supervision by elected officials."

"If enacted, this bill would be one of the major achievements of the 91st Congress and the most significant advance against poverty and unemployment since 1964, when the current federal effort against poverty was undertaken," Nelson said.

The proposed program would have 80 percent federal funding, but would be administered largely by state and local officials.

The committee's action had the effect of taking the Administration's $2 billion program and dividing it into thirds for various programs, then adding another $1.5 billion per year in public service employment provisions. The bill would extend the extra expenditure for three years.

The one-third shares of the basic $2 billion, or about $666 million each would go to:

- States and cities already participating in federal manpower programs for their use in supplying jobs for the unemployed.
- Programs administered by the Dept. of Labor, such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps.
- Cities with populations of over 75,000 for devising new programs of their own.

Thus the program would not only be locally administered, but would go a long way toward correcting the prime fault of existing manpower programs—developing candidates for jobs that don't exist or for jobs which disappear first in a time of economic downturn, such as at present when there is 5 percent unemployment.

The idea of public service employment as a solution has also been endorsed by the National Urban Coalition, the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, U.S. Conference of Mayors and National League of Cities.

It's not known how far the proposed program would go toward meeting the needs spelled out in such studies as the Kerner Commission's call for one million public service jobs. While not solving the nation's total needs, it would be a start toward attaining adequate public service employment. The idea has been debated in Congress before, but never enacted.

In other congressional developments:

- The House approved legislation which would give the Dept. of Transportation the power to tighten railroad safety regulations. Citing the upturn in rail deaths in the last 12 years, the measure called for the Dept. of Transportation to "review all aspects of hazardous materials transportation."

The bill will go to conference committee for reconciliation with a Senate measure which passed earlier.

- The House approved a bill which would give the District of Columbia one non-voting House delegate. The bill, which passed by a vote of 300 to 57, would also establish a 12-member commission designed to improve efficiency of the D.C. government.
- The Senate Appropriations Committee voted to accept a $1 billion clean water program which the House inserted in the $5.2 billion public works appropriation. The committee called for immediate availability of the money rather than an installment plan payment backed by the Administration, which the committee called "time-consuming."
- The House passed and sent to Pres. Nixon a bill that would increase the interest on Series E Savings Bonds from 5 to 5½ percent.
- The Senate rejected several amendments to the military procurement bill which would limit deployment of antiballistic missile sites. Several other attempts to limit ABM sites are expected in the Senate.

JOB EVALUATION AND TIME STUDIES are conducted by union representatives at one of the Union Industrial Engineering Institutes held at the University of Wisconsin. Classes are conducted in the university's machine shop to give the participants practical experience in the field of industrial engineering and its relationship to collective bargaining. The institutes, now in their 13th year, are sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and the university. Representatives from 15 unions participated in the two-week summer courses.

Congress Urged to Strengthen Emergency School Aid Measure

Drastic changes are needed in the Administration's emergency school aid bill to make it an effective tool in wiping out segregation and discrimination in the nation's school systems, the AFL-CIO told the Senate Education Subcommittee.

In its present form, the proposed law could "very well result in delaying rather than speeding school integration," federation Education Dir. Walter G. Davis said in a statement submitted to the subcommittee.

Davis expressed particular concern over a provision in the bill that would allow certain school districts to double-count their minority children and still qualify for additional federal funds.

"This provision would reward recalcitrance," he observed.

He said that schools that defied the federal desegregation law would qualify for more federal assistance under the provision than those which obeyed the law.

Davis further noted that the bill would allow making the double-count provision retroactive for two years.

"The double-count provision should be eliminated if this bill is truly to serve equitably the purpose of school integration," he declared.

The AFL-CIO is thoroughly in accord with the stated purposes of the bill, Davis said, but revisions are needed in certain sections to bring about speedier desegregation.

"Unless such changes are made, we would be constrained to oppose it," he warned.

He also cited the section that provides for "interracial educational programs or projects involving the joint participation of minority group and non-minority group children attending different schools."

Davis said the AFL-CIO agrees that there is a need for special efforts to compensate for racial isolation where meaningful integration may be difficult.

"What we find wrong with this section is not its intent, but the terms under which a school district may qualify," he said.

School districts having as few as 10,000 children could argue that racially isolated schools were unavoidable, he said. They could then claim that they should use the emergency school aid funds not to establish integrated schools, but to develop projects as an attempt to overcome the disadvantages of keeping them segregated, he observed.

Like the double-count provision of the bill, this section could have the effect of frustrating efforts at integration rather than encouraging them, Davis said.

He suggested that the legislation make more positive efforts in encouraging school systems to find ways of overcoming racial isolation.

Davis further expressed concern that the bill leaves too much authority in the hands of local officials, who sometimes "are subjected to unbearable political pressures in the absence of clear federal mandates."

"For these reasons," he declared, "we believe this subcommittee should be careful to outline specifically . . . the purposes for which funds . . . may be spent."

Labor is also disturbed, he continued, "about the broad grant of discretionary authority placed in the hands of the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare."

He noted that the wording of the bill allows for the Secretary to expend one-third of the funds "as he may find necessary."

Davis also asked where the $1.5 billion that the Administration pledged for the program would come from.

"The AFL-CIO would hope that this $1.5 billion would be 'new' money—not funds diverted from other social programs," he said.

Noting that the federation has "long been deeply concerned about segregation, discrimination and racial isolation in the nation's school systems," Davis said that the United States needs a program to overcome these problems.

"We need this bill—if properly amended to assure that its objectives will be achieved—as a vehicle for accelerating our progress . . . toward true equal educational opportunity, a goal which still eludes us some 16 years after the Supreme Court pointed the way in 1954," he said.

New Loopholes Weaken Bill to Curb Export of American Workers' Jobs

import remedies on a commodity which was being imported to an extent that it did "major injury" to the U.S. industry.

Now the commission need only find "substantial" injury from imports. The AFL-CIO has pointed out that American shoe workers were virtually out of business before the commission found anything "major" under the old wording.

But even if the commission finds "substantial" cause, the President is given equally wide discretionary powers. He could choose to attempt international negotiation rather than quotas, or—in a second procedure—he could rule that quotas "are not in the national interest."

An earlier wording of the bill gave the Tariff Commission an exact target on when to act—such as when the import of a commodity rose to more than 15 percent of domestic U.S. consumption. But that provision was modified and other conditions were added to conciliate the bill with Administration wishes. That came after a veto was threatened if the bill were too stringent.

Several other aspects of the bill caused concern for labor—including one that could cripple even the limits on textile and shoe imports. The President is given the power to exempt from quotas a country or product he finds "non-disruptive" to U.S. industry.

Presuming this would be used to ease quotas for commodities from small, "emerging" nations, the result could be a rush by multinational firms to locate in those countries.

The increasing internationalization of trade through the intra-corporate shufflings of multinational firms has been one of the main causes cited by labor for the current crisis in U.S. trade.

One other provision of the new bill provides what amounts to a tax giveaway to these firms. Through DISC, or Domestic International Sales Corp., proposed by the Treasury Dept., firms would be given tax incentives for exports.

But labor groups have pointed out that DISC amounts to a new tax loophole which would benefit large companies and result in U.S. revenue losses of up to $600 million in its first year. Also, it was stressed, there is no incentive to increase U.S. exports. The tax benefits would flow to all firms exporting goods, whether their exports increased or not.

Another provision weakening the final bill would empower the President to repeal the "American Selling Price" on chemicals and some other items. The ASP is a system whereby duties are set according to U.S. prices rather than their foreign value.

The AFL-CIO supported retention of ASP, charging that its repeal would mean the loss of American jobs in benzennoid chemical plants here, with no resultant reduction in prices of these goods to U.S. consumers.

The Administration had sought the power to repeal the ASP on the ground it was a major irritant to foreign countries, especially in western Europe.

Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), chairman of the Finance Committee, has tentatively scheduled the start of Senate action on the bill for September with hopes of passing it in this session.

Office Union Names New Vice President

New York — The Office & Professional Employes announced the election of Harvey R. Markusen of Twin Cities Local 12 as a vice president and member of the union's executive board. He succeeds Arthur P. Lewandowski of Milwaukee, who is now OPEIU's director of organization.

Markusen will serve a 10-state midwest region, Pres. Howard Coughlin said.

Congress Rebuffs Nixon, Retains School Aid Funds

Jobless Rate For Youths Up Sharply

America's young people were victims of the nation's economic downturn as they hunted jobs this summer, the Labor Dept. reported.

In the 16-21 age bracket, fewer people were employed this summer than last summer and the number and percentage of unemployed youth rose sharply over the year.

The ranks of young job hunters were swelled by returning veterans of military service and included both youths seeking permanent jobs and those seeking summer employment between school terms.

But the Bureau of Labor Statistics report stressed that the "economic slowdown" made job hunting "more difficult than in any summer in recent years." It "seriously hampered" efforts of both public and private groups to provide jobs for youth, the BLS said.

As a result, the June-July unemployment rate in the age bracket was 15.7 percent, the highest in six years and up from 12.8 percent last summer.

The total number of 16-21 year-olds with jobs dropped 210,000 below last year, to 11.2 million.

The number of unemployed moved up 410,000 over a year ago to 2.1 million—and would have been substantially higher if those who gave up the job search were counted.

A smaller percentage of young people competed in the labor market, the government study noted. The reason, it suggested, was "unfavorable economic conditions and subsequent discouragement over job prospects."

Among black youths, the unemployment rate rose from 24.6 percent last year to 30.2 percent this summer, and the jobless rate for white youths climbed from 11.2 percent to 13.6 percent over the year.

The number of young people employed in retail trade continued to rise. But this was overshadowed by the sharp slump in manufacturing jobs. The number of young persons employed in the goods-producing segment of the economy dropped to 2.5 million, nearly 470,000 less than last year.

Public agencies—of federal, state and local governments—also employed fewer young people than they did last summer.

The drop in summer employment over the previous year was the first in nine years, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted.

Senate Unit Strikes Out ILO Funds

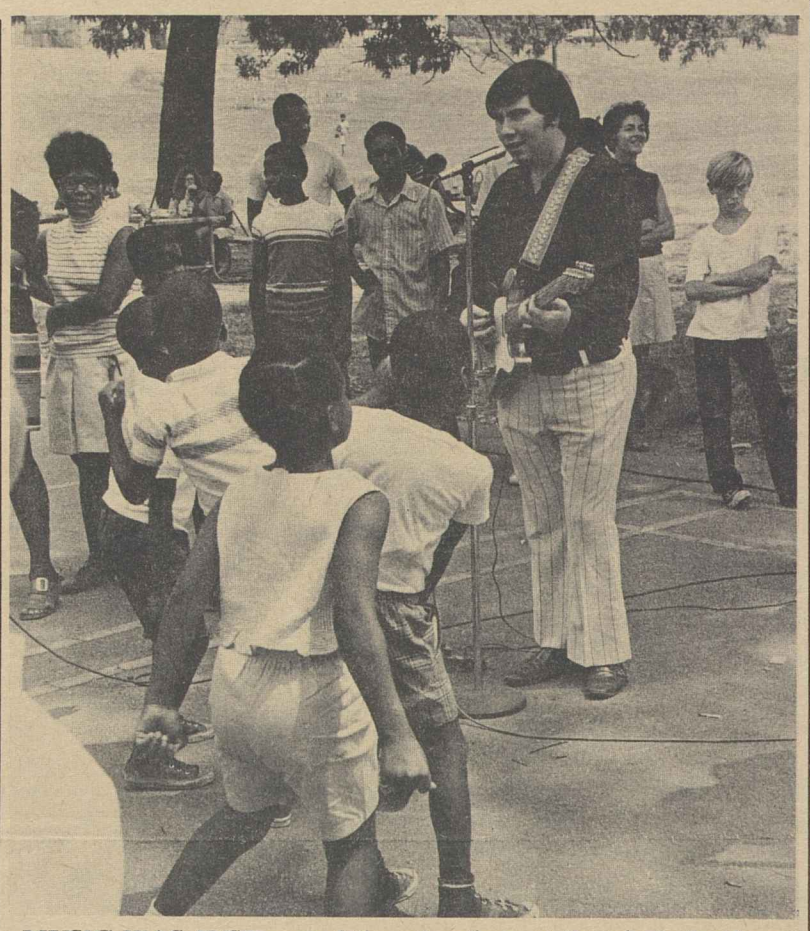
The Senate Appropriations Committee has served a blunt notice to the International Labor Organization that the United States doesn't intend to finance its transformation from an agency concerned with better working conditions and human rights into a propaganda forum for the Communist bloc.



It struck from the State Dept. budget the $3.7 million appropriation that had been earmarked as the U.S. contribution to the operations of the ILO for the six-month June-December period. The United States, one of 120 member-nations, finances 25 percent of the ILO budget.

The Appropriations Committee is also asking the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, which has legislative jurisdiction in the area, to review the question of U.S. participation in the ILO.

The fund cutoff followed protests from American labor, employer and government spokesmen over the increasing influence of nations opposed to everything the ILO has stood for—including trade unions free of government control.

Appointment of a Soviet representative as an assistant director general with supervision over a number of ILO departments was regarded as a "last straw" in what the AFL-CIO Executive Council earlier this month branded a "head-in-the-sands approach to Commu-

Heavy GOP Vote Helps Reject Veto

Congress told Pres. Nixon that his spending priorities are wrong and that increased funds for aid to education are not "fiscally irresponsible" as the White House has claimed.

The Senate voted 77-16 to override the presidential veto, with a majority of Republicans joining a solid bloc of Democrats in repassing the $4.4 billion aid to education bill, carrying $453 million more than the Administration had requested.

Earlier, the House had voted 289-114 to override. Both votes were well above the two-thirds margin required by the Constitution to pass legislation over a veto.

The heavy Republican vote against Nixon's position sharply undercut the widely-reported White House strategy of using the veto as an election-year bludgeon to brand congressional Democrats as "spenders" and feeders of inflation.

Significantly, not a single Republican senator who is a candidate for re-election this year voted to uphold the President's veto.

The AFL-CIO, in urging the Senate to override the veto, noted that the final version of the appropriations bill had been approved unanimously.

The money it provided, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller wrote all senators, represents "a sound investment in the country's future" and "reductions would be contrary to the national interest."

It was the second time in less than two months that Congress overrode a Nixon veto. A hospital and medical facilities construction bill was passed over the President's objections by wide margins on June 30. Nixon did, however, succeed in making his veto of a housing

Labor Cites Urgency Of Wage Floor Boost

Labor witnesses urged an immediate increase in the minimum wage, a major expansion of coverage, and steps to reduce the basic workweek as a House subcommittee continued its hearings on amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., endorsed testimony presented earlier by Federation Pres. George Meany and stressed that the progress made by the legislation enacted in 1966 has been virtually wiped out by inflation.

The $1.60 federal wage floor adopted that year today buys only a little more than the earlier minimum of $1.25, Clayman noted.

He and Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky, who also testified before the Labor subcommittee, said a reduction in the straight-time workweek would spread employment and help combat recession.

Potofsky urged the subcommittee to consider a 35-hour week without reduction in pay "because it will get to the heart of the problem by alleviating unemployment."

Clayman termed a higher wage floor the solution to the problem of the "working poor"—the millions of Americans who "work hard at useful jobs for wages too low to live on."

A $2.50-an-hour wage floor would be fully justified, Clayman said. "It may well be political reality that only a $2 minimum can be expected to pass," he noted, "but the clock is running and with each passing day that minimum is becoming more and more inadequate."

On coverage, he urged that "every wage and salary earner should be protected by the Fair

'Project Rebuild':

Union Men, Money Aid Storm Victims

Corpus Christi—The Texas AFL-CIO and the Texas Building & Construction Trades Council launched "Project Rebuild Corpus Christi" as money, men and materials began moving into the 30-square-mile Texas Gulf Coast area devastated by Hurricane Celia.

The American Red Cross reported that since the AFL-CIO Executive Council made a $10,000 contribution to the Red Cross emergency relief fund, affiliated unions have begun to respond to Pres. George Meany's call for help. The latest to contribute are the Carpenters, $10,000; the Amalgamated Transit Union and the Machinists, $5,000 each.

In Austin, Tex., State AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown announced that the central body and the Building Trades Council have agreed to cooperate with other disaster relief agencies in "developing a coordinated plan for the job of reconstructing" Corpus Christi and its environs.

The first phase of the joint project, Brown said, will be to set up information centers to inform union members and low-income families how they can get help, such as Small Business Administration loans and various kinds of Red Cross assistance.

Executive Sec. Gerald Brown of the state building trades council said construction unions and contractor associations in Corpus Christi will work together on a program to begin permanent reconstruction of storm-damaged buildings.

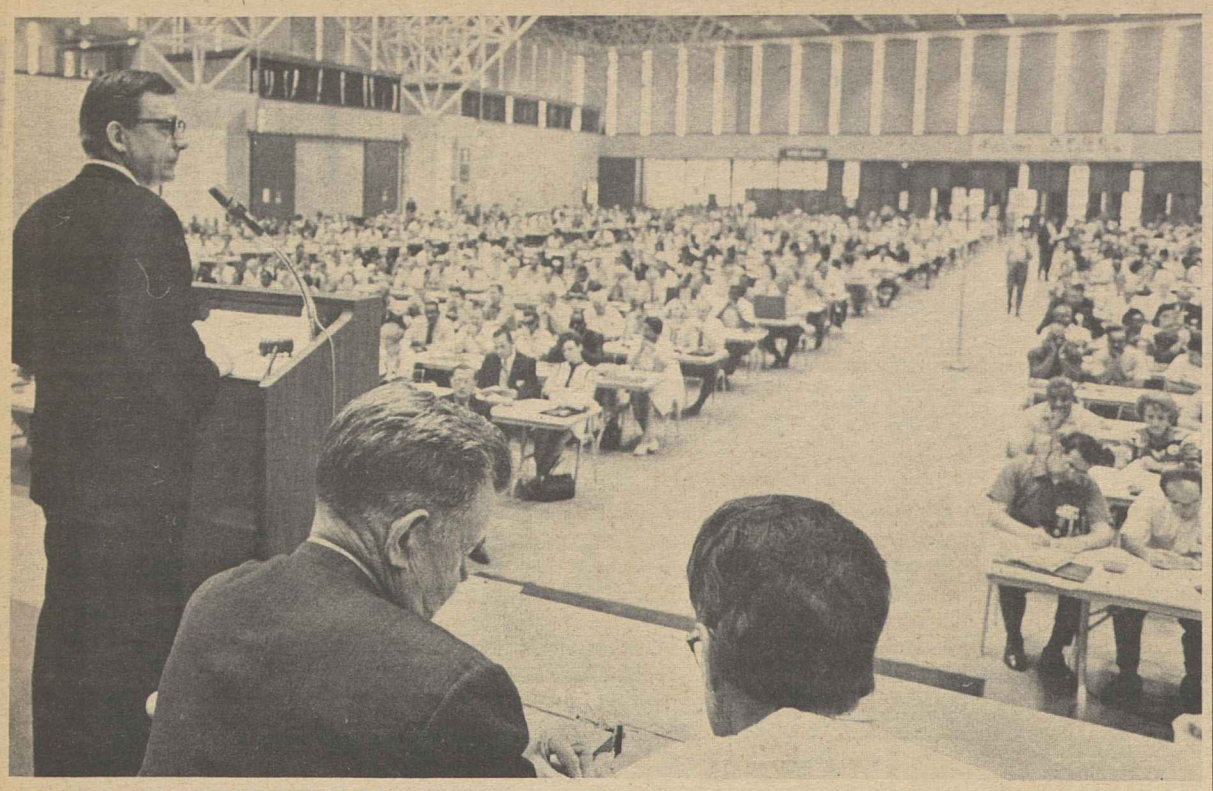
RCA Strikers Approve Terms of New Contract

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced that local unions representing a "decisive majority" of the 12,000 members in RCA plants have approved terms settling an 11-week strike for a new contract. The strike began June 2.



Union members began returning to work at locations where ratification was voted, but five IUE locals voted to stay out until agreement is reached on local contract issues.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings called the settlement "a very good one, achieved by the determination of those who walked the picket line" for more than two months.

Because of the cooperation of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the stage has been set for "real coordinated bargaining" in the next round of negotiations, Jennings said.

The IBEW had voted before the IUE walkout to accept a 42-month contract covering 23,000 workers in 12 other RCA plants. Its representatives sat in on final IUE-RCA

ADDRESSING DELEGATES to Government Employes convention in Denver, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland pledged labor movement's total support for full collective bargaining rights for all federal workers.

Militancy of Rail Workers Called Response to Management Policies

Las Vegas—Pres. C. J. Chamberlain of the Railroad Signalmen declared at the opening session of the union's 38th convention that labor relations policies of American railroads have created an unprecedented new militancy among railroad workers and their unions.

"Most railroads have no real concern for their employes' welfare," Chamberlain said in a report on his three years of stewardship as president.

"They have no qualms about overburdening an employe, chiseling when they can get away with it, and reneging on agreements supposedly negotiated in good faith."

These hard-boiled attitudes, he said, have forced all rail unions to take adamant and militant stands in current negotiations. And, he emphasized, "so long as our membership supports us in this posture we will continue the hard line."

The Signalmen "have only scratched the surface in what has to be done if we are to achieve our primary objective—getting better fringe benefits and wage rates . . . commensurate with the exacting skills our members are required to possess to perform their jobs," Chamberlain declared.

He added: "All concerned, including the railroad industry and the White House, will come to know that the highly skilled employes we represent want and deserve substantial wage increases. And they are going to get these improvements," he pledged.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the delegates that solutions to the many problems facing the railroad industry must be found in "positive leadership and action" by the Executive Branch of the federal government and by Congress.

"Whether we like it or not, the government is deeply involved in the future of the industry and its workers," Kirkland said. "And that is just another way of saying that the answer lies in informed and effective political action by the people—especially the people we represent."

Kirkland stressed that real collective bargaining will never flourish on the railroads "until our political action becomes effective enough to create strong doubts in the ranks of railroad management on the outcome of their proposals to Congress for compulsory arbitration and other restrictions on unions."

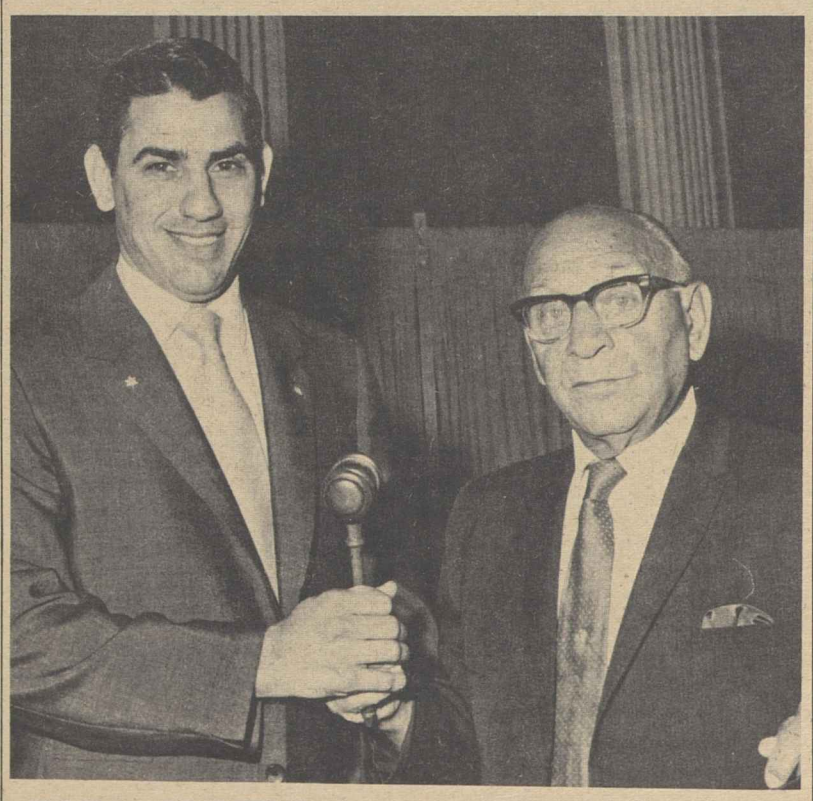
He praised the work being done by the Signalmen and other rail unions in the face of overwhelming problems, including denial of the right to strike to enforce true collective bargaining on bread-and-butter proposals.

Chamberlain told the convention that the 1968 rail wage movement was an important "first" for the union. It was, he said, the first time in recent history that the Signalmen conducted separate negotiations with management on a national level.



"We demanded that the railroads bargain with us separately, and we won our point," he said. "We have established the recognition of our brotherhood as the representative of a highly skilled special group of railroad employes."

Sen. Howard W. Cannon, Nevada Democrat, reviewed legislation that has been referred to the Commerce Committee on which he serves. He agrees fully with union objections to the inadequate service railroads are now providing, he said.

Needed by the nation, Cannon said, is a rail transportation system that would provide "fast, efficient, comfortable transportation of people and goods."

William J. Usery, Jr., assistant secretary of labor, told the delegates ways must be found to speed up rail negotiations. Corrective action is indicated, he said, "when it takes 18 months just to get a case heard, and as much as three years from inception to settlement" of contract negotiations.

Usery called on unions and the industry to avoid using the presidential emergency board provision as a "crutch" to supplant real collective bargaining. If an emergency really exists, he said, appointment of a board would be in order. But many cases that are referred to special boards should not go that route, he suggested.

SYMBOL OF OFFICE changes hands in the Lathers as new Pres. Robert Georgine, left, receives the presiding officer's gavel from retiring Pres. Sal Maso. Georgine, formerly an international representative for the union, is 39. He won election to the post at the convention at which Maso stepped down after 34 years of service as an officer.

New Secretary-Treasurer Elected:

AFGE Delegates Boost Per Capita

Denver—The American Federation of Government Employes voted an increase in per capita payments, elected officers and deleted a "no-strike" clause from the Union's constitution in major convention actions here.

Pres. John F. Griner was reelected to a fifth term, defeating his opponent, Daniel J. Kearney, by a 3-1 margin. The vote was Griner 174,462, Kearney 67,427.

For the number two post, incumbent Executive Vice President Clyde M. Webber turned back two challengers. That vote was: Webber 159,336½, Everett Brouillette 56,460¾, Donald Jones 26,362.

Seven candidates were nominated for the secretary-treasurer's post, with the election going to Douglas H. Kershaw. On the fourth and final ballot he defeated incumbent Esther F. Johnson, 149,116½ to 79,188½. Kershaw is secretary-treasurer of a 4,100-member local at Hill Air Force Base in Utah.

Removal of the "no-strike" clause from AFGE's constitution was brought in resolution form to the convention floor by a majority of the Constitution Committee and was approved overwhelmingly by the delegates.

The "no-strike" clause had been in AFGE's constitution since the union's founding in 1932. An attempt to remove it at the 1968 convention had been turned back by more than a 2-1 vote.

The delegates then turned to the union's financial structure, and raised the monthly per capita payment in two equal parts:

- An increase of 20 cents effective Apr. 1, 1971, with 5 cents earmarked for the building fund.
- An additional 20 cents effective April 1, 1972, with another 5 cents earmarked for the building fund.

The second step will boost the total per capita to $2 with 20 cents set aside for a building fund.

In other convention action, the delegates adopted new constitutional language on the duties of the president, offenses, trials, penalties and appeals to meet the standards of the Labor Management Reporting & Disclosure Act and the Standards of Conduct for Labor Organizations.

The convention heard from the president of a striking local of Colorado lettuce workers on the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and raised $2,300 for victims of Hurricane Celia.

The delegates adopted resolutions pledging support for farm workers' organizing efforts, home rule for the District of Columbia, and merger of all AFL-CIO federal employe unions.

The convention raised the per capita tax to $4.40 a month, adding 50 cents to the general fund and 15 cents more to the convention fund. Salaries were increased from $20,000 a year to $25,000 for the president and from $16,000 to $20,000 for the secretary-treasurer.

In other election balloting, Sec.-Treas. J. Earl Ferguson won a four-man race for a third term in office. He has held the post since 1964.

Returned for new three-year terms were Vice Presidents Cornelius J. Haggerty, H. J. Sheerin, R. J. Hamilton, A. H. Burton and M. J. Brennan. Haggerty is also president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

New vice presidents elected are Kenneth Edwards of San Francisco, succeeding C. H. White, and James Sweeney of Allentown, Pa., to fill a seat vacated by E. R. Baldwin, who ran unsuccessfully for secretary-treasurer.

Georgine's term of office starts immediately. Born July 18, 1931, he attended the University of Illinois and DePaul University in Chicago, was apprenticed in the lather's trade in 1949, and became a member of Chicago Local 74 in 1953.

Lathers Elect Georgine To Succeed Sal Maso

Vancouver, B.C.—Pres. Sal Maso of the Lathers turned over the gavel of office to new Pres. Robert Georgine at the union's convention here and retired after 34 years of international union service.

Maso declined to run again after serving since 1964 as president and before that as a vice president starting in 1936. For nearly a quarter century before 1964 he had been president of the New Jersey State Building & Construction Trades Council.

Georgine has been on the union's staff for several years as an international representative. He ran for the top post against Dave Richardson, business agent of New York Local 46, and was elected by a vote of 183 to 142.

Georgine has held every major office in his home local. Also he has been financial secretary of the Illinois State Council of Lathers, business manager of the White City District Council, and a member of the board of governors of the National Bureau for Lathing & Plastering.

After serving on the union staff as an international representative, Georgine was named recently by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. as a member of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes—the first member of his trade to serve on the board.

Convention speakers included Sec.-Treas. William Dodge of the Canadian Labor Council, Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers, Sec.-Treas. John J. Hauck of the Plasterers & Cement Masons, Executive Dir. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., of the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, COPE Area Dir. Walter F. Gray and Executive Dir. Leo Schultze of the National Lathing Industries' joint apprenticeship program.

Bars Dilution of Standards:

Schoemann Affirms Recruiting Policies

Lafayette, Ind.—The Plumbers & Pipe Fitters are "committed" to expanding opportunities for minority group workers but firmly opposed to any lowering of apprenticeship standards, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann said here.

Schoemann spoke to 1,100 union training instructors taking part in an intensive, weeklong refresher course at Purdue University—and to the 132 apprenticeship contest finalists from the United States and Canada who competed for trophies and $5,250 in cash prizes in tests of their skills.

The Plumbers president sharply denounced a Labor Dept. draft proposal to establish what he branded a "lottery system" for selecting apprentices for training.

Terming the plan "extreme and unwarranted," Schoemann said it would eliminate present selection procedures "which are based on choosing applicants with the best qualifications."

Under the initial Labor Dept. proposal, Schoemann said, all applicants with minimum qualifications would be pooled together "and admission to the apprenticeship program would depend solely on whether an applicant's name was pulled out of the hat."

Coupled with this, he said, would be a "quota system" based on the minority population of the labor market.

The union's policy, Schoemann stressed, is an "affirmative action program of recruiting minority applicants for apprentice programs and helping them to meet qualifications, without lowering standards.

"We believe that it is the moral and right thing to do," he said. "But it is more than a charitable gesture. The industry needs these men and if they cannot get them through the traditional channels, other methods will be found."

Schoemann said the union hopes to convince the Labor Dept. to amend its proposals, adding: "I welcome a fight on behalf of quality, talent, and the only kind of job security that is meaningful—a security based on professional training, competence and knowledge."

The five-day apprenticeship contest finals were held in three craft divisions, with $1,000 going to first place winners, $500 to second place and $250 to third place.

In the plumbers competition, first prize went to Gene Friendshuh of Minneapolis, second to Joseph E. Camren of Kansas City, Kan. and third place to Dieter J. Holz of the Chicago local.

The steamfitter-pipefitter competition gave first place to Robert W. Harris, Philadelphia; second to Lawrence M. Edwards, Milwaukee, and third to Peter A. Douglas, Houston.

A first in the sprinkler fitter craft went to Daniel Cutler, Milwaukee; second to Harold G. Wenninghoff, Kansas City, Mo., and third to John R. Mawhinney, Vancouver, B.C.

TOP APPRENTICES in five-day competition held by Plumbers & Pipe Fitters at Purdue University pose with the union's officers, their plaques and $1,000 checks for finishing first in their respective craft divisions. From left: Sec.-Treas. William T. Dodd; Pres. Peter T. Schoemann; Assistant Pres. Martin J. Ward; Daniel Cutler of Milwaukee, winner in the sprinkler fitter division; Robert W. # 7 Arbitrators Named To New Impasse Panel

Pres. Nixon has appointed seven members of the Federal Service Impasse Panel set up to resolve disputes between federal agencies and government employe unions.

Jacob Seidenberg was named chairman of the panel. All the members have backgrounds as arbitrators.

The panel is a separate agency in the Federal Labor Relations Council, which was created by Executive Order 11491. The panel is to consider impasses presented by an agency or a government employe union if the parties have previously tried mediation or third party fact-finding.

Under provisions of the executive order, the panel will be able to take "any action necessary to settle the impasse," including the power to impose its own settlement on the parties.

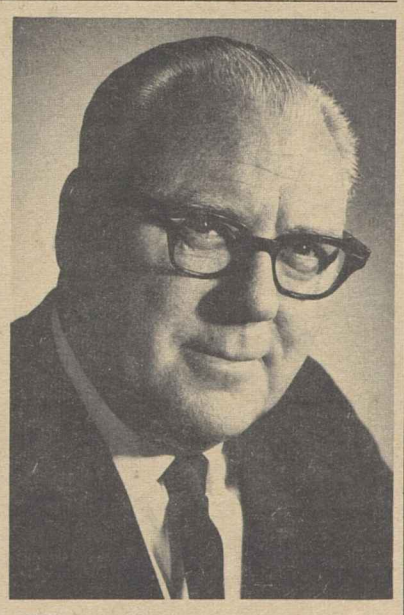
Panel chairman Seidenberg is on the faculties of Howard and American universities and has served as executive director of the President's Committee on Government Contracts. He also was a referee for the National Railroad Adjustment Board.

Other panel members are:

Lloyd H. Bailer, a member of a number of disputes boards appointed by the President and the Secretary of Labor, and a former official of the New York State Board of Mediation.

Richard L. Epstein, a lawyer and arbitrator and a mediator with the New York State Public Employes Relations Board.

John J. McGovern, a mediator and arbitrator with the National Mediation Board and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.



Jean T. McKelvey, with the New York State School of Industrial & Labor Relations, Cornell University, and affiliated with the American Arbitration association and the National Academy of Arbitration.

Arthur Stark, arbitrator and economics lecturer at Columbia University and a former official of the New York State Board of Mediation.

James C. Vadakin of the University of Miami industrial relations studies and a member of the President's Emergency Board reviewing the manning dispute involving locomotive firemen.

David T. Roadley was named director of the Impasse panel last month.

NEW CHAIRMEN of two AFL-CIO standing committees have been named by Federation Pres. George Meany. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. James Suffridge, left, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks, is chairman of the federation's Ethical Practices Committee. Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery, president of the Painters, has been named chairman of the Public Relations Committee. Both committees had been headed by Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians and an AFL-CIO vice president before his recent death.

CWA, IBEW Set Standards In Organizing

The presidents of two AFL-CIO unions with members in the telephone industry announced a "historic agreement" on standards of conduct that will apply to organizing campaigns in which both unions are on the ballot.

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers and Pres. Charles H. Pillard of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers signed an agreement spelling out prohibitions against organizing activities in the broad areas of "giveaway" items and forbidding use of doubtful data in union handouts or statements.

Organizing campaigns and tactics will emphasize the benefits that each union can offer members in the form of services and contracts, the two men said. Picnics and parties will give way to informational meetings.

It will still be possible, however, to hold meetings or rallies where sandwiches and soft drinks may be served, Pillard and Beirne agreed.

They said in a statement that "the agreement is a pledge of organizing faith and integrity between fine unions in the house of labor . . . to resolve a mutual problem in the best interests" of all concerned.

Funds for ILO Stricken By Senate Committee

nist violations of human rights."

The Senate committee's action had strong support from key members of a House Appropriations subcommittee which, on July 31, met with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the top U.S. labor, employer and government delegates and advisers to the ILO. The House had already completed action on the appropriation and the subcommittee, headed by Rep. John J. Rooney (D-N.Y.), recommended that the Senate strike out the ILO funds, beyond the amount that has already been paid out this year.

Meany noted that the ILO had come into being in 1920 on the basis of the belief by the late Samuel Gompers, then president of the American Federation of Labor, "that if the workers and the employers throughout the world, in conjunction with government, would try to improve the quality of life among the people at the lower end of the economic ladder, and if we could step up the development of viable economies in the backward nations of the world, that this would in itself be a contribution toward future world peace."

The ILO's tripartite structure of equal representation for workers, employer and government delegates made it unique among international organizations, Meany noted. But the division, he stressed, is meaningless in the cases of Communist bloc nations where there are neither free unions nor free employers.

The newly-elected director general of the ILO, Meany told the House panel, appears to have discarded the impartiality of an "umpire" to placate the Soviet Union, while taking continued U.S. support for granted.

At the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting the following week, the federation's leaders expressed concern over the transformation of the ILO's annual conferences into forums "for unrestrained political attacks" by the Communists and their allies on the United States and Israel.

And while continuing to pay lip service to trade union rights and civil liberties, the ILO conference last June rejected "rather mild resolutions calling for restoring trade union rights under the dictatorial regimes of Spain and Greece," the council noted.

Meany told the subcommittee that one problem seems to be that as far as the ILO director-general is concerned, "when the Russians say they will cut their contribution, he believes them. If we say we are thinking about it, he does not believe us."

RCA Strikers Ratify Terms Of New Pact

negotiations and all parties agreed that the additional contract improvements will be extended to members of both unions, the IUE said.

The final terms represent an improvement in several major respects over the offer whose rejection by IUE triggered the walkout, the union said. The term of the contract covers a period ending June 1, 1974, but the pact may be reopened eight months earlier.

The settlement calls for wage hikes of 23 cents an hour across the board now, and later raises of an additional 5 cents next June, 15 cents in August 1971, 8 cents in June 1972, 15 cents in October of that year and a final 5 cents more in June 1973.

The wage improvement totals 74 cents but a "skills adjustment" adds additional increases of 3 cents to 26 cents an hour for specified workers in the first contract year.

Negotiators for the IUE-RCA Conference Board won a sick leave provision, to take effect in January 1974, covering hourly-paid workers for the first time, Chairman Daniel Arnold said.

He listed these other new benefits:

- Full company-paid hospitalization insurance. Under the new proposal, the employe receives full hospital expense coverage in a semi-private room for 365 days, 80 percent coverage thereafter.
- New pension benefits ranging from $5.50 per month times years of service to $7.50, and in a few cases more, depending on labor grade.

Veto Politics

IN A DEMOCRACY, the art of politics can seldom be separated from the art of government. It is, after all, the votes of lawmakers and the actions of elected executives that form the basis for the political decisions Americans make at the polls.

So it is not surprising that Pres. Nixon used the most political terms in defending his latest vetoes of congressional appropriations exceeding his sparse domestic budget.

His disapproval of funds for education, housing and other programs, the President declared, meant that he was "saying 'no' to bigger spending and 'no' to higher prices in the interest of all the American people."

Press reports indicate that some of the President's political advisers had urged the vetoes to maintain a presidential image of "consistency" in the fight against inflation.

The Republicans might be able to take over Congress after the November elections, it was suggested, if the responsibility for the inflation that has plagued the Administration could be shifted to Democratic congressional "spenders."

WE THINK the President's decision was ill-advised. The AFL-CIO, in urging Congress to override the vetoes, expressed its dismay at "the President's refusal to accept congressional efforts to re-order the nation's spending priorities and more adequately fund critical domestic needs."

And on strictly partisan political grounds, the wisdom of the vetoes is at least open to question, even though Congress did sustain the President on funds for the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development and certain other agencies.

None of the President's advisers, apparently, thought to test the political argument in advance with the Republican members of Congress who had worked with their Democratic counterparts in shaping education legislation that would go a bit farther than the Administration had proposed.

Far from playing politics, Congress had leaned over backwards to avoid a veto and had produced a compromise education appropriations bill that could be justifiably criticized only on the basis that it wasn't enough. The bipartisan judgment of Congress was reflected in the unanimous Senate vote for the final version of the legislation and the 357-30 vote in the House.

If the Administration thought there was any political hay in the veto, the vote to override surely dispels that argument.

In the House, only a bare majority of Republicans could be mustered to support the decision of a President of their own party. And in the Senate, a majority of Republicans—including every Republican running for re-election this year—voted to override the veto and repudiate the attempt to blame congressional spending for inflation.

THERE ARE, as the AFL-CIO has repeatedly stressed, important steps the President can and should take to curb the causes of inflation.

But vetoing funds for education, housing and health—programs that are desperately needed "in the interest of all the American people"— most certainly is not among them.

A Word Edgewise:

Students Embrace 'Radicalism' As Vehicle for Beating System

By John P. Roche

AS ANOTHER academic year looms up, nervous administrators are busy strengthening campus security forces, moving rare books to fireproof sanctuaries, and privately wondering why they didn't join the Green Berets and get combat pay. Pres. Nixon and probably half a dozen private educational organizations have commissions of inquiry on the prowl, trying to identify the sources of campus violence. And in the background there are ominous rumors of impending bankruptcy: university presidents these days make Wall Street "bears" sound positively cheerful.

This apprehensive mood is completely justified. Events last May marked a qualitative change in the academic atmosphere, but for reasons quite different from those usually advanced. For the first time a significant mass of students supported the demands of a small extremist minority. They did not do so because they were "radicalized"—every poll indicates that on issues they divide roughly the way their parents do—but because they suddenly realized that "radicalism" was a lovely vehicle for beating the academic system.

Let me recall briefly the sequence of events. When Pres. Nixon launched the Cambodian operation, the campus extremists leaped into action. Initially the impact was slight, but then came the shootings at Kent State, and the demand for a nationwide "student strike."

For the benefit of readers who have not had the experience, it might be noted that May is the cruelest month of all—it is the time of reckoning. Term papers are due, reading must be completed, final exams are in the offing. In short, one has to catch up with all the work he hasn't done over the semester, or in some cases the year. To say that students dislike final exams is not to insult them; it is a clinical statement analogous to saying cats dislike water.

As of May 1970, the first thing to keep in mind was that the psychological pressure on campus was at its annual peak. The radical groups on campus moved in to capitalize on this state of jitters and dusted off a scenario they first tried out in 1968. At that time, they advanced the proposition that the murders of Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King, and the general student commitment to "relevance" (the McCarthy campaign), had made it impossible for a serious student to concentrate on mere academic work. They urged that finals be cancelled, or boycotted, and that a Pass/Fail grading system be instituted.

With rare exceptions, college and university faculties refused to agree and, more important, the slogan did not catch on with the mass of students. The radicals were thus left isolated, but their activities over the past two years began to have a cumulative impact. In the effort to counter charges that American campuses (which are probably the freest enclaves in the world) are oppressive and reactionary, faculties undermined the very structure of authority.

By May 1970, it was fair to say that the disciplinary procedures of most American universities were a campus joke.

REMEMBER THAT all of this activity was occurring on the margin of academic life. A tiny handful of militants was vigorously chopping away at every symbol of authority in the academy. The overwhelming majority of roughly seven million college students were inert if not overtly hostile. They were also puzzled: accepting the myth of authority, they kept waiting for the lightning to strike, waiting for the disrupters to be put down, expelled, jailed. Instead, before their amazed eyes, deans and professors rushed to appease the extremists.

Gradually the word spread throughout the student population: "The Emperor has no clothes!" The authority structure—so long taken for granted—was a fiction. The real payoff was for disruptive action—a little help from TV cameras, some noisy, obscene interviews with journalists and one could emerge as a Student Leader, a Spokesman for a Generation.

Not only did the faculty capitulate, but it begged the militants for absolution. University presidents rushed to disassociate themselves from American society—and then wondered why the money wasn't coming in.

'Middle-America Strategy':

Unionists Have Critical Role In Shaping Politics of the '70s

The following is excerpted from an article in the current issue of the American Federationist by Richard M. Scammon, the noted political analyst. The article, titled "The American Voter: a 1970 Profile," is based on remarks by Scammon at the recent conference of the International Labor Press Association in Milwaukee.

WHEN WE LOOK at 1970 or 1972, it seems to me the most meaningful political issue in America is the survival of the old (New Deal) coalition. Ever since 1936 people have been writing about the death of that coalition and yet, in 1968, that coalition was back in full flower, minus the South.

If you look at precinct after precinct and county after county across the country, it is amazing how close the votes in 1968 parallel those of 1940 and 1944. The people who voted for Roosevelt also voted for Humphrey, or their children did. And those who voted, say for Willkie, also voted for Nixon.

Now we say "except in the South," but that is perhaps the key to holding the coalition together. We sometimes talk about the "southern strategy," but there really isn't a "southern strategy" in America. There is a middle-America strategy and it applies just as much to Cleveland as it does to Jackson, Miss., or maybe more so. And it applies to Los Angeles and the suburbs of Los Angeles more than it does to Atlanta.

This is a very important strategy, but it is not a strategy to win just the South. Franklin Roosevelt was elected president four times. He could have been elected every time without a single electoral vote from a single southern state—but he could not be elected without the support of middle America.

In any attempt to break up the New Deal coalition, the target, to a very real extent, is the trade union movement. If I were Pres. Nixon, I would just be doing my best to carve off as much of the trade union movement as I could. And I would do it on social issues which would draw union members away from their habitual membership in the New Deal coalition—a membership which is based on economic issues.

This has already been done in the South. In the South in 1968, Humphrey got 30 percent of the vote, down from 80 percent for Roosevelt in those elections of 1940 and 1944. When you figure that it was mainly a white vote then, I suppose it would be fair to say that Humphrey got only 15 to 20 percent of the vote among white southerners in 1968.

That strategy has already been described in the "Emerging Republican Majority," by Kevin Phillips. But I would take issue with Phillips on two counts. First, I feel he somewhat down-grades the very sound motto in politics: "Expect the unexpected." And having been in London during the recent English elections, I couldn't believe that motto more.

Second, Phillips's book would have validity if you accept that on any given policy decision, the Democrats will make the most damn fool mistake available. If you assume that the Democrats are going to make as many mistakes in 1972 as the Republicans did in 1964, then Phillips's book will be right.

If the Democrats follow positive acts of trying to accent the issues that bring them together rather than the things that tear them apart, the coalition can be held together. Of course it can't be held together for everybody. You are going to get some people who are going to move over to the far right, even some people in the trade union movement. And you are going to get some on the far left that are going to scream that Hubert Humphrey is a fink and we are going to run an independent candidate against him.

THE REAL DYNAMIC in American politics is in the center—it is not on the extremes. The only extreme most Americans want is the extreme center. Now, this doesn't mean it can't be left of center or right of center, but wingers are not really winners. And the farther away from the center you get the more likely you are to be labeled as a loser.

In recent years the Democratic Party and its candidates have been characterized as left of center—at least nationally. They have been liberals but not extremists. Now if the party moves as far away to the left in 1972 as the Republicans moved to the right in 1964, they will get exactly the same treatment from the American voter that the Republicans got in 1964.

This is why it seems to me that the labor movement is such a vital part in determining the character of U.S. politics in 1970, 1972 and throughout the 1970s.

Trade unionists are, in essence, the potential base of a new Republican majority because if they aren't available to the GOP—if middle America doesn't turn right—then the New Deal coalition will survive.

And it will survive despite all the rhetoric on the far left about running independent candidates this year against Humphrey and Adlai Stevenson III. It will survive simply because most American voters don't buy the big-Japanese-sword-in-my-belly approach to politics.

And liberals should make no mistake, either, about what they are dealing with in the Republican approach: If the GOP can salami off a good segment of the labor movement, then the Republicans could well turn 1970 and 1972 into the beginning of a long period of GOP domination of American politics.

Despite Slow Pace of Congress:

Outlook Bright for New Laws To Build Consumer Protection

Although Congress has moved slowly this year on consumer legislation, the outlook remains bright that long-needed laws and federal programs will be adopted in the near future, a top consumer lobbyist for organized labor declared.

Creation of an independent consumer agency and legislation allowing individual consumers to join in law suits for fraudulent or deceptive sales practices are two high-priority items now before Congress, said Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative for the Ladies' Garment Workers. Miss Dubrow, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO subcommittee on consumer legislation, appeared on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview aired Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

She said that despite stiff opposition from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and many businessmen, the class action bills sponsored by Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D-Md.) and Rep. Robert Eckhardt (D-Tex.) stand a good chance of adoption this year.

She noted that both measures have organized labor's backing, and it's hard "to figure out why an honest businessman would worry" about giving consumers "a chance to get their money back, if they are fraudulently treated."

She also praised the Rosenthal-Dwyer Bill, which would create an independent agency to "set policy and pursue problems with regulatory agencies—to police regulatory agencies." She pointed out that the Office of Consumers in the White House would continue to function, but would be directed more toward the "educational level, rather than the regulatory or policing level."

MISS DUBROW said "the climate in Congress for consumer affairs" is generally good, but added that "it's euphemistic to talk about consumer affairs."

"You won't find a single member of the House or Senate who isn't for 'doing the right thing for the consumers,' " but the real question is, what is the 'right thing,' " she said. She predicted that such issues will figure heavily in the fall elections.

Consumers and consumer organizations are "now on the march," she declared, and their problems can no longer be "swept under the rug."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES in passing the "equal rights" bill by an overwhelming vote has taken the first step in a constitutional action of the utmost importance to the more than 27 million women over 20 now in the American labor force.

The measure calls for an amendment to the Constitution establishing equality for all Americans regardless of sex, but its major impact is on the equality of women with men under the law. It is a measure fought for by many women's groups who have long contended that they have been the victims of discrimination from jobs to property rights.

The proposed amendment still has a long way to go. It must be approved by the Senate and then must be ratified by three-fourths of the states, a procedure that may take several years.

Nevertheless, the House action has clearly opened the question of what will happen to the vast number of state and local laws designed to protect women in industry against hazards to their health. These run from setting the number of hours they may work to whether they must be provided with chairs or stools on which to sit while on the job.

The history of protective legislation for women goes back a long way. Indeed, the first law regulating the hours of employment of women became effective in Massachusetts in 1879. Today 46 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico have established standards concerned with maximum hours, rest periods and night work. Weekly hours permitted run all the way from 40 hours in South Carolina to 60 hours in Georgia, Maryland, Kentucky and Mississippi.

In 18 states and Puerto Rico night work for adult women is prohibited or regulated in certain occupations. The prohibition varies and has brought criticism that while women are barred from well-paying night jobs they are not barred from office cleaning jobs that don't pay as well.

Many states have laws barring industrial homework, largely carried on by women. A few states prohibit the employment of women in some industries immediately before or after childbirth. Half the states prohibit the employment of women in specified occupations or under certain working conditions which are considered hazardous or injurious to health and safety.

Forty-five states have seating laws which apply exclusively to women. Particularly well-known because of the amount of debate about them are laws limiting the amount of weight women workers may lift or carry. The amount varies from 15 pounds in Utah to 50 pounds in California.

SHOULD ALL THESE laws specifically applicable to women go by the board?

Today's feminist movement says yes. Even weight-lifting limitations are rejected. Complete equality of women with men in every area is called for.

Most of the labor movement, which played a powerful role in the adoption of many of these laws, is opposed. Labor representatives have told Congress that discrimination against women must be stamped out but that the real question is what constitutes "discrimination."

Furthermore, rank-and-file women workers have been given virtually no opportunity to express their views on the elimination of protective laws applying especially to them. Most of these laws obviously apply to some of the rougher, physically taxing jobs in industry, and women who do that type of work were not represented on the Nixon-appointed Council on the Status of Women which supports the proposed amendment.

Thus, the questions remain: would enactment of the so-called women's "rights" amendment represent a "breakthrough" for women, as some have suggested? Or would it be a license to return to the old days of exploitation of women?

CONSUMER PROBLEMS can't be "swept under the rug," Evelyn Dubrow stressed in an interview on Labor News Conference. Miss Dubrow, who is legislative representative of the Ladies Garment Workers and chairman of the AFL-CIO consumer legislation subcommittee, was questioned by Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine, left, and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press. The AFL-CIO produced program is carried Tuesdays on the Mutual radio network.

Pottery Workers Press Campaign Against Exportation of U.S. Jobs

New Orleans—The 76th convention of the Pottery Workers called for new momentum in continuing campaigns for federal legislation to protect the jobs, health and safety of its members.

The union, one of the hardest hit by imports from low-wage areas, declared that "the time is past due" for curbs on the steady erosion of jobs "in almost every branch of our trade."

And, speaking for workers in an industry where silicosis and other job-related illnesses were until recently leading causes of death, the delegates called for prompt enactment of occupational health and safety legislation.

Despite closing of additional pottery plants, the union reported a third consecutive year of membership gains—a 14.4 percent rise to 19,430, the highest figure in 10 years. And Pres. Lester H. Null, Sr., told the convention that further gains are expected from organizing campaigns now in progress.

Sec.-Treas. George R. Barbaree reported the union's finances in good shape and delegates approved an increase in the international union's strike benefits from $35 to $50 a week.

The convention approved the recommendation of the union's executive board to hold constitutional conventions every four years, instead of annually, with educational conventions in the intervening years.

Thus the 1971 convention, to be held in Las Vegas, will be an educational session with only simple resolutions to be considered, while the next convention at which constitutional changes can be made will be held in 1974.

In other internal actions, the convention:

- Voted to change the union's publication, the Potters Herald, from a weekly to a monthly.
- Approved officially the change of the name of the union from the International Brotherhood of Operative Potters to the International Brotherhood of Pottery & Allied Workers.

James C. Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, told the delegates that workers in nearly every major industry are feeling the brunt of the low-wage import competition that the potters have long had and "are turning to their unions for relief."

Gildea stressed the labor movement's continuing support for "a national policy of healthy expansion of international trade on a reciprocal basis" but its opposition to a "one-way street."

America's principal exports, he suggested, could be listed today as "money, technology and the jobs of American workers."

The development of a trade policy to meet current conditions "is a problem of the entire trade union movement and of all the people of the United States," Gildea declared.

Other convention speakers included Pres. Victor Bussie of the Louisiana State AFL-CIO; Howard Chester, executive secretary of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee; Bert Gottlieb of the Transportation Institute, and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. E. H. Williams.

Delegates approved a 15 percent increase in salaries for eight vice presidents, subject to ratification in a referendum vote.

Union officers are elected by referendum and are currently serving the second year of four-year terms.

Special Delivery Union Ready for Negotiations

Minneapolis—The Special Delivery Messengers may be one of the smaller postal unions, but delegates to the 19th convention here made it clear that they're not taking a back seat to anyone when it comes to militant trade union spirit.

By more than the required two-thirds vote, the convention voted to raise the per capita tax from $1.75 to $2.75 to finance anticipated collective bargaining and arbitration expenses under the new United States Postal Service established by Congress.

A convention committee had recommended a compromise 50-cent increase, but the delegates overturned the recommendation on the floor and voted the full dollar that had been recommended by the officers.

In other one-sided votes, the union eliminated a no-strike provision from its own constitution and mandated the national officers to seek legislation repealing the legal ban on strikes by postal employes.

Michael J. Cullen of Brooklyn was re-elected without opposition as president and Sec.-Treas. John K. Dunning of Norfolk, Va., was re-elected over two opponents.

In other ballots, Marshall Greene of Charlotte, N.C., was elected executive vice president. Joseph Gaydos, who had held that post but did not run for re-election, was elected as one of five vice presidents. The others were Robert J. Eimar of St. Louis, Frank H. Thompson of Los Angeles and Edward C. Tatton of Dallas, incumbents who were re-elected, and Ghanious Smiley, Jr., of Cleveland, elected to fill a vacant post.

Delegates adopted a resolution continuing the authority of the executive board to negotiate a merger or federation with other postal unions, subject to approval of any action by the membership.

Dealing with one of the controversial issues of the postal service, the convention voted down a resoluation which urged area wage differentials.

One of the four days of the convention was devoted to a seminar on collective bargaining and grievances, led by Stuart Brock of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and John A. McCart, director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council.

Cullen, in a report to the convention, said the postal unions holding exclusive bargaining rights have taken part in a series of meetings at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center in Washington to prepare for forthcoming negotiations and develop bargaining proposals.

NLRB to Hear Regular Oral Presentations

The National Labor Relations Board will regularize the practice of hearing oral arguments in selected cases starting Oct. 5, new Chairman Edward B. Miller reported.

Miller told the labor law section of the American Bar Association, meeting in St. Louis, that board members voted unanimously to change the present practice of hearing oral arguments only on limited occasions.

On the first Monday of each month, the board will meet to hear arguments on from one to a maximum of three cases. The selection of cases to be heard will be carefully considered, based on the general importance and interest in the issues, the novelty of the issues and other factors.

Oral presentations will normally be held to 30 minutes, including rebuttal time. Miller said the new calendar is an experiment, to be reviewed and evaluated after a few months. The board said the experiment will not create a procedural right to oral argument.

Letter Carriers Hail New Bargaining Era

Honolulu—Three thousand delegates to the Letter Carriers convention here greeted the new era of full collective bargaining in the postal service with applause, serious floor discussion—and a gala parade to the tempo set by 11 letter carrier bands.

No longer will there be "non-negotiable items" when union bargainers meet with postal management, NALC Pres. James Rademacher assured delegates to the union's 47th biennial convention.

Rademacher described the new postal service established by Congress after union-management negotiations as far different from the original concept of a postal corporation.

"It has checks and balances which will prevent management despotism," he said, "and it contains labor-management provisions favorable to labor, including the absolute right to arbitration."

The legislation "is not perfect," Rademacher said, but it was the means of achieving a 14 percent pay increase and of "putting bread and butter in the mouths of letter carriers and their families."

Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., who helped mediate the settlement which led to broad new collective bargaining rights after the spontaneous postal strike of last spring, said letters received at the Labor Dept. during the mail crisis reflected overwhelming public support for the goals of postal workers.

He brought to the convention a letter from Pres. Nixon expressing satisfaction with the new legislation and noting that it "provides for open and free collective bargaining" and a "greater equity for the hard-working men and women who keep our mails moving."

These improvements, the President said, "comprise the tangible and most appropriate rewards for your efforts."

Usery said the collective bargaining features of the new law represent "a new ball game" for postal workers, "a game of give and take, a game of understanding."

It means, he said, that postal unions can now bargain directly for wages and working conditions without going to Congress for piecemeal legislation.

Among the speakers during the opening days of the convention were Sen. Hiram L. Fong (R-Hawaii), ranking minority member of the Senate Post Office Committee, and two House committee members, Rep. Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.) and Rep. Frank J. Brasco (D-N.Y.). They all pledged support for total amnesty for postal workers involved in the work stoppages last spring.

A sprinkling of women delegates reflected the changes in the make-up of the letter carriers workforce and the convention authorized appointment of a woman letter carrier to serve as a consultant on uniforms.

Union Scholar Appointed to Mediation Post

William J. Kilberg, former electrician's helper who attended college on a union scholarship, has been appointed general counsel of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Kilberg is a White House Fellow who has been serving as special assistant to the Secretary of Labor. Born in Brooklyn, N.Y., he worked five summers as an electrician's helper and attended Cornell University on a scholarship awarded by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

He was accepted for graduate study at Oxford University, England, but preferred to study law at Harvard and was graduated in the top quarter of his class. Before coming to Washington he was employed as a summer associate in Pres. Nixon's former law firm in New York City.

POSTHUMOUS TROPHY for heroic seamanship is presented by Pres. Nixon to Mrs. Richard D. Hughes of Gettysburg, Pa., widow of a National Maritime Union member who lost his life while trying to save the S.S. Badger State from sinking in the Pacific last December. From the left, NMU Pres. Joseph Curran; the President with Mrs. Hughes and daughter Jennifer, 3; and Maritime Administrator A. E. Gibson. Hughes, a boatswain, kept the ship afloat for two days when bombs for Viet Nam broke loose in the hold, but was swept off a raft and drowned after the bombs exploded and the ship was abandoned. Hughes had been an NMU port officer in San Francisco before returning to sea.

Administration 'Gimmicks' Hit:

Teachers' President Scores 'Dangerous' School Policies

Pittsburgh—"American education is now facing the most serious and most concerted attack in its history," Teachers Pres. David Selden told 1,000 delegates at the opening session of the AFT's 54th convention here.

Asserting that "we cannot have good schools without spending good money," Selden hit out at Pres. Nixon's veto of school aid legislation and the Administration's opposition to spending more money on education. Selden charged that the Administration is putting forth "a barrage of panacea proposals" like school vouchers, and performance contracting, which he singled out as "the most dangerous new gimmick in education."

Under the performance-contract concept, school boards turn over operation of a school or curriculum program to a private business which, for a fee, "guarantees" a measure of pupil achievement. The OEO is funding performance-contracting experiments in 21 school districts this fall, and companies like Westinghouse and Borg-Warner have set up educational divisions to enter this new field.

"These new education 'miracle men,'" Selden said, "have gone back to methods which long ago were discarded by reputable educators." Yet, he warned, increasing numbers of school districts are seeking them out.

"How naive and foolish can we get?" he asked. "If the educational entrepreneurs have discovered some new method for educating children with less effort and expense than the public schools are now able to do the job, they have an obligation to share their special knowledge with us. If they have discovered a new educational wonder drug, they have an obligation to let everybody enjoy its benefits. There is no place in education for private monopoly of workable ideas."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a message to the convention, congratulated the Teachers for meeting the challenge to labor "on many fronts" and achieving gains "for your members, for the school systems and students, for your communities and for the labor movement and the nation."

Meany said organized labor now faces a new task—"to put America back to work and reverse the damage that has been done by distorted and one-sided economic and political policies."

In this drive for "social justice and economic justice," he said, "the battlefield is the polling place." He urged the Teachers to see that all members of the union, their families and friends, know the candidates and the issues, are registered to vote, and go to the polls.

The convention is the largest in the AFT's history. Union membership, Selden reported, grew by nearly 1,000 teachers during each week of the 1969-70 school year to over 205,000—a 20 percent rise over the year. While the AFT enrolled less than 4 percent of the teacher workforce 10 years ago, Selden noted, the percentage has risen to 12 percent now.

He cited particular successes over the past year in organizing school paraprofessionals and in what he termed the "rebirth of AFT organizing in the South." Selden said that AFT's racially-integrated locals in Savannah and Atlanta, Georgia, Tennessee, and Louisiana are making major progress and he predicted that the union's New Orleans local would be the bargaining agent for teachers there within two years.

Selden also reported on the union's drive for collective-bargaining legislation for teachers and other public employes, citing new statutes in Hawaii and Pennsylvania that give teachers bargaining rights, and the right to strike under certain circumstances.

He was joined in the call for public-worker rights by Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees who gave the convention's keynote address. Wurf called for a national coalition of public-employe unions to "come together and exchange ideas and deal with the problems of a decent federal law guaranteeing public-worker rights."

Wurf also called for massive federal spending to revitalize urban life. He charged that "the overwhelming concern of the Administration with the war in Asia is depriving kids of schools, teachers, and food. The country is not facing up to its responsibilities in a sensible, rational way."

Postal Clerks Demand Repeal of Strike Ban

Los Angeles—A call for repeal of the federal ban on strikes by government employes and amnesty for all workers involved in the mail strike last March was issued by delegates to the 36th annual convention of the Postal Clerks here.

The convention, attended by a record number of delegates, also voted to increase the per capita dues payments from $1.35 to $1.70 a month and continue the 5-cent rebate to state associations. Earlier the delegates turned down a proposal to raise the per capita tax to $2. The convention also rejected a proposed pay increase for officers.

All officers were re-elected except two regional vice presidents and the director of research and education. In the Memphis, Tenn., district, James W. Walter defeated J. B. Ferguson, the incumbent. Tom MacDonald defeated Sidney Lindenberg in the Philadelphia district. Walter Kenny was elected vice president in the Washington, D.C., district where there was no incumbent. Ted Valliere defeated William E. Price for the post of director of research and education.

Earlier the convention approved a constitutional change providing for a membership referendum vote on the election of officers, starting in 1972. The action removes one barrier to merger with the unaffiliated National Postal Union.

Rep. Dominic K. Daniels (D-N.J.), the only legislator to address the convention, told cheering delegates that under the new postal service law, Congress will remain in charge of the welfare of the employes, especially in the area of fringe benefits.

UFPC Pres. Francis Filbey announced that a national constitutional convention will be convened soon.

The UFPC delegates approved a legislative program for the next two years which set repeal of the federal ban on strikes by government workers as the prime objective.

The resolution calls for an end to the no-strike law and "any other such laws which prevent or in any way compromise the rights of all postal workers."

Other legislative goals were set as optional 25-year retirement for workers; a basic 32-hour workweek, Monday through Friday; permissible negotiation of a union shop, and amendment of the Hatch Act, which limits political activity by government workers.

The conference had been requested by Legislative Director Patrick J. Nilan and approved by the convention to bring the union's procedures into line with requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act now applicable to government unions.

Labor Cites Urgency Of Wage Floor Boost

Labor Standards Act" and called "especially" for coverage of logging crews of eight and fewer employes who are now exempt.

Clayman told the House panel that after 1966 amendments which reduced logging exemption from crews of 12 or less to eight or less, many employers merely switched to using smaller crews so as to evade the law.

Potofsky told the subcommittee that low-wage industries particularly need the Fair Labor Standards Act to help equalize competition by establishing "a more equitable and realistic wage floor."

Both witnesses urged that the law be amended to require double pay for overtime work, instead of the present time-and-one-half.

It would help reduce unemployment, they noted, by making overtime work sufficiently costly so that employers would add new workers to their payrolls.

Clayman said many of the "working poor" must receive welfare payments to make ends meet.

"We do not believe that any employed person should be forced to go on the welfare rolls in order to survive economically," he said.

Union Money, Manpower Aid Storm Victims

AFL-CIO has been offered to Corpus Christi unions and a fund-raising drive among unions across the state is beginning to accelerate, Brown said.

Co-directors of Project Rebuild are Miss Rosa Walker, state Women's Activities Dept. director, and Jackie St. Clair, Southern regional director for the state building trades council.

Brown is one of 20 Texans named by former Gov. John B. Connally to serve on the Celia Relief fund-raising drive throughout Texas for the Red Cross.

Meany had earlier reported in a letter to all AFL-CIO unions and central bodies that more than 65,000 Texas families suffered loss of one kind or another when the hurricane howled in off the Gulf of Mexico Aug. 3.

Millions of dollars will be needed, Meany wrote, to "meet the immense human needs caused by the destructive force" of the immense windstorm.

Practically every structure in and around Corpus Christi, an area of 200,000 population, was damaged in some way, staff Rep. Edward Carlin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services reported from the disaster area. The Red Cross estimated that more than 100,000 area residents received emergency care in the first phase of the relief effort that included food and shelter. The next step is rehabilitation and rebuilding, it said.

The Red Cross has asked for a special Celia relief fund of $6 million to suplement its regular relief funds. It budgets $10 million a year for disaster relief but has had to spend nearly twice that amount because of fires, floods and hurricanes, it reported.

South Dakota Unions Press Fight on RTW

Aberdeen, S.D.—The South Dakota AFL-CIO called for an all-out effort to repeal the state's "right-to-work" law which has been in effect since 1947.

Delegates to the federation's "50th year" convention laid the groundwork for the campaign to get the state legislature to put the anti-labor law on a constitutional amendment. This would hopefully lead to repeal of the law in a referendum vote.

Pres. Clifford W. Shrader also stressed that a continued effort will be made in the coming campaign to work for the election of legislators who are responsive to labor's goals.

The state federation's convention was shifted to Aberdeen from Rapid City in support of striking members of the Fire Fighters who had walked off their jobs when Rapid City officials refused to negotiate on wages and working conditions. The city has been hiring strikebreakers to replace the 30 members of the Fire Fighters.

Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) told the 110 delegates that the state should try to keep pace with the rest of the country on labor matters.

"South Dakota is a great state," he declared, "but we have not yet fully realized our potential—nor have we been able to take full advantage of developmental opportunities."

The growth of America and its position in the world would not have been possible without an active and strong labor movement, he added.

McGovern also noted that organized labor has taken the lead in the cause of disadvantaged Americans.

Economist Arnold Cantor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research stressed that meaningful tax reform—on the federal, state and local level—is still high on the list of labor's priorities.

He noted that many wealthy persons still escape paying their fair share of taxes because "no nation has yet developed a practical way of determining wealth and administering a tax based on wealth."

At the state and local level, he said, there should be greater use of income taxes "to ease the unfair impact of sales and property taxes on those of middle, moderate and low incomes."

The convention re-elected Shrader to his sixth term as president of the state body. Sec.-Treas. Francis K. McDonald also was re-elected to a two-year term.

Railway Clerks Set Strike Date In Pay Dispute

Chicago—The Railway & Airline Clerks set Sept. 10 as a strike date for 200,000 employes of more than 100 major United States railroads in a contract dispute.

Several months of negotiations have failed to produce an acceptable offer and the National Mediation Board has "exhausted every reasonable effort" to get a peaceful settlement, BRAC officers said.

The union's executive council affirmed these policy positions:

"We will not accept any substandard settlement on wages. We consider the present rail settlements as below the standards we must have for our members. We will reject any presidential emergency board recommendations which do not treat us on a par with all other transportation industry workers. We will . . . support a strike on one or more or all properties" as soon as that is legally possible.

appropriations bill stick. The House majority for overriding on an Aug. 13 vote was less than the required two-thirds.

Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), floor manager of the education appropriations bill, spelled out for the Senate the areas of disagreement between Congress and the White House on the bill.

Congress had voted a "minimum amount" of additional money, Magnuson said, "to help provide a better education for educationally deprived children in the elementary and secondary schools—for additional teaching equipment . . . badly-needed guidance counseling and testing . . . for assistance in overcoming language barriers."

More money, also a "bare minimum," was allocated "for educating the handicapped children and providing job opportunities for students and adults under vocational and adult education."

Library Aid

A small increase was added to the student loan program, he noted, and an additional $25.5 million was provided for libraries because in 16 states more than half the elementary schools "have no library facility at all."

Magnuson suggested that "the President's 'right-to-read' program would truly be empty rhetoric without these library resources."

The ranking Republican on the appropriations panel that had handled the money bill, Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.), termed himself "a Nixon Republican" but said the bill was already a compromise, and had come out of a House-Senate conference committee with some $375 million less than the Senate had originally voted.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) said the "inflation" charge is baseless since the Senate had already cut from the President's military budget three times the amount added for education programs in the vetoed bill.

With the House in recess until Sept. 9, the legislative pipeline slowed down as the Senate continued its debate on the antiballistic missile system.

Bills Signed

Nixon signed two important bills that had passed Congress earlier.

In approving an extension of the Defense Production Act, Nixon protested a section empowering him to impose controls on prices, wages, rents and salaries if he considers it necessary to curb inflation.

The President said he has no intention of using these powers and if Congress believes controls are necessary "it should face up to its responsibilities and make such controls mandatory."

Another bill which became law establishes a Youth Conservation Corps as a three-year, small-scale pilot program.

It envisions hiring youngsters between the ages of 15 and 19 to work for up to 90 days in national parks and forests, wildlife refuges and other public land and water areas. The program would be administered by the Agriculture and Interior Depts.

Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.), who helped steer the bill through the House, said it would provide "meaningful and worthwhile" summer employment for young people while protecting national resources.

Suffrage Anniversary Spurs Registration Call

Women's place is in the voting booth, "where democracy's most important decisions are made," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a letter marking the 50th anniversary of ratification of the women's suffrage amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Addressing two big groups of trade union women—in COPE's Women's Activities Dept. and in the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries—Meany said their participation in politics as voters, campaign workers, candidates and office-holders "enriched the democratic process."

The 19th Amendment giving women the right to vote was ratified by Tennessee on Aug. 20, 1920, thus completing the constitutional amendment process.

The "best way" for the labor movement to mark the 50th anniversary of the amendment, Meany stressed "is to redouble our efforts to involve women in the political process at all levels, and to register and vote in record numbers."

Both WAD and the Auxiliaries "have won their spurs in countless campaigns in behalf of labor's endorsed candidates," Meany noted.

But, he urged, "we can do better—all of us."

There are still too many women "and too many men, as well," who are not registered voters and who do not go to the polls on Election Day.

The right to vote for women, supported by the labor movement, was won after "a long and bitter battle again formidable opposition," Meany noted.

Women's Place

Labor, he said, believes firmly "that whether an individual woman's place is in the home or on the job, as circumstances may dictate, the place for all women—and all men—on Election Day is in the voting booth."

He urged the two groups of trade union women "to do all in your power to reach this goal."

John Yancey Dies, Retired Organizer

Chicago—John Yancey, retired AFL-CIO organizer who finished 32 years of active union service in June, died at 69. He was buried Aug. 21 after services in St. Joachim's Catholic Church.

Yancey had been on retirement since 1966 but continued to serve labor groups as a consultant. His past record includes service as executive vice president of the Transport Service Employes from 1937 until 1950, when CIO Pres. Philip Murray named him assistant national chairman of the Government & Civic Employes Organizing Committee.

Yancey held that post until the AFL-CIO merger, when he became a staff representative. Also he served for many years as commissioner of the Chicago Housing Authority and in other community positions.

Time to Prune

McGee Wins Easily In Wyoming Primary

Wyoming Democrats nominated Gale W. McGee for a third term in the Senate by a big margin and Republicans chose the man he defeated six years ago for a rematch in the November election.

McGee, a liberal in a conservative state, is the only major Democratic officeholder in Wyoming. He will face a self-styled "Nixon Republican," Rep. John S. Wold, who was elected to the state's only congressional seat two years ago. In 1964, McGee won 54 percent of the vote to defeat Wold.

A "peace candidate" in the Democratic primary, State Sen. D. P. Svilar, polled fewer votes than anticipated and McGee coasted to victory by a 4-1 margin. His opponent had attacked McGee's support of U.S. policies in Southeast Asia.

The battle for the congressional seat which Wold will give up will be between former Democratic Rep. Teno Roncalio and Republican Harry Roberts, the state superintendent of public instruction. Both were easy primary victors.

Connecticut voters will face a wide-open Senate battle in November with three major candidates expected to be on the ballot.

In a close Democratic primary, Rev. Joseph D. Duffey outpolled Alphonsus Donahue, who had been endorsed by the state Democratic convention in June, and State Senate Majority Leader Edward L. Marcus.

Duffey, a Congregationalist minister, is national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action and ran on a strong anti-war platform.

Connecticut Republicans nominated 39-year-old Rep. Lowell P. Weicker, Jr., for the Senate post over a more conservative opponent.

The third candidate expected to be in the race is the incumbent Democratic senator, Thomas J. Dodd.

Dodd, who was censured by the Senate three years ago for alleged misuse of campaign funds, withdrew from the Democratic primary contest but has announced that he will run as an independent candidate in November.

The Democratic primary also produced candidates for two marginal congressional districts where Democratic incumbents were not seeking re-election.

In the 1st District, where incumbent Emilio Q. Daddario is running for governor, State Insurance Commissioner William R. Cotter won the Democratic primary. He will face the woman mayor of Hartford, Republican Ann Uccello.

The 2nd District vacancy caused by the death of Rep. William L. St. Onge this spring will be contested by Democratic State Sen. John F. Pickett and Republican Robert H. Steele.

A Louisiana primary found Democratic incumbents easily turning back primary opposition to win renomination. The Democratic assistant majority leader, Rep. Hale Boggs of New Orleans, had no primary opposition but will be the only Louisiana congressman to face a strong Republican challenge in November. Boggs, the most liberal of the state's congressional delegation, won in 1968 with 51.2 percent of the vote.

Indianapolis Leader Max Brydenthal Dies

Indianapolis—Max Brydenthal, president of the Marion County Central Labor Council, died here at 59 after a heart attack and was buried near his boyhood home in Anderson, Ind. He was a member of Auto Workers Local 23 when he assumed the presidency in 1966 and later joined Hotel & Restaurant Local 58.

Board members named 1st Vice Pres. Bernard Hanley to succeed him. A successor to Hanley, who is a member of Fire Fighters Local 416, will be chosen within 60 days.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, in a message of sympathy, praised Brydenthal for serving his fellow workers "with dedication and distinction."

First Suit Filed On Wage Bias Against Men

The Equal Pay law protects men as well as women against pay discrimination, the Labor Dept. noted in filing its first suit to compel employers to raise the pay of male workers to the level of female employes doing the same work.

It asked a federal district court in Illinois to require operators of two McDonalds Drive-In restaurant franchises to comply with the law prohibiting discrimination based on sex. Boys employed by the two establishments as order-takers were paid as much as 55 cents an hour less than women doing the same work, the government charged.

The suit also accuses the employers of paying some of their workers less than the federal minimum wage and working youngsters under 16 longer than permitted by the child labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

In cases of sex discrimination, an employer is not permitted to reduce the pay of higher-paid workers to comply with the law; he must raise the pay of the lower-paid group.

"Many employers and employes think the law applies only to women," Federal Wage-Hour Administrator Robert D. Moran noted. "This isn't so," he stressed. "Women benefit more from the law than men because they are more often discriminated against in pay."

This is the first of 150 suits brought under the equal pay law to be filed on behalf of male workers, the Labor Dept. said, but several such cases have been settled out of court by voluntary compliance.

Senate Votes to Set Up Program on Alcoholism

The nation's largest employer—the federal government—would be directed to treat alcoholism as a disease and to give alcoholics the same job consideration as other sick employes under legislation approved by the Senate.

The bill, which now awaits House action, would establish a national institute on alcoholism and authorize grants to public and private agencies for programs to curb alcohol abuse. Its chief sponsor is Sen. Harold E. Hughes (D-Iowa), who himself overcame alcoholism to forge a distinguished public service career.

An important section of the bill bars the dismissal of federal employes with drinking problems who are willing to accept treatment.

The Civil Service Commission and federal agencies would be required to establish programs and services to deal with alcoholism, and government workers undergoing treatment would have the same sick leave and job protection as employes being treated for other illnesses.

For employes in sensitive jobs, the government would be required to make a "good faith attempt" to find appropriate nonsensitive work during treatment. Except for certain "extremely sensitive" positions spelled out in regulations, a past history of alcohol abuse would not be a bar to federal employment.

Still another section of the legislation would require that all of the group health insurance policies available to government employes be renegotiated so as to "cover alcoholism in the same way as other health problems, illnesses, and diseases that are not self-inflicted."

IUD Scores Attempt to Sap NLRB

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. said the National Labor Relations Board should be strengthened, not dismantled, and called for rejection of legislation that would destroy the agency and turn most of its functions over to clogged federal courts.

A statement by Elliot Bredhoff, the IUD's general counsel, to a Senate Judiciary subcommittee reiterated the labor movement's strong opposition to a bill sponsored by Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) that would limit the NLRB's function to determining bargaining units.

IUD affiliates were sent a copy of Bredhoff's statement with an accompanying letter from the department's organizational director, Nicholas Zonarich, which blasted the Tower bill.

Zonarich termed it "part of the persistent efforts of anti-union forces to destroy the NLRB and return labor relations to the dark days when federal courts were heavily involved in suppressing unions."

Under its provisions, he warned, "delays would be increased and remedies against employer violations would be weakened."

Bredhoff's testimony also sharply criticized a bill introduced by Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) which would replace the NLRB with a 15-member "labor court" whose members would be appointed for life, with investigations and prosecutions handled by an administrator serving at the pleasure of the President.

He associated the IUD with the detailed criticism of the two bills made last month by Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel, in testimony before the subcommittee.

Bredhoff said the present delay in processing of unfair labor practice cases by the NLRB could be reduced without scrapping the entire system. He said Congress could amend the law to allow the labor board to make the findings of an NLRB examiner final without a full-fledged review of every decision that is appealed and by making the board's decisions self-enforcing.

And the NLRB itself, he suggested, could use authority it already has to cut down on delays and to seek court injunctions ordering immediate reinstatement of workers fired for union activities.

But, he stressed, the Tower bill would make things worse. The time lag in bringing federal district court cases to trial is often greater than the time it takes to complete NLRB action, "with the district courts in states with the heaviest unfair labor practice

Price Rises Erase Gains In Earnings

Higher living costs continued to chip away at the buying power of the dollar during July and for the 16th consecutive month the average worker could buy less with his paycheck—despite wage increases—than he could a year ago or even five years ago.

Over the month, the government's consumer price index climbed another four-tenths of 1 percent to a new high of 135.7 percent. Over the year, the 12-month increase totaled 5.9 percent.

Translated into buying power, the consumer price index meant that America's families were paying $13.57 for the same goods and services that cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Despite the higher prices, government economists expressed satisfaction that the rate of inflation during the past three months has been below the peak levels of last winter and early spring.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, making allowances for expected fluctuations in prices of fresh produce, apparel and transportation, the July increase was three-tenths of 1 percent, the same as the adjusted seasonal increase in June. This, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said, was the smallest two-month increase since the spring of 1968.

Administration economists were even more elated at a dip in the wholesale price index for the first time in two years. A sharp drop in farm prices set the pace, balancing

In California's 'Salad Bowl':

Farm Union Battles Injunctions, Assaults

Salinas, Calif.—Farm workers picketing 50 growers in central California's "salad bowl" for union contracts were met with court injunctions, a suit for damages and an outburst of violence that hospitalized the union's attorney.

Jerry Cohen, general counsel for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, is in a San Jose hospital with a brain concussion suffered during a beating ordered by a rancher.

Dr. Jerome Lackner of San Jose described Cohen's condition as serious. The concussion, he said, was caused "both by the force of a beating he received and by the fact that he was not able to ride with the blows because he was pinned fast" by one of his assailants.

Meanwhile, the UFWOC halted all negotiations with growers in the Salinas and Santa Maria valleys following the breakdown of talks with one major firm, Inter Harvest, a subsidiary of the United Fruit Co.

Picketing of ranches where 7,000 union members work started Aug. 24, when the Farm Workers resumed a strike against Salinas area growers of iceberg lettuce, tomatoes, celery, carrots, broccoli, cauliflower and strawberries.

UFWOC had called off the strike after signing an agreement with the Teamsters, which had signed contracts with the Salinas growers. The two unions agreed to respect each other's jurisdiction—the Farm Workers in the fields and the Teamsters on trucks and in canneries they have organized.

Some growers refused to renounce the contracts with the truckers' union, and at that point, UFWOC resumed its picketing and organizing efforts.

A majority of workers on Inter Harvest properties around Salinas authorized the farm workers to negotiate for them but the employer refused to reach agreement.

Shoe Workers Win Fight for Trade Law Aid

The United Shoe Workers won a long battle for federal adjustment benefits for workers in five Massachusetts plants which closed down or drastically curtailed operations because of rising imports.

About 1,000 workers who lost their jobs at the shoe plants have been certified by the Labor Dept. as eligible for a year or more of adjustment payments equal to 65 percent of their wages up to a maximum of about $85 a week.

The union's petition for adjustment benefits resulted in a 3-3 split in the U.S. Tariff Commission over whether the job losses could be traced to tariff concessions made under the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

Pres. Nixon then set a precedent by ruling in favor of the adjustment relief. He acted after the Justice Dept. advised him that he has the power to accept the opinion of either side when the Tariff Commission is evenly divided. The White House action cleared the way for the Labor Dept. to certify the workers for benefits and determine the effective date.

Four of the five Massachusetts plants have gone out of business—Lemar Shoes, Inc., and Hartman Shoe Mfg. Co., both of Haverhill; Eagle Shoe Co., Everett, and Dartmouth Shoe Co., Brockton. The fifth, Benson Shoe Co. at Lynn, is still in business but on a reduced scale. Four of the five plants had manufactured women's dress shoes and were hurt by imports from Italy and Spain.

Retroactivity dates ranged from

President Leads Nation In Labor Day Tribute

Pres. Nixon led the nation in a salute to America's working men and women on the 76th observance of Labor Day.

"Let us remember," the President said, "that our high standard of living, our advancing technological accomplishments, and our managerial capacity all must continue to be supported by a highly talented labor force if this nation is to retain its proud position of international leadership and further improve the quality of life for all of its people."

Nixon noted that the "turbulence and uncertainties of our time" and the problems of living costs and environment "often fall with particular impact on the working man and his family."

But, he stressed, "it is an important fact of American life that they continue to show their faith in their country. They are grateful for what America has provided them in the past; they are loyal to what America stands for in the present; they are determined to help America achieve an ever brighter future."

He pledged to "the men and women who make up our labor force" that the government "will work closely with them in building that future."

The President will be host to a

MORE THAN 50,000 jobs have been lost to members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers since 1966 because of "unfair international trade policies," IUE Pres. Paul Jennings tells the union's 14th convention, held in Houston. Responsible for the loss are companies that "twist free trade to their own selfish benefit," Jennings said.

Major Convention Theme:

IUE Battles Export of Jobs, Urges Action by Congress

By John R. Oravec

Houston—With the same determination that spelled victory in the 100-day General Electric strike, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers focused on the knotty problem of imports and their impact on U.S. jobs.

Delegates to the 14th IUE convention laid the groundwork for a multi-pronged effort to curb the flood of imports through governmental and legislative actions and programs for the education of consumers and voters.

"Every resource of the IUE must be rallied to fight the continued loss of jobs because of unfair international trade policies," IUE Pres. Paul Jennings told the convention.

More than 50,000 jobs under IUE jurisdiction were lost in the electrical and electronics industry since 1966, Jennings noted.

He blamed the many U.S.-based multinational companies bent on enlarging profits through the import of products from low-wage overseas plants which are sold in this country at U.S. price levels and under familiar U.S. brand names.

These companies are twisting free trade to their own selfish benefit and not to meeting the needs of the people, Jennings declared.

"We were for free trade five years ago—and we are still for it now," he said, "but we must have a 'fair' free trade."

The people must be made aware of what these companies are up to, Jennings added.

One of the approaches the IUE will use will be by informing the voters and the candidates in the coming elections.

"We must measure each candidate in the November congressional elections against IUE's program to limit imports and support only those candidates who measure up," Jennings suggested.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland praised the union for the gains made in the GE strike.

"The GE struggle, of course, was not confined to the IUE alone, or to the eleven unions in the AFL-CIO Coordinated Bargaining Committee," Kirkland noted. "The entire labor movement mobilized as never before to help win that victory.

"Trade unionists everywhere pitched in. They freely gave more money than has ever before been contributed to help win a single strike. In all 50 states, and in nearly every city and town, they helped make the boycott of GE products the most effective action of its kind ever undertaken.

"Because of the GE strike, the future of collective bargaining is more secure. We know—and management knows—that unions can and will work together, and that union members can and will make whatever sacrifices are necessary to win justice for themselves and others.

"We know, of course, that Boulwarism isn't necessarily dead, and that we have to be ready to fight it again—but we are confident that, if we do, we will win again."

Kirkland also stressed the need for a balanced foreign trade program and denounced the Administration's domestic economic policies that "throw the burden of both inflation and recession on America's workers and exempt the rich, the bankers and the corporations." (Excerpts, Page 4.)

The convention adopted a resolution calling for control and regulation of U.S.-based multinational firms that "export capital and industrial capacity outside the borders" of the country.

The resolution also urged Congress to establish a Cabinet-level department of foreign trade to combine the responsibilities and functions now dispersed among a number of federal agencies.

This proposed department should have an advisory committee with labor and consumer representatives, the IUE urged.

It is now time for the American worker and the consumer to be consulted in matters of world commerce, the resolution noted, since traditionally foreign trade has been left to the businessman and the international banker.

Kirkland and Jennings also scored the Administration's economic and civil rights policies.

Despite Nixon's campaign pledges against inflation, Jennings said, prices and interest rates have soared. The rise from 6 percent to 9.5 percent in home mortgage rates means an increase of $73 a month in the cost of a $25,000 house, he pointed out.

This makes housing unavailable to IUE members and other factory workers, Jennings observed, and it also cuts down the market for electrical goods.

Jennings and Kirkland urged IUE delegates and members to work for the election of congressmen and senators who will check the worst programs of the Administration.

J. Curtis Counts, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, reported that collective bargaining settlements in 1970 have made new gains, especially in the field of public employe unions.

He suggested that unions give additional attention to the needs of younger workers in their contract considerations. He also called for continued efforts to improve the collective bargaining process.

Other major speakers at the opening days of the convention included Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Hank Brown; Pat Conroy, Canadian labor counsellor in the United States, and Irving Bluestone, United Auto Workers co-director of the General Motors Dept.

Utah Convention Votes Support for Sen. Moss

Salt Lake City—Utah unions have helped register more than 85 percent of their members in labor's campaign to elect progressive candidates to Congress and state offices this fall, State AFL-CIO Pres. C. E. Burger told the 14th annual convention of the state central body.

Sen. Frank E. Moss (D) was endorsed for a third term after telling the delegates "I'm foursquare with you and the working people of this state and the nation." Endorsed for Congress from the 1st District was candidate A. H. "Bob" Nance but other recommendations were withheld until after the Sept. 8 primary election.

In a constitutional change, the convention voted to eliminate the post of secretary-treasurer for budgetary reasons. The incumbent president, a member of the Steelworkers, will fill the combined post for the balance of his unexpired term.

A. A. Thon of Meat Cutters Local 637, Ogden, was re-elected as vice president by a 346-141 vote over R. Boyd Clark, who had been secretary-treasurer for a year.

Mrs. Esther Peterson, a convention speaker and former assistant secretary of labor, praised Moss for "bringing some light and reason to the consumer field" by pressing for fair packaging and labeling, warranty protection and honesty in product advertising.

The convention authorized state officers to press for a "realistic, meaningful" law to compensate workers for damage to their hearing suffered at work. A law recently passed eliminates most industrial noises from coverage and in effect "protects industry rather than the worker," the executive board told delegates.

Also passed were resolutions supporting the "orderly regulation of imports," national health insurance, a state minimum wage law equaling federal standards, a ban on importation of professional strikebreakers, and a single state agency to deal with drug addiction problems.

LaMar Gulbransen, area COPE director, reported that regardless of Administration claims that the recession is tapering off, "we're a long way from bottoming out" economically.

A recession in Utah has left few bright spots of economic growth, another speaker said. Executive Dir. R. Thayne Robson of the University of Utah's economic development and research division called on labor to press for more industries willing to pay adequate wages as against low-wage fly-by-night industry fleeing from other states.

Other speakers included Political Education Dir. James C. O'Brien of the Steelworkers, Chairman C. F. Gronning of the State Industrial Commission, David Turner, Jr., of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, Dept. of Labor; Pres. Roy L. Holman of the Utah-South Idaho Farmers' Union; Vice Pres. Albert Meyer of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers, and Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh of COPE's Women's Activities Dept.

Retirees Given Option on Tax Withholding

Retired workers will be able to have their income tax deducted from pension payments starting next year—if they want this done.

The decision will be theirs, under new Treasury Dept. regulations aimed at simplifying income tax payments for persons receiving private pension or annuity benefits. The withholding regulation does not cover social security payments, since these are exempt from federal tax.

Under the new rules, a person receiving a pension or annuity may request that a specific dollar amount —not less than $5 a month—be withheld from his pension check. The request must be made on a new Internal Revenue Service form W-4P, which will soon be available at IRS district offices.

The amount withheld does not have to equal the recipient's tax liability on the annuity. And if the pensioner prefers to continue paying his tax obligation on his own, he does not have to use the withholding system.

The Treasury Dept. noted, however, that a person who does not meet his tax obligations through a withholding system is obligated to make quarterly payments of estimated tax if his estimated end-of-the-year tax obligation is more than $40.

Court Upholds UTU On Grievance Action

Philadelphia—A railroad fireman's lawsuit against his union because it failed to continue pressing a grievance it believed he would lose has been thrown out of court by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The United Transportation Union "undoubtedly sought in good faith" to obtain the reinstatement of the fireman, Nilo A. Bazarte, the court said. He was fired in 1964 by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad for leaving his engine before his shift ended to go to another job in South Philadelphia.

The court concluded that the union "did not act in a perfunctory manner." It found that Bazarte had failed to offer proof that the union had failed in its duty of fair representation.

The decision, written by Appeals Judge Abraham L. Freedman, vacated the judgment against the UTU and returned the case to the Philadelphia U.S. District Court with an order to enter a verdict in favor of the union.

Judge Freedman said the duty of fair representation in the negotiation, administration and enforcement of collective bargaining agreements was imposed on unions by federal law as an obligation "correlative to the right of a union to represent all the employes in a bargaining unit as their exclusive bargain-agent despite the contrary wishes of a minority."

This doctrine, however, "does not confer on an employe an absolute right to force his collective bargaining agent to press his complaint all the way to the very end of the grievance procedures" provided for in the labor-management contract, the court said.

The appeals court noted that the union grievance chairman had represented Bazarte at several hearings but decided finally not to press the grievance because he considered the case "hopeless."

Labor Board Caseload Hits New Record High

The work load of the National Labor Relations Board increased to nearly 34,000 cases last year to set a new record for the 35-year-old federal agency.

Employes, business firms and unions filed 33,582 petitions or charges with the NLRB in the 12-month period that ended last June 30. That was 7 percent more filings than the 31,303 cases received the preceding year.

As usual, a new high total of unfair labor practice charges helped smash all previous records for new cases. For the first time, charges against unions or employers or both climbed above 20,000 in a fiscal year. The total was 21,039.

Other types of cases included 12,077 petitions for NLRB-conducted representation elections, 107 requests for changes in the makup of bargaining units, 201 requests for clarification of bargaining units, and 158 petitions for withdrawal of union authority to negotiate union shop agreements with employers.

The agency noted in summarizing its annual report that "the NLRB does not initiate cases; it processes those filed with it."

Despite the persistent rise in business, the NLRB seems unlikely to get from the Administration and Congress the funds needed to enlarge its staff. The Bureau of the Budget recommended appropriations of $37.9 million for the coming year—a reduction of $600,000 from last year's budget. The House raised the figure to $39.4 million and sent it to the Senate for further action.

At Carpenters Convention:

'Real Breakthrough' Forecast in Housing

San Francisco—The nation's housing crisis—especially the need for homes that middle- and low-income families can afford—can be solved and the Carpenters are in the forefront to meet this problem, delegates to the union's 31st convention were told.

Pres. M. A. Hutcheson said in his keynote address that the sluggish home building program is tied to a number of inflationary conditions, including the high costs of land and mortgage rates.

But the Carpenters have not stood by bemoaning these conditions, he declared.

"Our international has taken the leadership in meeting the situation," Hutcheson said, citing the current national agreements with firms in the manufacture of factory-built modular homes.

This has been the real breakthrough for a practical and massive attack on the housing crisis, he asserted.

Although the country is running 1.5 million houses behind schedule on the goal set by Congress to build 26 million new and refurbished homes by 1979, Hutcheson predicted a boom when factors holding back home building are overcome.

"And when that day arrives. the housing field will boom beyond anything that has yet been experienced in the construction industry." he said in his report to the convention's more than 2,300 delegates.

"This assures us an opportunity for organizing we dare not neglect," he added.

Hutcheson noted that the union experienced a net membership gain of more than 41,000 in the past four years and now represents about 820,000 carpenters in the United States and Canada.

He termed the increase "unspectacular" and urged fuller cooperation from district councils and locals with the union's organization staff.

Progress in wage increases negotiated by the union during the four years since the last convention were documented in Hutcheson's report. As of April 1970. the national average hourly wage including fringe benefits for Carpenters was $6.83. a gain of $1.87 from 1966. This compares with an average increase of $1.66 an hour for all building trades.

He also cited gains in apprenticeship programs aimed at recruiting and training minority group members. In cooperation with the building trades programs, 1,300 young men have been indentured as Carpenters in the past two years, Hutcheson said.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., in an address to the delegates, scored government-imposed minority hiring quotas in the construction industry as unworkable and politically motivated.

"If the Philadelphia Plan is a panacea for all the racial ills in the construction industry, why should it not be extended so that its beneficial effects be felt elsewhere . . . in civil service . . . for women . . . non-construction industries?" he asked.

Declaring the plan unnecessary, Haggerty noted that the BCTD has continually called on local unions and councils to explore and pursue training programs for the upgrading of minority workers who are beyond the apprenticeship age.

He said the voluntary programs of building trades unions have proved to be effective and will prevail because of progress made in recent years.

The convention voted to increase the union's per capita tax from $2.65 to $3 a month. The 35-cent increase will go into effect Jan. 1.

Most of the increase—25 cents—will be added to the current $1.20 allocation to the pension fund and 10 cents is earmarked for a new fund to maintain the home for aged members in Lakeland, Fla.

A move to phase out the retirement facility, which currently houses 208 occupants, was defeated.

Treas. Peter E. Terzick reported that the union's pension rolls increased more than 40 percent in the past five years to 34,585 and the home and pension fund had decreased by more than $3 million in the past four years.

Revenue added to the pension fund by the 25-cent boost will not increase benefits, but will add about $188,000 a month to the fund.

Delegates re-elected Hutcheson to his fifth four-year term by acclamation. Also re-elected without opposition were First Vice Pres. William Sidell, Second Vice Pres. Herbert C. Skinner, Sec. R. E. Livingston and Treas. Terzick.

Nine of the union's 10 board members were returned to office. A contest for the third district seat pits incumbent Cecil Shuey against William Konyha of Cleveland. The election will be held later in the convention.

Speakers at the earlier days of the convention included Pres. David MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress; Jesse Unruh, Democratic candidate for governor in California; Pres. Maywood Boggs of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., and Executive Sec.-Treas John Henning of the California AFL-CIO.

O'Neal Leads Labor In Dystrophy Appeal

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Frederick O'Neal has been named chairman of the labor committee for the Jerry Lewis Labor Day telethon to raise funds for the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America.

The telethon, starting Sunday night, Sept. 6th and continuing throughout Labor Day, will be carried on a 50-city network.

Lewis expressed the organization's gratitude that O'Neal, who is also president of Actors' Equity and its parent Associated Actors & Artistes, had agreed to take the post after the death of Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin.

Thomas R. Donahue, executive secretary of the Service Employes, is assistant chairman of the committee. Unions have traditionally been active supporters of the Jerry Lewis telethon, which last year raised more than $2 million in pledges to help the fight against dystrophy and related diseases.

Service Employes Local Wins San Diego Vote

San Diego, Calif.—The Service Employes won the right to bargain for 1,300 employes of the County Dept. of Public Welfare in an election conducted by the State Conciliation Service. The vote was 725 for the Social Workers Union, SEIU Local 535; 332 for the County Employes Association; 2 for no union.

TOP OFFICERS of the Railroad Signalmen listen as AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland tells the union's 38th convention that informed and effective political action by union members is the key to solution of problems facing the railroad industry. Left is R. T. Bates, elected to his first three-year term as secretary-treasurer, and right, Pres. C. J. Chamberlain, who was re-elected.

Register-Vote Drive Mapped In New Mexico

Las Cruces, N.M.—New Mexico labor will concentrate on its voter registration drive until Sept. 22, and then will dig in for a get-out-the-vote campaign, the 15th state AFL-CIO convention decided here.

Delegates from more than 100 local unions reported at the convention's COPE session that the percentage of union members registered was raised from 45 percent to more than 85 percent, and staff representatives of many unions will help complete the register-and-vote effort in the final days of the drive.

State AFL-CIO endorsements were voted for these Democratic candidates:

Sen. Joseph M. Montoya for re-election; Fabian Chavez for Congress in District 1; Bruce King for governor, Robert Mondragen for lieutenant governor and Speaker of the House, David Norvell for state attorney general.

The incumbent Republican congressmen, Manuel Lujan and Ed Foreman, have poor voting records by labor standards, state officers reported.

Campaign issues this year include the economic recession, high interest rates, and harmful layoffs in the construction industry and others. The present unemployment rate statewide is 7.4 percent, Pres. Alfonso Rodriguez and Sec.-Treas. Neal Gonzalez said.

The state body presented its annual J. B. McCoy award for outstanding service to George Dunivan of the Meat Cutters, Albuquerque.

Convention speakers included Montoya, Gov. David Cargo and Lieut. Gov. Lee Francis, Mrs. Marcella Beatty of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, and Sherman A. Miles, COPE area director.

B&C's Conway Heads Food, Drink Secretariat

Zurich, Switzerland—Pres. Daniel Conway of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers has been elected president of the international body of unions in the food and drink industry.

Delegates to the 16th statutory congress of the International Unions of Food & Allied Workers' Associations elected Conway unanimously. He is the first American to head the trade secretariat.

The secretariat represents more than 1 million workers in the food, tobacco and beverage unions of 62 countries.

Conway, who was elected to a three-year term, has been active in the secretariat since 1958.

Rail Signalmen Approve Dues Hike, Strike Fund

Las Vegas—Delegates to the Railroad Signalmen's convention backed up their union's collective bargaining program by approving overwhelmingly the largest per capita increase in the organization's 70-year history.

The per capita payment was raised from $9 every three months to $15.50, with one dollar of the increase going into a strike fund.

In floor discussion, delegates backed the increase as necessary to finance the union's program of independent bargaining with the nation's railroads in national negotiations.

The convention authorized the officers to seek to negotiate a merger with the Train Dispatchers, with any agreement subject to approval first by the executive board and board of trustees and then through ratification by the union's locals or lodges.

The merger proposal was described as an opportunity for two organizations with similar problems to pool resources and bargaining strength.

Pres. C. J. Chamberlain was re-elected to his second term and R. T. Bates, recently appointed secretary-treasurer to fill a vacancy, was elected to a full term. Neither had opposition.

All other incumbent officers seeking re-election were returned to office. Vacancies caused by retirements were filled with the election of W. W. Altus, Jr., as a vice president, and C. A. Harrington and Walter Lauer as members of the board of trustees.

The convention strongly supported a national health insurance program, noting that health care costs are moving "out of sight." The resolution urged delegates to press letter-writing campaigns among the membership on behalf of the labor-backed national health insurance bill introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.).

The convention approved pay raises for the union's officers, ranging from $1,750 a year for vice president to a $4,000 boost for the president.

Delegates rejected a proposal to stretch the interval between conventions from three to four years and chose New Orleans as the site for the 1973 convention.

They approved a constitutional change, effective in 1973, to hold nominations for union office a day prior to election to give delegates an opportunity to "examine" candidates for office.

Postal Vehicle Union To Explore Merger

San Francisco—Another postal union has indicated its readiness to join in exploring the possibilities of merging or federating the seven exclusive postal craft unions into a single body.

The 300 delegates to the 22nd biennial convention of the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes, authorized the union's officers to discuss formation of a federation of postal unions.

Their findings would be reported back to the union's 1972 convention in Boston.

Pres. Francis S. Filbey of the Postal Clerks, a convention speaker, has called for merger discussions among the five AFL-CIO and two independent unions representing nearly three-quarters of a million postal workers.

The possibilities of merger shared top billing at the vehicle employes' sessions with preparations for contract negotiations with the newly-created U.S. Postal service, a process that is due to get started in the next 30 days.

Convention action brought the membership requirements and local union organization into line with requirements of the new law reorganizing the postal services.

Delegates also approved an increase from $1.50 a month to $2 in per capita payments made necessary, the convention was told, by the organization's new responsibilities under the postal reorganization.

Pres. Chester W. Parrish, Sec.-Treas. Leon S. Hawkins and Executive Vice Pres. Leon W. Hopton, were re-elected to new two-year terms.

Rx for Recovery

WE HAVE BEEN making progress at the bargaining table, in the legislatures and in the community. But everything we have done and everything we hope to do is in danger today. The spreading sickness that is undermining the nation's economic health has got to be cured if that progress is to continue.

That sickness is taking many forms — unemployment is going steadily up and production and weekly take-home wages are going down. Prices and interest rates are soaring and magnifying the damage. American plants are closing and American technology and the jobs of American workers are being shipped overseas.

All of these weaknesses and infirmities can be traced to one, single source of infection: wrong and misguided policy-making on a national level.

The American economy, like the American government, is supposed to serve all the people of the United States. The fact is that it hasn't been doing that. The combination of recession and inflation is making the rich richer at the expense of the American consumer and the American worker.

We in the AFL-CIO are not isolationists. We advocate an expanded world trade, a truly free trade, that will benefit all of the world's citizens and improve wages and working conditions all over the world. But trade patterns must be balanced and their flow must not be determined by the location of the world's cheapest and most exploited labor.

The AFL-CIO has laid before Congress an entire battery of proposals that would rationalize America's foreign trade posture and halt the outflow of American resources and jobs. We intend to fight on this line until they are adopted.

THE DOMESTIC economic policies of this Administration are an exact counterpart of its foreign trade and investment policies. They throw the burden of both inflation and recession on America's workers, and exempt the rich, the bankers and the corporations.

Pres. Nixon's tight-money policy is aimed equally, we are told, at all segments of the economy. Money is supposed to be tight across the board. But the multi-national banks and corporations aren't affected. They have access to the money market anywhere in the world, and they have evaded the forces that are crushing the rest of the economy.

The effect is plain. The government's economic policies are a flat failure. The things this country needs to do—in improving its school and hospital and road systems, and expanding social and community services—are not being done. Things this country does not need—the further concentration of wealth, erosion of jobs, reduction in consumer buying power, further fattening of corporate profits—are being done faster than ever before.

The only way to change these unfair and irrational policies is to go to the polls and elect people who will work for national policies that make sense, and fight to get them adopted.

We have to take on, once again, the hard work of seeing to it that all union members, and all their friends and members of their families, are registered to vote, that they know the candidates' records and the issues, and that they cast their ballots.

Some economic analysts predict that the present recession will last well into next year. But if we all do our part, the task of putting America back to work will get under way on Tuesday, November third, 1970—Election Day.

Left and Right Both Concoct Imaginary Political Majorities

By John P. Roche

IT IS ONE of the ironies of our times that the militants who have been demanding "all power to the people!" have the least understanding of precisely what this involves. Indeed, if we gave all power to the people and removed the buffers known as "due process of law," these self-designated revolutionaries would be the first to feel the lash. To cite one vivid example, at Chicago in the Democratic shambles of 1968 a would-be Lenin charged the police yelling "Long live the dictatorship of the proletariat!" "We are the dictatorship of the proletariat," announced the cop who brought him down.

What the extremists have always done is create a fictitious majority with themselves as its authorized spokesmen. For years the right-wingers in the United States cherished the certain knowledge that theirs was the Cause of the Real America, that a true-blue candidate who rejected liberalism and refused to be an "echo" would mobilize a majority. In 1964 they had their day in court and that illusion was disposed of once and for all.

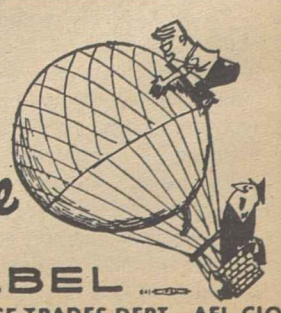
Today we have the same phenomenon at the other end of the political spectrum. Day in, day out, the leaders of the Democratic Party are told that the future lies on the left in a new coalition of the young, the black and the poor, that "old politics" must be repudiated and replaced by a brand of pentecostal revivalism. The pressure on this front is terrific; unlike the Goldwaterites, the advocates of "new politics" are plugged into what might be called the "communications culture" and are extraordinarily adept at faking their majority.

If, for example, you had read only the leading reviews of Theodore H. White's "Making of the President: 1968," you would have emerged with the impression that the village idiot of Squaresville, that is, White, had somehow become a political commentator. One after another, the critics ridiculed White's preposterous suggestions that Lyndon Johnson was not a monster, that the war in Viet Nam was not a black and white proposition, and—perhaps worst of all—that student extremists were no better than fascists.



Overlooked in this joyous lynching bee was the demonstrable fact that White had forgotten more about American politics than his critics in aggregate ever knew. One did not have to agree with him on all points—his discussion of the late Sen. Robert Kennedy was, for instance, too tinged with personal affection for my taste—but he had done his homework. This made little impression on his critics. They believed in salvation by faith alone and on that score he was consigned to perdition.

THESE REFLECTIONS were triggered by the fact that next month Coward-McCann is publishing the most incisive and controversial analysis of American politics that has come along in the last decade: "The Real Majority" by Richard M. Scammon and Ben J. Wattenberg.

Scammon, who was John Kennedy's director of the Census Bureau, is an almost mythical figure in political Washington, a walking computer who once, when an election-night electronic wonder broke down, stepped into its place. "The Real Majority" is subtitled "An Extraordinary Examination of the American Electorate," and it fulfills its promise.

Scammon and Wattenberg have spent little time with the ballyhoo that characterizes our politics. Pushing aside the cosmetics, they have engaged in an inch-by-inch exploration of the structure of politics. The result is a devastating attack on the imaginary majorities concocted by both the right wing and the left.

What is really interesting at this point in time is to guess at the credentials and orientation of the reviewers who will evaluate the book when it appears. Will the St. Georges of the New Left be sent forth to slay the Dragon? Or will the volume be assigned to critics who (whether they agree or disagree with Scammon) have earned the right to to be taken seriously?

The 91st Congress: A Report

By Andrew J. Biemiller
Director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation

THE 91ST CONGRESS sharply challenged the Nixon Administration's priorities. Clear confrontation emerged when the Senate twice rejected the President's Supreme Court nominations and Congress twice rejected his vetoes of appropriations for education and health.

Thus, the Republican President, facing Democratic majorities in the Senate and House of Representatives, was checked by the nation's constitutional separation of powers. The AFL-CIO had a major role in these four major fights—and many others—to protect past social gains and to provide adequate funds for the nation's priority programs.

In the 1969 session, the Senate turned thumbs down on Pres. Nixon's nomination of an anti-labor, anti-civil rights judge, Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., for a Supreme Court vacancy. When the President followed this unsuccessful nomination with another anti-labor, anti-civil rights nominee, G. Harrold Carswell, the Senate again, in the 1970 session, rejected the nomination. Subsequently a qualified conservative, Harry A. Blackmun, was nominated and confirmed.

WHEN PRES. NIXON VETOED a bill to extend the popular Hill-Burton hospital and health facilities program in June 1970, the House and Senate voted by overwhelming margins to override the President's veto. In August 1970 Congress again voted to override a veto, this time on a bill providing funds for education.

However, in January 1970, when Pres. Nixon vetoed a bill to provide funds for the Departments of Labor and Health, Education & Welfare, a 226-191 House majority fell short of the necessary two-thirds majority to override, and a trimmed-down bill—still above the Nixon budget—was passed.

Another Nixon veto which Congress failed to override in August 1970 involved funds for urban renewal and for water and sewer systems. The 203-195 majority vote in the House again fell short of the necessary two-thirds.

In the civil rights arena, the 91st Congress voted to continue the Voting Rights Act for five years and added a provision to lower the voting age to 18 for all elections. An Administration move to weaken the bill was successful in the House, but Senate action restored the original version.

THE TAX REFORM ACT of 1969 was one important forward step by the 91st Congress toward tax justice. The 1969 law failed to close all tax loopholes. Nevertheless, it stands as the most sweeping rewrite of the federal tax code since 1912, when the 16th Amendment to the Constitution first gave Congress the power to levy and collect taxes on income. The forward steps toward tax justice for low and middle income families were achieved over the opposition of the Administration, which tried to give the major tax cuts to business corporations. The typical union worker with a wife and two children got a tax cut ranging from $100 to $260.

An anti-labor proposal by Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) to remove labor unions from tax exempt status if they support political activities, including voter registration, was defeated by a healthy 59-27 Senate vote in 1969. Unfortunately, another anti-labor move was more successful in 1970 when a Dixiecrat-Republican coalition in the House forced the Senate to accept a "right-to-work" provision in the postal reorganization bill.

Congress did pass two important labor measures—the Federal Construction Safety Act, providing for safety standards on all federal and federally assisted construction, and the Coal Mine Health & Safety Act, providing for health and safety standards and extending workmen's compensation to miners suffering from "black lung."

THE SENATE LABOR COMMITTEE in August 1970 approved for floor action a public service job creation bill sponsored by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.). But AFL-CIO supported bills for general occupational health and safety, a minimum wage of $2 an hour, bargaining rights for farm labor, and other objectives were moving slowly as the 1970 election approached.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates are making a special drive to get passage of the Daniels occupational health and safety bill before the November elections.

The liberal-labor-civil rights coalition in Congress must be strengthened. Election Day victories for liberals already in Congress and for liberal challengers to incumbent conservatives can make the 92nd Congress far more productive in advancing the welfare of America's working men and women and their families. This is the challenge labor faces.

By Alexander E. Barkan
Director, AFL-CIO COPE

A HAZE similar to the one that blanketed major East Coast cities for a full week this summer shades the 1970 elections.

One was physical smog. The other is semantic smog. It makes the issues of 1970 as hard to see as the cities were.

This political pollution is being spewed into the campaign air by conservative candidates striving to obscure real issues by pumping out side issues. The objective is to befog the brain.

They reason that if they can distract voters from the facts of rising unemployment and soaring living costs, and prohibitive interest rates and economic policies that constitute a genuine threat to the living standards of every American family, then their chances of election will be increased.

Hence, in every section of the country we have candidates talking about everything in the world except these key economic issues. They talk about gun control, sex education, campus and urban disorders, school busing—but not about the threats to the jobs of American workers, the prices that wipe out wage increases, or the interest rates that prevent workers from buying a home.

THE DANGER, to the trade union movement and its members, and hopes for progressive, concerned government, is that the tactic is a cover-up for candidates who, if elected, will be the first ones to jump on any anti-union bandwagon that forms in Congress and the last ones to do anything about the serious economic problems that jeopardize every worker's job. Unhappily, in at least one instance this year, the game plan worked. Pro-worker, pro-union Sen. Ralph Yarborough lost his Texas primary in the smog of side issues.

It will not be easy to pierce through the political pollution, for there is so much of it. But a reading of the following pages will help. Inside are the voting records of all U.S. senators and congressmen on the major issues of the 91st Congress.

The stakes this year make it imperative that workers and their families and friends get to the heart of the issues. Conservatives are concocting a smorgasbord of anti-labor legislation that would serve up union security on a platter to the enemies of trade unionism in America. The bill of fare ranges from dismantling the NLRB to prohibiting coordinated multi-union bargaining, and, indeed, to driving unions out of the political arena.

Needless to say, such a program would hit not only at workers and their families, but would plunge the entire nation even deeper into economic peril.

THE STATISTICS of 1970 are stark: Of 35 Senate seats up for election, 21 are held by good friends of working people. If conservatives make a net gain of seven Senate seats, control of the Senate will fall to them.

Similarly, in the House any appreciable conservative gain will tip the balance of control, now held by liberals only by the fingernails. The 243-188 Democratic advantage (there are four vacancies) can tolerate little reduction if progressive programs are to stand a chance in the coming two years or, conversely, if regressive programs are to be blocked.

The challenge to the trade union movement goes beyond re-electing our friends. It is to elect new friends, as well, to replace anti-worker incumbents.

It is a challenge we must meet with all our resources, energy and dedication, for the stakes of 1970 involve the very future of our unions.

The next three pages carry labor's report card on the 91st Congress as it neared adjournment.

Congressmen have been judged on 12 key issues; senators on 13. The symbols—"R-right" or "W-wrong"— are based on the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation. The table also includes the cumulative voting record of each member of the House and Senate since taking office.

Alongside the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and why it was important to the labor movement and the nation.

A congressman or senator may claim he supported labor's position because he voted for final passage of a bill. But in most cases, the key vote was on an amendment that would have seriously weakened or greatly improved the bill. The votes used here are those considered most significant.

How Your Repre

1. Education Funds

The Administration budget called for totally inadequate funding of federal aid to education—less than half the amount Congress had authorized to be spent.

The House Appropriations Committee recommended an additional $121 million for education aid. But the gap between that amount and the need would still have been too wide in the opinion of labor and education groups.

The AFL-CIO helped rally support for an amendment by Rep. Joelson (D-N.J.) to add an additional $894.5 million for education programs. It was approved 294-119, July 31, 1969.

For—right. Against—wrong.

2. HEW Veto

When Congress added $1.1 billion to Pres. Nixon's HEW appropriations requests, to provide adequate funds for needed health and education programs, the President vetoed the measure, charging the additional funding was inflationary. A proposal to override the veto won a 226-191 majority, Jan. 28, 1970, but fell short of the two-thirds majority necessary to override.

For—right. Against—wrong.

3. Surtax

Over opposition of labor and other tax reform forces, the House extended the surtax on income tax one year without including meaningful tax reform.

However, the margin was so close before the vote that it brought firm pledges from House Ways & Means Chairman Mills and Pres. Nixon to consider tax reform immediately.

This paved the way for reforms and the $750 personal exemption in the final tax measure signed into law. The surtax extension passed June 30, 1969, by a vote of 210-205.

For—wrong. Against—right.

4. Electoral College

The 1968 presidential election, with the threat that it would be thrown for decision into the U.S. House because of a third-party candidate, renewed interest in long-delayed electoral reform, primarily in direct election of the President and abolition of the Electoral College. The House Judiciary Committee reported a bill to this effect, backed by committee leaders of both parties.

The House eventually passed the committee bill but first had to deal with a proposal by Rep. Dennis (R-Ind.) which would have retained the Electoral College. The Dennis proposal was rejected 246-162, Sept. 18, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

5. School Desegregation

The House had voted to prevent HEW funds from being withheld from school districts with so-called "freedom of choice" plans. These plans are a device to avoid school desegregation. They have been ruled illegal by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Later, the House backed down and agreed to a Senate amendment preserving the desegregation program. Rep. Flood (D-Pa.) tried to block this reversal but failed 216-181, Dec. 18, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

6. Voting Rights

The 1965 Voting Rights Act has helped add more than a million voters to the registration rolls in seven southern states and has been the most successful human rights legislation in recent years. An Administration move to weaken it succeeded narrowly in the House in December 1969. But the Senate restored the act to its original form—concentrating in seven states—and added the voting franchise for 18-year-olds and standardized residency requirements for voting for president.

When it came before the House again, Rep. Matsunaga (D-Hawaii) moved to accept the AFL-CIO-supported Senate version. His motion carried June 17, 1970, 224-183.

For—right. Against—wrong.

7. War on Poverty

The effort to scuttle the war on poverty has been constant. Despite this, the anti-poverty program has had some successes, and one reason for them has been the presence of a central authority, the Office of Economic Opportunity, that can coordinate the various anti-poverty programs.

Rep. Ayres (R-Ohio) tried to fragment the anti-poverty program by turning it over to the states and reducing the authority of the OEO. His plan was rejected 231-163, Dec. 12, 1969.

For—wrong. Against—right.

8. Family Aid Job Standards

A move was made to strike from the Family Assistance Act employment standards that had been written into the bill at the request of the AFL-CIO to prevent using a welfare program to provide employers with substandard-paid workers.

The motion was approved Apr. 16, 1970, 248-149.

For—wrong. Against—right.

9. Hospital Construction

Construction and modernization of urgently needed health facilities were threatened by Pres. Nixon's veto of a bill extending the Hill-Burton program of federal grants.

This was another instance of a presidential veto aimed at funding of an important social welfare program. The veto came only a year after the President himself had warned that the nation is in a health crisis and "unless action is taken . . . we will have a breakdown in our medical care system affecting millions."

The vote to override the veto far exceeded the necessary two-thirds majority, June 25, 1970, 279-98.

For—right. Against—wrong.

10. Mortgage Funds

The nation is in a housing crisis. There is not enough of it, and too much of what there is is substandard. New housing starts are way down because of Administration "tight money" policies and prohibitive interest rates.

Rep. Patman (D-Tex.) proposed a National Development Bank to help provide mortgage funds for middle income families unable to get conventional loans. But a move to knock out his proposal, and leave home-seekers at the mercy of the bankers and money-lenders, succeeded June 25, 1970, 215-113.

For—wrong. Against—right.

11. Postal Service Open Shop

Rep. Dulski (D-N.Y.) tried to retain the union security provision of the postal reform bill by moving to table, thus kill, a motion for the House to insist on an open shop clause.

Even though the right to negotiate a union shop was part of the agreement the Administration made with the AFL-CIO and seven postal unions, 148 Republicans voted against union security, only 19 for it. The Dulski motion to save the union security provision was rejected July 9, 1970, 154-229.

For—right. Against—wrong.

12. Farm Workers' Jobless Aid

Farm workers, whose employment is mainly seasonal and who suffer long stretches of joblessness, are not covered by unemployment insurance.

Even though the Administration had endorsed partial coverage of farm workers, the House conservative coalition fought any extension of unemployment insurance to agriculture.

A proposal by Rep. O'Hara (D-Mich.) to extend jobless pay coverage to workers on farms with eight or more employes who are on payroll 26 or more weeks of the year would have aided more than 250,000 farm workers. It was rejected July 23, 1970, 170-219.

How Your Senators Voted

1. Filibuster Rule

The Senate muffed a chance to change its filibuster rule at the start of the 91st Congress. Shortly before he left office, Vice Pres. Humphrey ruled that only a majority vote was needed to act on a change in the Senate's rules at the start of a new Congress. But on Jan. 16, 1969, the Senate refused to sustain Humphrey's ruling by a 53-45 vote. For—right. Against—wrong.

2. Poverty-Legal Services

Conservatives opposed to the war on poverty sought to give governors absolute veto power over legal services projects for the poor. A proposal by Sen. Murphy (R-Calif.) to this effect was approved 45-40, Oct. 14, 1969. For—wrong. Against—right. (Murphy's amendment was later knocked out of the final bill.)

3. Child Nutrition

A proposal by Sen. Javits (R-N.Y.) was approved to provide free school lunches to children from families with incomes of less than $4,000. A move to reconsider the vote and give opponents a chance to kill the proposal was rejected, Feb. 24, 1970, 39-42. For—wrong. Against—right.

4. School Desegregation

The House passed an amendment to prevent cutting federal funds to school districts refusing to desegregate. Despite Supreme Court decisions, the House plan said federal funds could not be denied school districts permitting so-called "freedom of choice" plans. Sen. Scott (R-Pa.) proposed an amendment to nullify the House action, and the Senate approved it, 52-37, Dec. 17, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

5. Voting Rights

Sen. Hruska (R-Neb.) carried the ball for Nixon Administration efforts to water down the 1965 Voting Rights Act in the Senate. He moved to table, thus kill, a proposal to extend the present act for five years. Hruska's motion was defeated Mar. 5, 1970, 32-47. For—wrong. Against right.

6. Money for Cities

Many progressive programs suffered deep fund cuts during 1969, among them programs to aid our choked, blighted cities. Sen. Hart (D-Mich.) tried to increase appropriations for urban renewal by $587.5 million. His proposal was rejected 36-34, Nov. 10, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong.

7. Haynsworth Nomination

A consistent pattern of anti-union decisions, hostility to civil rights progress and gross insensitivity to conflicts of interest led the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups to oppose Pres. Nixon's nomination of Judge Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court. On Nov. 21, 1969, the Senate rejected the nomination by a 55-45 vote. For—wrong. Against—right.

8. Carswell Nomination

Following the rejection of Judge Haynsworth's nomination, Pres. Nixon submitted the name of G. Harrold Carswell as his nominee to the Supreme Court. Like Haynsworth, Carswell had a long record of insensitivity to human rights progress. He was judged a mediocrity by many legal experts and jurists. His nomination was rejected Apr. 8, 1970, 51-45. For—wrong. Against—right.

9. Tax Reform—Exemptions

The $600 personal income tax exemption has been long outdated and is obviously inadequate. As a major measure of tax reform—one of the biggest issues in Congress and the nation—Sen. Gore (D-Tenn.) proposed increasing the personal exemption to $800. The Senate approved the Gore amendment 58-37, Dec. 3, 1969. For—right. Against—wrong. (The final bill changed this to a three-step increase to $750.)

10. The Anti-COPE Amendment

Prompted by the National Right to Work Committee, Sen. Fannin (R-Ariz.) introduced an amendment to the tax bill to deny tax exemptions to presently exempt organizations which engage in political activities, even non-partisan registration drives. The Fannin proposal was aimed squarely at the labor movement. The amendment was rejected 59-27, Dec. 8, 1969. For—wrong. Against—right.

11. Farm Workers' Jobless Aid

A proposal by Sen. Mondale (D-Minn.) to provide unemployment insurance coverage for migrant farm workers was approved Apr. 7, 1970, 42-36. For—Right. Against—wrong. (Subsequent House action knocked out coverage for any farm workers.)

12. Postal Service Open Shop

A motion by Sen. Javits (R-N.Y.) to delete the open shop provision in the House version of the postal reform measure so postal employes could be protected by union security agreements was approved June 30, 1970, 52-38. For—right. Against—wrong. (House conservatives subsequently succeeded in barring a union shop.)

13. Hospital Construction

Pres. Nixon's veto of urgently-needed hospital construction and modernization funds was overridden June 30, 1970, 76-19. For—right. Against—wrong.

Bargaining Offers a Way Up To School Paraprofessionals

WHEN I SPOKE before the convention of the American Federation of Teachers in 1964, I said that the best way to upgrade and protect the poor would be to write upward mobility into their union contracts. This is precisely what has been done by the new three-year contract negotiated by the United Federation of Teachers (Local 2 of the AFT) which covers paraprofessionals in New York City's public schools.

The settlement, which came after months of intensive negotiations with the Board of Education as well as a threat to shut down the city school system, will bring important benefits to 4,000 paraprofessionals, most of whom are black and Puerto-Rican.

They will receive (retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970) a 140 percent increase in wages and fringe benefits, thereby bringing to an end the unseemly practice of paying paraprofessionals well under the government-set poverty level. In addition, they will receive paid vacations, sick leave, health and dental coverage, and better welfare benefits.

As important as the immediate economic gains is the career ladder program that was written into the contract. Through this program, the paraprofessionals will have the opportunity to obtain the additional education which will enable them to qualify for advanced professional positions.

They will be given 2.5 hours a week of released time with pay to attend high school or college and, beginning with the summer of 1971, a four-week college career training program will be established that will be open to all paraprofessionals with a high school diploma or its equivalent. Such a program is clearly of benefit not only to the paraprofessionals but also to the entire society.

The paraprofessionals will receive the educational tools which will enable them to secure dignified and remunerative professional jobs. At the same time, thousands of people, many of them former welfare recipients, will be making a constructive and vital contribution to society's well-being.

The importance of this contract was summed up by Velma Hill, the chairman of the paraprofessional steering committee and a long-time activist in the struggle for civil rights:

"With this agreement, paraprofessionals who have already demonstrated that they can contribute greatly to the education of children now are guaranteed the opportunity to make an even greater contribution. This was made possible by the unity of all UFT paraprofessionals and the success of the collective bargaining process."

OF THE MANY LESSONS that can be drawn from the struggle of the paraprofessionals, two stand out as most worthy of mention. The first is that the union which the paraprofessionals elected to represent them, the UFT, is frequently portrayed in the press as the "enemy" of the black community, and the president of that union, Albert Shanker, has been called a racist by numerous people in the black and liberal communities.

That the press and the name-callers are grievously mistaken is demonstrated by the UFT paraprofessional contract which Shanker helped negotiate, and they can also be sure that the UFT will now protect the paraprofessionals as vigorously as it has protected the teachers.

What should be remembered is that the fundamental issue which precipitated the 1968 strikes was not racial animosity but union rights, and a side benefit of the new contract is that it will help bring together the UFT and minority groups around the common struggle for better schools.

The second lesson has to do with the way poverty can be eliminated. During the past six years, countless small programs have been started which have tried to deal with various aspects of poverty. The difficulty with these programs has been that they were too limited and treated only the effects of poverty, not its cause. The new contract, which puts millions of dollars into the pockets of the poor, does more to combat poverty than all of these other programs.

Moreover, it does not fight poverty in a patronizing way by administering to the poor. On the contrary, the contract is the result of the poor's own struggle to create a decent and dignified life for themselves.

In this sense, the new UFT paraprofessional contract is one of the finest examples of self-determination by the poor, and it is likely to be repeated in other cities as part of a nationwide struggle by low-income workers to achieve equality.

Republican Sweep in Elections Could Strengthen NLRB Foes

A MASSIVE REPUBLICAN SWEEP in this year's congressional elections would boost prospects for legislation to abolish the National Labor Relations Board or severely restrict its jurisdiction, the AFL-CIO's associate general counsel warned in a network radio interview.

Two such measures are now before Congress, but stand little chance for passage this year, said Thomas E. Harris. Nevertheless, he said, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers are pushing hard on bills sponsored by Republican Senators John Tower (Tex.) and Robert Griffin (Mich.) to "build a record they can use" if their election hopes are realized.

"I think the purpose of these hearings," Harris said, "and the reason that the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers are pushing these proposals, as they are, is on the contingency of a big Republican sweep in the 1970 elections."

Harris appeared on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Harris said the Tower bill, which would shift prosecution of unfair labor practices from the NLRB general counsel to the various U.S. attorneys and jurisdiction over such cases from the NLRB to the U.S. district courts, would "overload the already overloaded federal district courts." He noted that districts where the major burden of cases would fall are already as much as "four years behind in deciding their cases."

"Obviously, those overloaded courts would be in even worse shape, if they had this new volume of labor cases," he asserted.

Harris also stressed that many of the 450 federal district judges now on the bench have never had a National Labor Relations Act case and "never would have enough cases that they'd develop any familiarity with it." He said a similar lack of experience and knowledge of the act among U.S. attorneys would seriously hamper their prosecution of cases under it.

HE SAID the Griffin bill offers no "cure (for) any of the deficiencies in the administration of the present act." Renaming the NLRB a "labor court" would only "replace the present board members who might not be acceptable to the present Administration with some new appointees," he said.

Creation of a constitutional court with life-tenure judges would produce a "rigidity of approach" and leave administration of the act to "a few people with lifetime appointments."

Union members remember how employers used federal courts to break strikes and weaken labor during the years before the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction law, Harris said.

He added, "I think that the federal district courts themselves would not welcome being put back into this snakepit."

As to employer complaints about the impartiality of the NLRB, Harris noted that the agency's record in being upheld by the Supreme Court "would compare favorably with that of any other federal agency."

Reporters questioning Harris on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine.

MOST AMERICANS are no longer down on the farm, but the farm bill now being written in Congress affects everyone, directly and indirectly.

The House of Representatives has already adopted its version of the measure and the Senate Agriculture Committee is considering its own bill.

Even though prices paid for food at the marketplace are everyone's business most urbanites are bored about farm legislation and have only a vague idea about such things as parity, price supports, diverted crop land and so on.

One thing did catch the public eye during the debate on the farm bill in the House. This was the $3.5 billion in annual subsidies paid to huge agri-business corporations and to individual farmers.

Currently there is no ceiling on such subsidies for diverting crop land. In the past, the House has gone along with a ceiling of $20,000 per crop but it has been nullified in the Senate. This year the House came up with a $55,000 ceiling, but there is strong pressure in the Senate for a lower figure.

As a result of the fight over subsidies some fascinating disclosures were made. For example, Sen. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) received $146,796 for not growing certain crops on his big Eastland Plantation, Inc., in Doddsville, Miss., last year.

He was not the biggest recipient. That honor goes to J. G. Boswell Co. of Corcoran, Calif., which received $4,370,657. Nine of the top ten collectors are from California and the tenth is from Mississippi.

What concerns many observers is that the list of recipients is shooting up sharply. In 1968 those receiving $100,000 or more totaled 261 but the number rose to 353 last year.

The fight for the $20,000 ceiling was bi-partisan with strong labor support. The final House figure of $55,000 was given White House blessing.

Now, however, Business Week magazine has discovered a loophole that could render the entire ceiling worthless. Says BW:

"The powerful farm bloc has taken the teeth out of the measure by writing in a clause that could virtually nullify this limit.

"The loophole would allow a farm—owned either by a corporation or an individual—to subdivide itself into smaller units, with the $55,000 limit imposed on each. Farmers could then deed their land to wives, children or friends to get extra payments; corporations could do the same by setting up dummy subsidiaries."

THE SENATE is already on record for a $20,000 ceiling in its recent agricultural bill appropriations vote. So, there may be some compromise, but if this clause is not eliminated the ceiling is meaningless.

The subsidy program was set up during the New Deal days to help raise depressed farm prices. However, it is being abused. One urban congressman, Rep. Donald A. Fraser (D-Minn.), defends the $20,000 ceiling, though, as "necessary in carrying out our national policy of stabilizing farm production in the interest of both farmer and consumer. They enable the farmer to meet national production goals, thus preventing large and dangerous surpluses."

No one is making predictions on the final Senate bill or the results of an inevitable House-Senate conference.

The individual farmer, as a rule, is still not benefiting from many programs. He receives only 39 cents of the retail food dollar.

Union members have more than a marketplace interest in farm legislation. Farmers spend $38 billion a year for goods and services to produce food and livestock. Another $12 billion is spent for such things as food, clothing, drugs, furniture, appliances, automobiles, etc.

The difficult problem is to achieve a balance of fairness to the farmer and to the consumer and safeguards for the economy.

A REPUBLICAN SWEEP in the November elections would boost chances for scuttling the National Labor Relations Board, as Sen. John Tower (R-Tex.) and others have proposed, AFL-CIO Associate Gen. Counsel Thomas E. Harris, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The weekly interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 9:35 p.m., EDT, on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Montana Labor Girds For Election Campaign

Helena—Delegates to the 14th annual convention of the Montana AFL-CIO voted more money to operate the state labor body's activities program with strong emphasis on state legislative matters.

The convention voted support for incumbent federal officials elected with labor support. They include Sen. Mike Mansfield and Representatives Arnold Olsen and John Melcher, all Democrats who were convention guest speakers.

Delegates heard a report that for the first time in several years, labor has a chance to change the composition of a strongly conservative state Supreme Court. They voted to endorse Justice Gene Daly, an incumbent, and candidates John Schlitz for chief justice and Robert Gabriel for associate justice.

Besides raising the per capita tax on affiliated unions from 20 cents a month to 25 cents, the convention voted unanimously to ask all local unions to contribute up to $1 per member for a special fund to aid state legislative candidates.

Resolutions were approved urging a 1971 convention to revise the state constitution, and supporting lowering of the voting age in the state to 19 if the 18-year-old franchise is not upheld by the Supreme Court. Both measures will be on the state ballot Nov. 3.

Also on the state level, the convention endorsed proposals to permit public employes to bargain collectively, to enact a minimum wage law, improve present industrial accident and unemployment compensation laws, and establish a state labor relations act.

Delegates stood for a moment in tribute to the late Carl McPeak, AFL-CIO staff representative who died July 4. They lauded him in a memorial resolution as a moving force behind merger of AFL and CIO state central bodies in 1956, and as a leader in the national fight against open shop forces.

Pres. Vince Bosh and Sec-Treas. James W. Murry reported that Montana remains among the most highly organized states in the nation, with a record of support for progressive federal and state officials. Both will serve another year of their two-year terms in office.

Other convention speakers included Area COPE Dir. Jack E. McCoy, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. James J. Leary, Executive Dir. Marcella Beatty of AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, Western Area Dir. Margaret Thornburgh of the COPE Women's Activities Dept., State COPE Dir. Ernest Post, Gov. Forrest H. Anderson (D), and other state officials.

Unions Back Program To Ease Reconversion

Technical and scientific skills no longer needed in defense and space programs are a valuable national asset that shouldn't be wasted, the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes declared.

The council expressed concern over growing unemployment among scientists, engineers and technicians in a statement endorsing a new bill that has been introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Robert N. Giaimo (D.-Conn.).

The legislation would provide:

- A $450 million authorization over three years to help small business firms convert from defense to civilian undertakings.
- Sponsorship by the National Science Foundation of a research program on conversion problems and the development of retraining programs for scientists, engineers and technicians.
- Assistance by the Small Business Administration to firms converting to civilian programs.

Council Pres. Jerry Wurf said thousands of highly skilled technical and scientific workers have been left jobless by recent cutbacks. Their skills, he said, "should not be let go to waste but should be directed toward the solution of such major domestic problems as pollution, medical care, housing, crime and transportation."

He said the council, representing 18 unions with 4.5 million members, believes the scientists and technicians who are now jobless can make a major contribution toward meeting the nation's needs.

After a one-day strike, management agreed to recognize the union and start contract negotiations. World Instruction uses Defense Dept. funds to train military and civilian personnel in 40 languages.

Alaska Party Choices Point To Key Races

The comeback of former Gov. Orval Faubus in the Democratic gubernatorial primary in Arkansas captured most of the week's political headlines. But serious election-watchers were following at least as closely the primary returns from sparsely-populated Alaska, which is seen as a major two-party battlefield in the November elections.

Alaska Democrats have high hopes of capturing three top offices now held by Republicans.

A close race is expected for the Senate seat held by Ted Stevens, who was appointed to the office after the death of Democrat Bob Bartlett in 1968.

Stevens will face the Democratic primary winner, Wendell Kay, a popular state legislator from Anchorage. With Republicans out to capture Senate control this year, the Alaska race could be a key one.

Alaska's governor, Keith Miller, also "inherited" his post, having moved up from secretary of state when Gov. Walter J. Hickel resigned to enter the Nixon cabinet. Miller overcame a strong primary challenge from Walter W. Pollock, the state's lone congressman. A windfall of more than $1 billion of oil revenues to the state poses a major political controversy over how the money will be used. Democrats turned to former Gov. William A. Egan to seek to recapture the statehouse.

With Pollock having given up a congressional seat he would have been favored to win, Democrats see a good chance for State Sen. Nick Begich, who was unopposed in the primary. A bitter GOP primary saw Frank Murkowski edge out a John Birch Society official, C. R. Lewis.

In Arkansas, Faubus easily outdistanced all other candidates in an eight-man field but faces a runoff against Dale Bumpers, an attorney making his first political race. Republican Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller won easy renomination, setting the stage for a rematch of their 1964 contest. Faubus won that time, but Rockefeller now has the advantage of being the incumbent.

Oklahoma's primary produced no surprises and brought about the re-election of House Majority Leader Carl Albert, who is in line to be Speaker of the House if the Democrats hold their majority in the 92nd Congress. Albert was an easy primary victor and has no Republican opposition Nov. 3.

In the Oklahoma gubernatorial race, David Hall led in the Democratic primary but will face a runoff with State Sen. Bryce Baggett. The winner will try to unseat Republican Gov. Dewey F. Bartlett.

Research Study Shows:

Economic Squeeze Hits Wage Earner

Seventy percent of the nation's families have been in an economic bind in recent years and it has gotten worse in the past year, a study of government figures shows.

"The average wage and salary earner is being squeezed by the rising living costs," says AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger in the current issue of the Federationist magazine, "and many of them are being pressed further by cuts in working hours and layoffs."

Analyzing U.S. Department of Labor statistics on the earnings of non-supervisory workers in private, non-farm employment, Goldfinger reports that the buying power of this group was lower in May of 1970 than it was in either 1969 or 1965.

"And when you talk about this average wage and salary earner, you're not talking about some small, isolated group—you're talking about three-fourths of the total U.S. work force," Goldfinger says.

These workers, some 48 million in private employment and another 10 million working at various levels of government, represent about 70 percent of the nation's 51 million families, Goldfinger points out.

The average non-supervisory worker's buying power—take-home pay after federal taxes expressed in 1957-59 dollars to allow for inflation—was $77.28 per week in May of 1970, Goldfinger reports. That is down from the $78.53 in 1965 and $78.30 in 1969 for the same group.

Such a worker would have a gross yearly income of $6,173 if he is among the lucky ones who work full-time the year around, the article points out.

But the Dept. of Labor's budget for "a modest standard of living, with amenities but few luxuries" for a four-person family in an urban area is $10,600, Goldfinger notes. And even the "lower budget" with no luxuries is out of his reach, at $6,900.

Roughly the same is true for workers in various other categories, although some have fared better than others in winning wage settlements that begin to take the soaring inflation into account:

- The average factory worker, with gross weekly earnings of $133.67, is left with an annual take-home pay of $6,024 after federal taxes. And many in this group are now experiencing cuts in working hours and extended layoffs.
- The average worker in contract construction grosses $8,166, or $6,939 after taxes if he has three dependents, provided he is able to get 42 weeks of work a year. This group has won some significant wage increases in 1969 and 1970, but the unemployment rate was 10.9 percent in June of this year.
- In mining, which includes workers in oil and natural gas field operations, the average take-home pay is $7,295, after modest gains since 1965 except for a dip in 1968.
- In wholesale and retail trade, where the averages are pulled down by a large number of part-time workers, the yearly earnings are $4,940 after taxes.

Thus Goldfinger points out that very few workers attain the "middle-income" status of $9,400 a year, which the Census Bureau says is the mid-point for before-tax family incomes in the United States. Or at least they cannot attain it without some sort of supplement.

And one of the supplements, overtime pay at premium pay, has declined sharply in the current economic slump, Goldfinger notes. Rising unemployment has also decreased the chances at other supplements such as moonlighting or a job for a spouse or other member of the family.

Letter Carriers Adopt Ratification Procedures

Honolulu—The Letter Carriers prepared to exercise their newly-won right to collective bargaining in future contracts with the U.S. Postal Service by calling for regional and national ratification conferences, as a method of reaching settlements.

Delegates to the union's 47th biennial convention accepted a proposal by NALC Pres. James Rademacher that all future contract talks be followed by regional conferences at which the proposed contract would be explained in detail and rank-and-file members could express their views. These would be followed by a National Ratification Conference where regional views would be brought into consensus.

The convention adopted 120 changes in the NALC constitution to make it conform to federal labor laws.

One of the major amendments is a provision opening membership to all non-supervisory postal workers. This action was taken to fulfill a recommendation by Rademacher that he be given authority to appoint a merger committee, looking forward to amalgamation of all postal unions.

The convention also approved plans to expand the union's education program and to establish an office of communications to permit the headquarters to communicate quickly with all branches.

Although the delegates had earlier endorsed a resolution calling for extension of the government's cost of living allowance to states other than Hawaii and Alaska, many still demanded area wage rates. But the idea of area wage rates for letter carriers was subsequently rejected by the convention.

The convention concluded with the installation of incumbent top officers—Rademacher, Vice Pres. J. Stanly Lewis, and Sec.-Treas. William T. Sullivan.

New Orleans was selected as the site of the 1972 convention.

Teachers Back Goals With Militancy Fund

Pittsburgh—A 25-cent-a-month dues increase to establish the union's first national strike fund was approved overwhelmingly by delegates to the Teachers' 54th national convention.

The dues increase, which will raise monthly per capita payments to $1.50 starting Jan. 1, will put an estimated $615,000 into the special fund during the first year alone.

Money from the fund—to be known officially as the Teacher Militancy Fund—will be used to assist teachers who are fined or jailed for strike activity as well as to continue the union's campaign for legislative guarantees of bargaining and strike rights for public workers.

AFT Pres. David Selden, re-elected to a second two-year term, declared that the dues hike—which he called "the most important issue at the convention" proves that "teachers are ready to redouble their efforts for better schools for the nation's children and for justice for all public employes."

He predicted there would be no letup in teacher strikes this fall despite a trend in some states to jail striking public workers. At the same time, he pointed to the new public-employe bargaining laws in Hawaii and Pennsylvania as indicators of a positive shift in public opinion. Both laws provide a limited right to strike for public workers.

The convention received a message from former Attorney Gen. Ramsey Clark, who accepted the AFT's invitation to head a National Committee for Equal Justice for Public Employes, now in formation.

Clark wired the convention: "The millions of concerned Americans who find employment in essential public services must be granted the protection of the Bill of Rights: to communicate meaningfully with their employers, to dissent, to protest, and, where there is no imminent threat to the public health and safety, to strike. The welfare of these millions of vital Americans and their families and the quality of the invaluable services they render depend on these fundamental rights of a free people."

In the convention balloting, Selden defeated challenger Kenneth Miesen, an AFT national representative, by a vote of 1,567 to 1,462.

William Simons, president of the Washington, D.C. Teachers Union, led the field in the election of 20 vice-presidents, who comprise the union's executive council. Four new members—James Ballard, San Francisco; Barry Noack, Robbinsdale, Minn.; D. James Warnick, Wilmington, Del.; and Henry Bennett, Gary, Ind.—are on the council.

In other convention action:

- A resolution on student rights—spelling out freedom of speech and expression, freedom of dress, and freedom of association—was passed without dissent.
- Delegates voted to submit the question of AFT policy on the war in Southeast Asia to a nationwide membership referendum, to be conducted this fall by mail ballot. Members will vote on a resolution calling for an immediate cease fire in Viet Nam and for withdrawal of all U.S. troops by July 31, 1971.
- E. M. Britton, secretary of the National Union of Teachers of England and Wales, in an address to the delegates, said it was "shocking" and "reprehensible" that teachers would be jailed for striking. Britton said his organization had decided this year to affiliate with the Trades Union Congress, after having been an independent group for many years.
- Delegates urged AFT locals to press for contracts limiting class-size maximums to 20 students and reducing classroom teaching hours to 20.

PRES. JERRY WURF, of the State, County & Municipal Employes tells striking Garrett County road workers they are writing labor history in Western Maryland's Mountain Top region. The strike for recognition of SCME Local 1834 is nearing its fifth month.

County Road Workers Fight for Recognition

Oakland, Md.—A five-month strike here by 132 Garrett County road workers seeking bargaining recognition for Local 1834 of the State, County & Municipal Employes is an echo from the past labor history of the nearby coal fields of West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Many of the men, in fact, are former miners who had to find other jobs when the mines gave out. Some have been railroaders and some have worked road gangs in other parts of the country. All of them are strangers to luxury.

SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf recently visited the picket lines and gave Local 1834 Pres. Wellington Jack Sowers a $5,000 check for the strike fund. He also pledged an additional $1,000 a week for the duration of the strike.

"We're going to see this thing through if you will," said Wurf. "Everywhere our folks have stood up and been willing to sacrifice, we've won.

"And this strike is not just a question of a few cents. It's a matter of human dignity."

Wurf noted that the Garrett road workers are located "in a part of the country where a lot of labor history has been written."

The trouble all started in this westernmost and largest of Maryland's 23 counties when the men decided to merge their Garrett County Road Employes Association into a bona fide AFL-CIO union.

They voted to affiliate with SCME last December, but two of the three county commissioners refused to recognize the union even though they had dealt with the association. As members of the association, Garrett road workers had collective bargaining, a contract and even a brief strike.

Their staunchest opponent, Commissioner John Ross Sines makes no secret of his anti-union views.

"Basically, this whole Mountain Top is anti-union," he told a reporter.

Sines and Commissioner Hubert A. Friend voted to fire the men shortly after the strike began April 7. Sines, also a member of the county welfare board, then attemped to prevent the strikers from obtaining food stamps.

SCME Vice Pres. Ernie Crofoot of Baltimore made an interesting discovery about the food stamps: "We found that many of them were eligible for food stamps even when they were working because their wages are so low."

The average hourly wage is $1.97, and most men make less. Even at that, they are grimly determined to hold on to what they have.

"They are not going to take my job away," said 58-year-old Clarence Bowmer when the commissioners made a futile attempt to break the strike. Bowmer has worked for the road department 28 years and takes home $122 every two weeks.

New Contract Lifts Ceiling On Pilots' Pay

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots won new contract terms that will give 6,500 captains of United Air Lines planes increased salary maximums ranging from $3,130 to $4,753 a month, and a reduction in flying hours.

The union's master executive council ratified a working agreement that will be put into writing and sent to ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby before becoming effective. The agreement was reached after nine months of negotiations. The Pilots were preparing to circulate a strike ballot when settlement was achieved.

The two-year contract has two new features—a provision that as of Nov. 1, 1971, pilots on duty for 60 minutes will be paid for 64 minutes; and a reduction in allowable hours worked per month from 85 to 80 as of next Nov. 1, and to 75 a year later.

Negotiated for the first time was a wage rate for pilots of the new 747 jumbo jet planes. Their maximum salary will be $4,753 a month. Other maximums will be raised as follows: pilots of DC-8 four-engine jets, from $3,386 to $3,793; three-engine Boeing 727 jets, from $3,269 to $3,348; 737 Boeing twin-engine jets, from $2,790 to $3,130.

Also in the new pact is an improved schedule of company contributions to the pilots' pension plan and revisions in the insurance plan. Capt. William E. Arsenault, spokesman for ALPA members on United, said the agreement has substantial improvements in other areas also.

Unions to Appeal NLRB Findings On Coordinated Copper Bargaining

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers and other unions will ask the Court of Appeals to set aside a National Labor Relations Board ruling that they tried to force company-wide bargaining on the Phelps Dodge Corp. in the 1967-68 copper strike.

"We will appeal," said USWA Counsel Elliot Bredhoff. "We dispute the board's finding."

The NLRB in a 3-1 decision upheld a trial examiner's conclusion that a joint negotiating committee of 34 unions violated the Taft-Hartley law by striking to force Phelps Dodge to engage in "unlawful company-wide bargaining."

Nearly 60,000 workers in unions represented by the National Non-Ferrous Coordinating Committee began walking out July 15, 1967, in a strike for long-sought improvements in contracts with eight major firms in the non-ferrous metals industry. The final settlement was reached nearly a year later.

In the course of the dispute management filed charges that the unions had illegally insisted to the point of impasse on company-wide bargaining. The NLRB issued complaints and held hearings involving two companies—Kennecott Copper Corp. and Phelps Dodge.

At Kennecott, an examiner's finding and a board order to stop making such demands were not contested by the unions because of a legal technicality. The unions decided instead to wait for a board decision in the Phelps Dodge dispute.

NLRB members John H. Fanning, Frank W. McCulloch and Howard Jenkins, Jr., signed an order directing the unions to stop demanding that bargaining at any unit of Phelps Dodge be expanded to cover other bargaining units of the same firm. Member Gerald A. Brown disagreed with the majority, and Chairman Edward B. Miller did not participate in the decision.

It is well-established, the majority said, "that the integrity of a bargaining unit, whether established by certification or by voluntary agreement, cannot . . . be unilaterally attacked. The conduct of negotiations on a basis broader than the established bargaining unit is nonmandatory, and the unions' insistence that the charging party engage in such bargaining" violated the law.

Brown in his dissent pointed out that while the unions did submit proposals for a single master agreement to cover all Phelps Dodge locations, the negotiations "continued along historical lines" when the corporation rejected the requests.

What the unions wanted, said Brown, was common expiration dates for all agreements with the corporation, a limited no-strike clause, and a "most favored nations" clause permitting adoption of any more favorable provision won on company properties elsewhere.

Brown wrote: "To conclude that any of these demands . . . are equatable to a demand for a single master contract applicable to all locations is a non sequitur for which the majority opinion supplies no rationale . . . I would dismiss the complaint in its entirety."

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. coordinated the 1967 bargaining preparations and the ensuing strike. The union bodies named in the NLRB proceeding are the AFL-CIO Joint Negotiating Committee for Phelps Dodge, the Steelworkers and four local unions, four lodges of Machinists, two Operating Engineers' locals, three locals of the Boilermakers, the Firemen & Enginemen, the Railroad Trainmen, a Teamsters' Local, two Carpenters' locals, two Plumbers' locals, a Chemical Workers' local, the Railway Carmen, the Morenci, Ariz., and Ajo, Ariz., Metal Trades Councils; the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and five of its locals, a local of the Painters and a Bricklayers' local.

Transport Workers Join Rail Congress

Cleveland—The Transport Workers joined the Congress of Railway Unions which now represents six AFL-CIO affiliates.

Besides the TWU, the congress includes the Maintenance of Way Employes, Railway & Airline Clerks, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, Seafarers and the United Transportation Union.

And the congressional objective of uniform interpretation of a single national labor law, Bredhoff suggested, "would be completely frustrated by empowering each of more than 400 district judges to render his own conclusion as to what is or is not an unfair labor practice."

Other sections of the Tower bill would give an advantage to employers and deprive workers of the help of the NLRB's general counsel staff, which would be abolished, Bredhoff noted.

Senate Cuts Funds As Rebuke to ILO

The Senate has voted overwhelmingly to hold up funds for the International Labor Organization in the latest expression of Congressional displeasure at the direction in which the ILO appears to be heading.

Both union and employer members of the U.S. delegation have complained that the ILO's 50-year tradition of seeking to improve working conditions and uphold human rights is being undermined by Communist use of ILO conferences as a propaganda forum to attack the United States. The appointment of a Soviet representative as an assistant director-general of the ILO was seen as a repudiation of the organization's basic principles.

The Senate Appropriations Committee, in an action strongly supported by its House counterpart, recommended that a $3.7 million payment to the ILO for the current six-month period be deleted from the State Dept. budget.

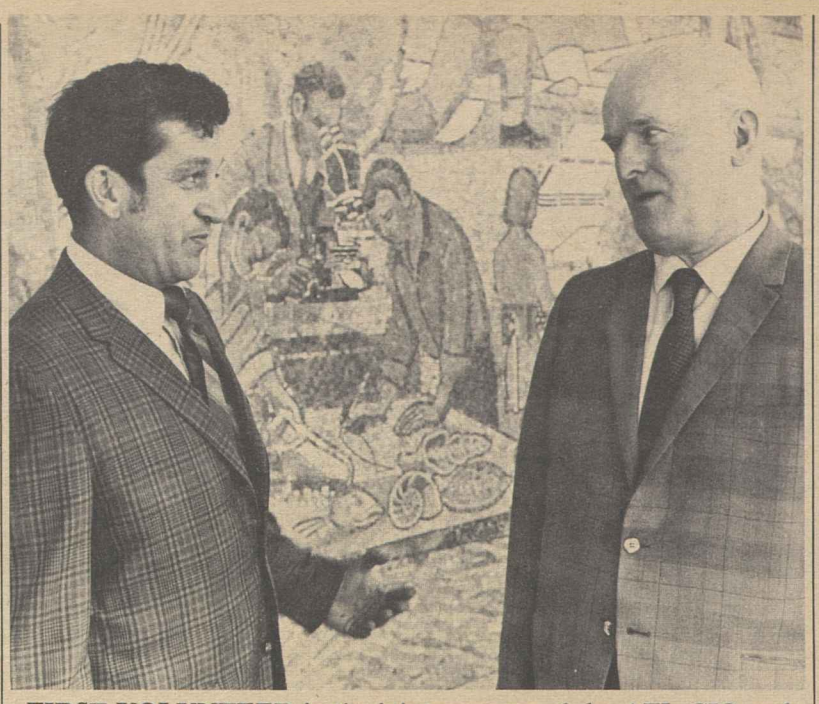
When the appropriations bill reached the Senate floor, Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) sought to preserve the full appropriation. He argued that the payment is an international obligation that should be met and said it would look to the world as though the United States "is afraid to face criticism."

From both Democratic and Republican sides of the aisle, senators replied that it didn't make sense for the United States to be the chief financial prop of the ILO if the organization abandons the principles for which it was founded. The withholding of half a year's payment, they noted. was not a withdrawal from the ILO but as Sen. Spessard L. Holland (D-Fla.) put it, "a warning as to how this country feels."



The Appropriations Committee's cutback of ILO funds was upheld, 49-28.

Voting to cut off the funds for the six-month assessment were 28 Democrats and 21 Republicans; opposed were 12 Democrats and 10 Republicans.

While government officials who had participated in ILO conferences voiced many of the criticisms of the ILO expressed by labor and management at a House hearing on July 31, the State Dept. has opposed a cutoff of funds and contended that the U.S. payment represents "an international legal duty."

American labor's criticism of the ILO was expressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a special meeting of a House Appropriations subcommittee and by the federation's Executive Council in early August which strongly protested the ILO's "head-in-the-sands approach to Communist violations of human rights."

The House had routinely approved the full ILO appropriation before the new ILO director-general had named a Soviet deputy over U.S. protests so the issue of funding will be considered by a House-Senate conference committee. The conference agreement on the money bill will then be submitted to the House and Senate for a vote on final passage.

FIRST VOLUNTEER in the joint program of the AFL-CIO and the Peace Corps to recruit skilled union craftsmen for service on Peace Corps projects around the free world is Ronald J. Temsik, left, of Boulder, Colo., shown with Assistant Sec.-Treas. Owen Kelly of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters. Temsik is a journeyman member of Plumbers Local 575. He and his wife Edythe will take three months of language and culture training at the University of Kentucky before leaving for Venezuela next January.

Minority Jobs Plan Approved In Indianapolis

Indianapolis — Building trades unions, employers and representatives of the minority community have developed an "Indianapolis Plan" aimed at increasing employment of Negroes and other minority groups in construction crafts.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson praised the agreement and said the department will support the program with federal manpower training funds.

He said $453,000 has been allocated for recruiting, evaluating, training and placing 500 minority trainees over an 18-month period. Of these, 420 will go into journeyman training at various levels of experience and 80 into apprenticeships.

Eighteen crafts are listed in the agreement, which will be administered by a committee representing all of the parties to the program.

Similar plans have been set up in a number of other cities and Hodgson reiterated that where local agreements are not reached, "the department will continue to impose solutions such as those initiated in Philadelphia and Washington, D.C."

5-Year Lag Persists In Real Wage Levels

out a continued rise in the industrial commodities index.

Despite Administration optimism about the slowing of the rate of price increases, the July rise in living costs meant that most workers were still on an economic treadmill which left them less able to meet their family expenses than they were during the same month last year, or the year before, or in July of 1967, or 1966, of 1965.

In effect, the inflationary spiral —still not ended—has for the average rank-and-file worker more than wiped out all wage gains of the past five years.

The take-home pay of the average worker with three dependents—the amount left over after deductions of social security and federal income taxes—rose slightly in July to $105.88.

This was 80 cents higher than the figure for June—the result of an average two-tenths of an hour increase in the workweek and a 1-cent rise in hourly earnings. After adjustment for price increases, gross weekly earnings were up one-half of 1 percent over the month—but still 1.3 percent below a year ago.

In terms of constant dollars—based on the purchasing power of the dollar in the 1957-59 period—the average worker with three dependents had a spendable income of $78.03 a week. And while this was 31 cents a week more buying power than in June, it was 74 cents less buying power than in July of 1969.

And based on 1957-59 dollars, the worker with three dependents had 85 cents a week less to spend than during the same month of 1965 and $1.03 less than in July of 1968.

Approximately 70,000 workers will receive cost-of-living wage increases based on the consumer price index for July. But another 22,500 workers whose pay is adjusted to reflect higher living costs will not receive increases because they have already reached the maximum stipulated in their contracts as the result of earlier cost-of-living adjustments.

The Labor Dept. said some 16,700 workers will get three-cent hourly increases based on the rise in the national index since April, including 7,000 workers in the automobile and aircraft parts manufacturing industries. Another 14,300 workers, mainly in the machinery industry, will receive quarterly increases of 5 cents an hour. More than 17,000 other workers will receive hourly raises of between 1 and 9 cents based on changes in the national index.

Three large groups of transit workers will receive increases linked to the cost-of-living in the cities where they work—8 cents an hour for 11,000 employes of the Chicago Transit Authority based on changes since April, and quarterly increases of 6 cents for 4,500 workers tied to the Boston index and 5 cents for 2,200 workers linked to the Pittsburgh index.

Some 4,500 printers in New York City will receive 3.57 percent more in daily wages because of the 12-month rise in the city's price index.

On the national index, food prices during July advanced only a little more than seasonally. Clothing prices dropped slightly, but the cost of services continued to rise, paced by a sharp seven-tenths of 1 percent increase in medical care prices.

The cost of public transportation continued its steep climb, averaging 1.8 percent more than in June and 14.2 percent above a year ago.

Shoe Workers Win Fight for Trade Law Aid

August of 1968 to August of 1969. Cash readjustment benefits are paid for up to 52 weeks of unemployment following the job loss. However, workers over the age of 60 when separated from their jobs are entitled to an additional 13 weeks of benefits and workers taking government-approved training courses may receive up to 26 weeks additional benefits if necessary to complete their courses.

Maximum cash benefits may not exceed 65 percent of the national average wage in manufacturing.

To be eligible, the Labor Dept. said, a worker must have been employed at one of the five Massachusetts plants for six months out of the year prior to layoff. and must have been gainfully employed for at least half of the previous three years.

Until last December, the Tariff Commission had routinely turned down all requests for adjustment assistance, bringing strong protests from labor that the law's intent was being nullified.

The latest certifications brought to 3,800 the number of workers declared eligible for benefits. They mark the first approval of adjustment aid for workers in plants making shoes other than those that are rubber-soled.

Having asserted his authority to break a tie in the Tariff Commission, Pres. Nixon now has before him five other requests for adjustment aid in which the commission was evenly split.

Three involve rubber footwear plants, one covers electrical components, and one involves soft trim for automobile interiors.

Farm Workers' Strike in Salinas Met by Court Injunctions, Assaults

In Salinas, Monterey County Superior Court Judge Stanley Lawson issued temporary restraining orders sought by 27 growers prohibiting picketing or any incitement to strike. Antle Inc., one of the 27, also filed a $550,000 suit for damages allegedly caused by the picketing.

The beating of Cohen and a union organizer occurred Aug. 25 when they went to the A. C. Hanson ranch south of Salinas in answer to a call from farmhands working in a broccoli field. A newsman who was with them gave this eye-witness account:

"About a mile inside the ranch, Cohen and two union organizers were met by Albert Hanson, the ranch owner, who was backed by about 15 or 20 men in eight pickup trucks.

"Cohen identified himself to Hanson, who refused to say who he was. Cohen then asked where the workers were, and Hanson said they had left. They exchanged a few more words, and when Hanson ordered Cohen to leave, the union people started to walk back to the car they had left down the road.

"As they started walking, the ranch owner cried 'All right, boys, go get him.' One grabbed Cohen around the neck as he started to turn, and shoved him down the road. The other man, who was wearing a black glove, hit him a roundhouse blow and knocked him down."

The reporter said one of the two then jumped on Venustiano Olguin, Jr., who was with Cohen, kicked him and beat him until the union party broke for their auto. The reporter's camera was knocked out of his hand, kicked into the weeds and never recovered, he said.

Another witness, Kathy Kozak, 19, also an organizer for the Farm Workers, was not harmed. UFWOC officials said any legal action against Cohen's assailants will be postponed until he recovers.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, recovering from the effects of a recent fast to emphasize the nonviolent nature of his organizing attempts, is expected to come to the strike area—a 150-mile stretch of farmland and towns—to lead his picketing members.

UFWOC recently scored a major breakthrough, climaxing a five-year effort, by signing contracts with all but a small percentage of California table grape growers. It has now extended its organizing and bargaining efforts on behalf of field hands working on other crops.

ASPCA Staff Picks State-County Local

New York—Employes of the animal hospitals, offices and shelters of the American Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals voted to switch from "independent" union status to affiliation with an AFL-CIO union. Labor Day dinner at the White House on Sept. 7 for about 170 guests—union leaders and their wives. Another 3,000 guests will gather on the White House grounds after the dinner for a torchlight military tattoo featuring Army ceremonial units.

In his Labor Day statement, the President put special stress on the tradition of pride in the quality of work.

"How much we produce is one important question, of course," Nixon noted. "But we must also ask —with greater force than we have sometimes done in the past—how well we produce, how efficiently and skillfully we provide the goods and services of our economy, how effective and attractive and reliable are the results of our work, how much pride and satisfaction those results provide to the worker."

End of Boycott Climaxes Grape Victory

Action Caps 5-Year Fight In Vineyards

San Francisco — The historic boycott of table grapes that planted unionism in California's vast vineyards is over.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany formally announced its end to the California Labor Federation at its biennial convention here.

Unionization in the table grapes area, Meany told the delegates, has "moved to the point where we can see the real end of this road." A close watch will have to be kept on the marketing of union table grapes, he said, but added:

"As of Sept. 1, the AFL-CIO boycott is officially declared to be off."

Meany also sent a letter to the presidents of all unions and AFL-CIO state and city central bodies announcing the lifting of the boycott and expressing thanks for the outpouring of support that made the grape victory possible. (Excerpts, Page 2)

Even as Meany capsuled the five-year struggle of the United Farm Workers to win union contracts, almost before the ink on the scores of contracts with grape growers could dry, the farm workers and their union were swept up in still another battle for survival in California's billion-dollar agricultural industry.

Cesar Chavez, the small and gentle-voiced director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, told the state convention next day how some 6,000 farm workers in the rich Salinas and Santa Maria Valleys were embroiled in still another bitter struggle for their union.

With the end of the grape strike and boycott near, Chavez said. UFWOC had called together its members from many sections of the state's fertile fields and told them the time had come to organize. (Story, this page.)

The growers ignored UFWOC's request for representation elections. And soon after, a rally—attended by 90 percent of the valleys' workers, Chavez said—voted to strike. Then they heard that the growers had signed a contract with the Teamsters.

Chavez protested sharply against the growers' efforts "to use another union to try to stop the legitimate aspirations of our members in our union."

"I hope that the leadership of the Teamsters union will come to realize that the workers do not want that union," he said.

"The workers, almost to the last

Declares Worker Will 'Raise Voice'

America's workers will "seek and win" economic justice and "a bigger share of the pie" at the collective bargaining table, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a Labor Day message.

Meany charged that "ill-conceived" Administration policies have led to "suffering for millions of Americans" through continued inflation coupled with a recession.

The result, he said, has been higher prices, layoffs or shortened pay checks, exorbitant interest "and for many an end to the dream of a family home or education for their children."

The average worker has been "slipping backward" on the economic ladder, Meany stressed.

He is "a long way short of the affluence we have been hearing about. A long way short of what television sponsors represent the American standard of living to be. A long way short of what the government economists say is absolutely needed to live decently."

And, Meany added, the American worker is "angry."

"So it should come as no surprise that he intends to raise his voice at the bargaining table."

That's been "the traditional forum for progress for workers," Meany declared. "It has worked for us—and for America—in the past. And it will work again."

In other statements, leaders of the trade union movement sought to make the 76th national observance of labor's holiday a time of rededication to building a better America.

Bill Falls 'Far Short':

Changes Called Vital To Family Aid Goals

Amendments to the House-passed family assistance bill are essential to accomplish the legislation's "well-intentioned goals," the AFL-CIO told the Senate Finance Committee.

Federation witnesses described the present welfare system as "irrational" and strongly endorsed the effort "to bring about a fair, humane welfare program with minimum national standards of administration and payment levels."

But, the AFL-CIO said, both the House bill and Administration proposals for change "fall far short."

Labor doesn't expect immediate perfection "in a bold, new, innovative social program," the AFL-CIO testified. "But neither will we accept subjecting the disadvantaged to cruel exploitation as the price for launching the new program."

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Clinton M. Fair presented the federation's testimony on behalf of Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. With him at the witness table was Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Two major improvements in the House-passed bill are necessary for the AFL-CIO to support the measure, Fair told the committee.

Both are aimed at protecting welfare recipients from exploitation or "slave labor" conditions.

The federation termed it essential to restore language requiring that compulsory assignments to jobs or training take into consideration the degree of risk to health and safety, suitability of the individual for the job, physical fitness for the work, prior training, length of unemployment and distance from work.

This protective language was in the original bill sent to the House floor by its Ways and Means Committee. But the House, in a move little noted at the time, deleted the specifics and substituted general language lacking effective protection.

Also essential, the AFL-CIO told the Senate committee, is an assurance that persons assigned to Millions of on-the-job injuries go unreported each year because of inadequate statistics gathering, according to an independent research study made for the Labor Dept.

For every job injury that is counted in the current estimates of some 2.5 million on-the-job accidents a year, there may be as many as 10 that are not reported.

Farm Workers Score Salinas Breakthrough

Salinas, Calif.—A massive strike in California's Salinas and Santa Maria Valleys has brought the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers two dramatic victories on the heels of its triumph in the grape strike.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez announced Aug. 30 agreement on what he termed "the best contract we've ever negotiated." It was signed with Interharvest, a subsidiary of the United Fruit Co.

Interharvest farms 22,000 acres of produce in California and Arizona, and is the biggest shipper of lettuce in the Salinas Valley. It employes about 1,000 workers, most of whom will be covered by the new UFWOC contract.

On Sept. 1, two associations of strawberry growers signed recognition agreements with the UFWOC, covering more than 2,000 workers. The two groups, Naturipe and the Watsonville Strawberry Cooperative, agreed to immediate negotiations with all economic benefits retroactive to the date of the recognition agreement.

The union has called off the strike against these growers and work resumed in the fields.

The Interharvest contract came as other growers in the area were insisting on sticking to the five-year contracts quietly signed with the

NLRB Rejects Remedy Of Backpay for Stalling

With its new chairman casting the deciding vote, a 3-2 majority of the National Labor Relations Board "reluctantly" concluded that it couldn't compel an employer to reimburse workers for pay raises they lost because of his illegal refusal to bargain with their union.

All five board members agreed with a trial examiner's finding that the Ex-Cell-O Corp. was guilty of unfair labor practices in the case and that the workers at its Elwood, Ind., plant had suffered financially as a result.

The Auto Workers had won a representation election in the fall of 1964 and the NLRB soon after rejected a company complaint about the election. But the firm refused to meet with the union after it was certified as the legal bargaining agent of the workers.

The trail examiner, Owsley Vose, proposed a remedy designed to "take the profit out of refusing to bargain" by requiring the company to compensate employes for the cash benefits which it is "reasonable to conclude" the man, have made a commitment that they want their own union. . . . They want to be part of the AFL-CIO. They want to be free. They want to make their own determination as to which union is going to represent them."

But the fight is not with other unions, Chavez insisted. The fight is with the employers, he said, "and that is where we are going to keep the fight."

"We need your help," Chavez told the delegates, "we are in need of food . . . right away."

UFWOC Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong spelled out the need for help. The convention responded with an immedate contribution of $10,000 and favorable consideration for the proposal of a long-range strike fund.

In the background of the struggle in the lettuce fields of Salinas was a new confidence, born from the boycott of table grapes—"a success," Meany called it.

Meany credited that success to the support of "this state AFL-CIO federation, the support of central labor bodies all over the country, local unions and public officials at the state and local level, support from enlightened religious and private groups through the country."

Itliong ticked off the results of that "success:" 15,000 new members in the union, a health and welfare program for the first time ever for the farm worker, an economic development fund to help train and develop farm workers.

Chavez had noted, "they are getting more money and they are extremely happy. And they want you to know that."

Msgr. George C. Higgins of the U.S. Catholic Conference and a member of the bishops' committee that mediated the grape settlements, gave unstinting credit for the outcome to "the brave, self-sacrificing, courageous" farm workers themselves.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher underscored the courage of Chavez and Itliong four years ago in bringing together their separate forces—Spanish and Filipino—to defeat, once and for all, the growers' traditional device of "divide and conquer."

As a keynote to the convention's five days of deliberations, Meany sketched the "overall picture which we see today and the part that labor should and will play in the difficult days ahead."

He touched on problems of rising unemployment and climbing prices, of credit restrictions that hurt only the consumer and the small businessman, and of consumers' problems themselves, on the difficulty of wiping out discrimination, the threat of the environment, the dissatisfaction of youth.

He promised that labor would play its traditional role in meeting these challenges exercising the right to strike, if necessary, or boycott. And "we are going to use the political rights that we have as American citizens."

"The labor movement today is in a good position to meet the challenges of tomorrow. . . . We were never stronger, never more ready to play our part. . . ."

Health Care Bill Introduced By 15 Senators

A labor-backed drive for national health insurance picked up significant support in Congress as 15 senators joined in introducing a bill intended to make medical services available to all Americans, regardless of age or income.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), speaking for the 12 Democratic and three Republican sponsors, told the Senate that private insurance has financed only a small part of the nation's health needs.

Private insurance commonly pays for "acute care, not preventive care," Kennedy noted. "It gives partial benefits, not comprehensive benefits. It fails to control costs. It fails to control quality. It ignores the poor and the medically indigent."

The Senate bill was based on recmemendations of a prestigious Committee of 100 for National Health Insurance, initially headed by the late Walter P. Reuther and then by his successor as president of the Auto Workers, Leonard Woodcock.

It is similar in concept to the bill introduced in the House by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and numerous co-sponsors, which has been endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

Both AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Woodcock have expressed confidence that differences between the two versions can be worked out without difficulty.

The Senate measure would initially cover about three-fourths of all medical expenses, with additional services to be added later.

It would be financed through a Health Security Trust Fund, which would get about 40 percent of its money from general government revenues. A 3.5 percent payroll tax paid by employers would add another 35 percent, with the remaining 25 percent coming from a 2.1 percent tax on individual incomes up to $15,000 a year.

No congressional action is expected this year. But, as was the case with Medicare, the introduction of the bills and the public interest aroused point to the emergence of national health insurance as a major congressional and political issue.

Farm Workers Score Salinas Breakthrough

Teamsters on July 27—10 days after the UFWOC had informed the growers of its majority status and demanded recognition.

By contrast, the UFWOC Interharvest contract is for two years, with wage increases averaging between 25 and 35 percent.

In the UFWOC contract, the new minimum wage is $2.10 an hour—compared with $1.85 in the Teamster contract. And next year, the UFWOC minimum goes to $2.15, while the Teamster minimum would have moved up to $1.96 after four years.

Likewise, the piece rate for ground packs of unwrapped lettuce was boosted by the UFWOC from the 31.5 cents which has been the rate since 1965 to 40.5 cents. The Teamsters negotiated a 36-cent rate.

Working field foremen are under the new union contract, with a new wage base of $3.10 an hour. The contract also provides all the basic protections that were written into the grape contracts.

Although the Teamsters in mid-August signed an agreement to withdraw from the contracts and cede jurisdiction of field workers to the UFWOC, there was evidence that some Teamsters were aiding employers in resisting the UFWOC.

Pickets identifying themselves only as "Citizens Against United," a reference to the parent United Fruit Co., showed up waving American flags to picket the cooling sheds and truck yards the morning after the UFWOC contract was announced.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher reported from the scene that "there were definitely Teamsters on the picket line." Teamsters drivers refused to cross the lines and the company's operations were halted until a restraining order was issued against the "citizens." Kircher called on leaders of the Teamsters to honor the spirit of their agreement with the Farm Workers.

The UFWOC reported that some of the "citizen" pickets were passing out John Birch Society leaflets attacking the United Farm Workers.

As the strike continued against other growers, the King City Chamber of Commerce opened a recruiting office for strikebreakers. And one company filed a $5 million damage suit against Interharvest for signing with the UFWOC.

The Farm Workers have set up strike kitchens and are feeding more than 4,000 strikers each day. AFL-CIO unions in the area are giving strong support to the strike and a Meat Cutters local which represents a group of packing shed workers refused to cross picket lines set up by the UFWOC.

Farm Workers Attorney Jerry Cohen, who was seriously beaten in an assault ordered by a ranch owner on union organizers, has been released from a San Jose hospital and will be able to return to work, the UFWOC reported. He had been hospitalized with a brain concussion.

Furriers Bar Work on Rare Animal Pelts

New York—Union fur workers here won the thanks and praise of a prestigious international conservation organization for a decision to "no longer cut, fashion or fabricate skins" of "endangered species" of spotted animals.

The action was taken by the Furriers Joint Council, an affiliate of the Meat Cutters, after discussions with the World Wildlife Fund.

Since about 95 percent of all furs in the United States are manufactured in New York, the decision will mean virtual elimination of the use of pelts from leopards, cheetahs, ocelots and jaguars.

At a luncheon announcing the agreement, the wildlife fund presented a scroll of appreciation to George Stofsky, manager of the Furriers Joint Council, for the union's cooperation in safeguarding species threatened with extinction. The council and its parent union have supported federal legislation barring imports of rare skins. The new agreement goes beyond existing law.

J. P. Tahney Dies, Rail Union Chief

Chicago—J. P. Tahney, president of the Railway Supervisors since the union was founded in 1934, died of a heart attack at his office here at the age of 73.

Funeral services were held Aug. 29, with his son, the Rev. Shane D. Tahney, officiating at a requiem mass. Officers of the union served as pallbearers. He is also survived by his wife, Irene, a daughter, seven grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland lauded Tahney as "a good friend and a true trade unionist" whose years of leadership leave a "monument" to his memory.

Tahney's successor will be chosen at the union's convention, which opens Sept. 10 in Chicago.

Unions, Central Bodies Advised Boycott is Ended

Excerpts from a letter by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to affiliated unions, state and city central labor bodies:

It gives me great pleasure to inform you that the members of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, have successfully concluded their historic struggle for union recognition in the California grape industry.

Therefore the grape boycott is officially ended.

It is quite clear that the consumer boycott of grapes in which millions of American trade unionists joined together, played a major role in winning that victory.

Dir. Cesar Chavez and the UFWOC Executive Board have asked me to convey the deep gratitude of their members for the financial contributions and the physical support they have received from individual volunteers, AFL-CIO affiliates and their locals and state and central labor bodies—from all who picketed supermarkets, hand-billed shopping centers and personally urged store managers to stop selling table grapes.

The five-year struggle of the farm workers, against powerful opposition unrestrained by federal or state labor laws, has been an historic demonstration of faith, courage and determination.

Even so, that struggle could not have succeeded without the steadfast support of a united labor movement. We have demonstrated, once again, the value of the boycott weapon in strike situations. It is not a weapon we will ever use lightly, but this experience and the experience earlier this year in the GE boycott prove that American consumers will refuse to purchase articles made under substandard or strike-breaking conditions. So we will use the boycott weapon when it becomes necessary in order to win justice for workers.

All of those who shared in the farm workers' struggle have a full share in the victory, as well. Because of their efforts, the trade union movement is stronger than before.

To Protect Gains:

Step Up Organizing, Bricklayers Urged

The Bricklayers began laying the foundations at their 71st convention for expanded programs in organizing, stronger locals, increased work opportunities and more apprentices.

Pres. Thomas F. Murphy spelled out the need for a step-up in organizing, noting that while 26,000 new members were signed up in the past two years, the union had a net gain of about 6,000 because of other membership losses.

Murphy emphasized efforts to organize the non-union bricklayers in the trade, whose numbers are equal those in union ranks.

"If we are to maintain a strong bargaining position with the employers, we must strengthen and expand our organizing activities," he told the 700 delegates in his convention report.

Murphy also stressed that members must do their part as voters to maintain the political atmosphere in which unions can continue to organize workers. He warned that if labor's foes take over Congress, the ground rules for organizing would become increasingly more difficult.

Despite the current slowdown in construction, Murphy warned that a program for increasing the number of apprentices should not be side-tracked. He noted that the National Bricklaying Joint Apprenticeship Committee has adopted a broad plan to boost the current number of apprentices from 9,000 to 16,000.

Unless the Bricklayers meet the demand for craftsmen when the needs arise, "we will find that the demand will go to some other trade," Murphy said.

Expanded work opportunities will result from the wider use of brick and masonry products in construction, Murphy told the convention.

The union recently signed an agreement with the Mason Contractors Association of America for a trust fund to promote the industry and use of the products. Murphy urged that future contracts negotiated by Bricklayers include provisions for the promotional fund which would be financed by employers contributing 1 cent an hour per member.

He announced that Bricklayers from the Detroit metropolitan area have already made a check available for the trust fund for $10,000.

The formula for bringing increased strength to the union is based on the merger of locals and the formation of area executive committees. Murphy told the delegates that it would be illogical to continue the outmoded system of small locals covering small areas.

"The very essence of unionism is joining together for greater strength," he declared, and "in combinations of unions that strength becomes even greater."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates that the American trade union movement and the American people "face a number of knotty problems." He cited the Administration's economic policies, pollution, consumer protection, labor laws, and others.

"The things that concern the American people are definitely the concern of the American trade union movement—and this has been true through all the history of American labor," Meany observed.

History further shows, he said, that labor has never advocated anything or any program that would have an adverse effect on the people as a whole.

"It could be said that when we forced employers to pay decent wages, it caused them some anguish," he said. But only temporarily, he added, because it was soon proven that higher wages and a higher standard of living and the expanded market that resulted were beneficial to industry and to the country.

Meany said the labor movement was never in better shape to lead the American people to more progress.

The Bricklayers honored architect Ulrich Franzen with the union's first "Thomas Jefferson Award for Architecture." The award carries a $5,000 prize, which Franzen promptly passed on to the A. Philip Randolph Institute to finance Apprentice-Outreach programs.

The institute's executive director, Bayard Rustin, was at the convention to accept the prize money. Rustin told the convention that the trade union movement is the only organization involved in social problems that has the means to solve many of the nation's ills. The reason, he said, is that labor is the only organized group pressing for full employment.

AWARD FOR ARCHITECTURE and a prize of $5,000 was presented to architect Ulrich Franzen, right, by Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers at the union's 71st convention in Washington. Franzen kept the award, but turned over the prize money to Dir. Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute for use in the Outreach training program. The union will make the "Thomas Jefferson Award for Architecture" available biennially.

SKILLS LEVELS in the building and constructions trades must be maintained in the age-old tradition of craftsmanship on the job, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells delegates to the Carpenters convention in San Francisco.

Meany Urges Unions to Maintain High Standards of Craftsmanship

By John R. Oravec

San Francisco—Trade unions must continue to maintain high standards for their membership despite outside pressures to lower skill levels, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 2,400 delegates to the 31st convention of the Carpenters.

Even in the presence of the nation's unresolved racial problems, unions have the responsibility to uphold the qualities of craftsmanship, Meany stressed.

"In the field of civil rights we have made great progress, but we still have a long way to go," he observed, adding that labor will follow through in this activity "but we are going to do it with justice for all."

"If you issue a union card to a fellow who is not qualified you are defrauding him," Meany said. "Unless he is qualified he can't make a living and the union card represents nothing to him."

"I am sure the Carpenters," he stated, "are going to stick to the age-old idea that we want a full-fledged mechanic able to take his place alongside all of our other mechanics."

Meany went on to deplore a suggestion made a year ago by Sec. of Housing & Urban Development George Romney that partially-trained workers be used in the housing industry.

This would be no solution to the minority employment problem, Meany said, noting that leaders in the civil rights movement want black apprentices to be "trained to the fullest extent, the same as any other person who is now a member of the union."

Delegates later rejected a proposal to amend the union's constitution that would have had shortened the apprenticeship program from four years to three.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson praised the Carpenters for their performance in minority training programs. He pointed out that at a recent graduation ceremony he attended in Washington, one of five graduate apprentices were from the minorities.

Although Pres. M. A. Hutcheson was re-elected to another four-year term earlier in the convention, a resolution was adopted that establishes the office of president emeritus "to retain to the greatest extent possible the services of Brother Hutcheson." The action came after about 1,500 delegates signed a petition calling for the new office.

Hutcheson said that he currently has no intention of retiring.

All officers were re-elected by acclamation and except for the third district seat, all board members were also returned to office. William Konyha of Cleveland, president of the Ohio state council of Carpenters, defeated incumbent Cecil Shuey in that contest.

Convening as the United Farm Workers Organizing committee launched its strike against the California lettuce growers for union contracts, the delegates responded to an appeal form the floor for support of the strikers by voting unanimously to contribute $10,000 to the UFWOC strike fund. Another $2,000 was collected in the lobby of the convention hall through personal donations from the delegates.

In an emotion-packed discussion, the convention weighed the future status of job superintendents holding office in the union's locals and districts.

The delegates split evenly in a voice vote for an amendment to the constitution that would have barred the superintendents from holding office. The deadlock was resolved by referring the amendment back to the executive board.

Among key resolutions adopted by the convention, the Carpenters urged:

- Early passage by Congress of a national health insurance program, and stepped-up support of the bill by union members in their home communities and appeals to their congressmen and senators.
- An immediate increase of 10 percent in social security benefits and for another 10 percent in 1972, with an immediate boost in the minimum benefit to $90 a month.
- Establishment of a federal system of unemployment compensation and workmen's compensation to provide wider coverage and to improve the inadequate benefits now administered by the various state-operated programs.

Millions of Job Injuries Unreported, Study Finds

the report was made available to newsmen by the Labor Dept.

Its chief author, Jerome B. Gordon, had suggested that the department was sitting on the report, which he said was submitted on June 30. The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its August meeting, urged the Labor Dept. to publish the report so the public could know the full toll of job injuries. The department said it had not yet received the full report and promised to make it public as soon as available.

The report's findings are viewed as powerful ammunition in the effort to win congressional passage of federal occupational safety and health legislation.

Awesome as the 2.5 million-a-year job injury figure sounds, it includes only accidents in which at least a full day of work is lost—ignoring many other "serious" accidents which require medical attention, and which may result in unconsciousness, fractures, or temporary or permanent reassignment of injured workers to easier jobs.

Even the disabling injury tally, the report's author suggests, may be understated by several hundred thousand because of reliance on industry sources for data.

The report included a first-hand check on a large group of California firms.

It found that a significant number of firms that reported no "disabling" injuries actually had reportable accidents—which if properly reported would have increased the number of disabling injuries in the sample by 8 percent.

And it found nearly 10 "serious" but non-disabling injuries for every disabling injury—in actual numbers for the sample, 12,294 to 1,323.

If this ratio held up nationwide, the report notes, "there would be an increase from the current level of 2.5 million individual disabling injuries currently reported nationally to nearly 25 million individual serious injuries."

Budget cuts and denial of requested funds have seriously hampered the government's accident statistics gathering and analysis program, Gordon noted.

His report proposes alternative methods of improving the program — a "minimum" package which would cost about seven times the current $225,000 appropriation and a "maximum" expansion of the existing token effort which would cost more than 14 times the current level.

Meany Assesses Year's Gains, Setbacks

Following are excerpts from an interview with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on Aug. 25. Reporters questioning Meany were Damon Stetson of the New York Times, Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press, Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times, Mark Sullivan of Time magazine. Tom Coman of the Bureau of National Affairs, and Archie Robinson of U.S. News & World Report.

Q: Mr. Meany, I wonder what you might view as the federation's principal accomplishments this past year.

MEANY: Well, I think we have made some progress—legislatively—not too much. I think in the important area of cooperation between various units of the federation we made very significant progress through the medium of multi-union bargaining, if that is what you want to call it, especially in the General Electric situation.

I think we made very significant progress in the California grape situation, where we managed to bring union contracts to a great deal of the grape industry.

Internally, the organization is strong. We are going through what I would certainly call a recession and trying to meet the problems that come with a recession. I wouldn't say it was a year of great progress, but we have moved forward. Considering the times, I think we have done quite well.

Q: When do you think the country is going to come out of the recession? Do you see any sign of the end of it?

MEANY: Yes, I would say there are some signs. I am not an expert on this, but I would say that I agree with some of the signs. I certainly don't share the optimism that seems to come bouncing out of the White House every four or five days.

But I think, basically, the economy is sound. I think some of the policies of the present Administration are really the cause of our trouble. I am hopeful to see this turn around.

Frankly, I would say if they could bring down the cost of hiring money—bring down the interest rates—I think we would be on our way. I am not really basically worried about the economy. I am not worried about a depression of any severity, but we have had problems. Unemployment, of course has been going up. I have no way of predicting this but it looks like we are at a turning point. I could be wrong.

Q: Is your prime recommendation, though, something to do with reducing interest rates?

MEANY: Interest rates and government control of the available credits. I think this is awfully important. I think that the President now has certain powers which were voted to him by Congress that give him some control over where the amount of available credit is used. We feel that he could have used it and certainly concentrated on the housing industry which, in turn, would have a beneficial effect on the entire financial picture.

Q: How would you, outside the economic situation, size up AFL-CIO's relations and labor relations in general with the Nixon Administration?

MEANY: I think our relations with the Nixon Administration are just about as good as we could have expected. I wouldn't say we have any romance or love-feast going on, but I think he has been responsive in some areas.

Of course, he is still, I would say, much more on the conservative side of things than his predecessors—Johnson and Kennedy. I would say that the relationship has been fairly good.

We, of course, agree with him to a great degree on his efforts to end the war in Southeast Asia through the building up and developing the ability of the South Vietnamese to take care of themselves. We are in agreement with that because, frankly, we don't think there is any disagreement about getting out—getting our people out of Southeast Asia. We don't think there is any real disagreement. Everybody wants them out, including Nixon; including us.

But we think that he has a practical plan to get them out. The plan makes sense. Whether it works or not is another thing but, up until now, it appears to be working.

We are completely opposed to the idea of bugging out. We are completely opposed to the idea of setting a cut-off date for American participation because if you set a cut-off date then all the Viet Cong has to do is sit by and wait until that date comes and then move in.

On his economic policy, of course, we don't agree with him.

On the other hand, we find that in the field of government employes he has certainly been more liberal than any man in the White House before him because he has come out for collective bargaining for government employes at every level. He has come out for extending to government employes practically all of the rights that workers have and unions have in the private sector. So we think this represents progress.

Of course, this doesn't mean that things are going to automatically change overnight because, in carrying out the intent of his policy, we run into some great difficulties.

I think, as I said before, his economic policies, his cooling off of the economy—I think this has caused more and more unemployment up until now and, of course, the inflation spiral is still moving upwards. Now, of course, we keep hearing that we are near the end, that the last quarter is going to see a big change. On this we are hopeful but we don't know.

Q: Well, in your contract or agreement with the Post Office, you agreed to binding arbitration rather than strikes as a final step. I presume that was on the theory that that is an essential operation. Do you think that some day we are going to come to binding arbitration in private industry where it is a vital service of some kind?

MEANY: No, I don't think that this necessarily means that. You see, these people work under civil service law. Civil service work prevents strikes, theoretically. Now, I feel that fighting for the theoretical right of federal employes to strike is really a waste of time. They do not have the right to strike at the present time, under the law, but they do strike if they want to and they will strike if conditions are not acceptable.

What we worked out with the Administration was a system of collective bargaining with the Administration in all of the areas where workers are concerned, to the same extent that we bargain collectively in the private sector. Now, when you get down to the point of final determination where you have an impasse, prior to this time, all of the impasses were determined by the Civil Service Commission.

Under this agreement we have affecting the postal workers, this is to go to a board and it is not going to be determined finally by someone in the Executive Branch of the government. We think this is tremendous progress.

Q: There seems to be some evidence that rank and file workers may be more conservative than they used to be. Do you see any swing in the coming election or in 1972 of the rank and file and the membership of labor toward the Republican party?

MEANY: No, I don't see any swing toward the Republican party. But it would certainly not be outside our tradition for our people to support Republicans. We support them all the time where they deserve support. Of course, the vast majority of the people we support are Democrats, and this is because they have a voting record and attitude toward the things that we believe in which is much more favorable than Republicans.

Q: Do you think this is changing?

MEANY: I think it is changing to some extent. Not so much that our people are looking to the Republicans, but they are looking less to the Democrats because, actually, the Democratic party has disintegrated. It is not the so-called liberal party that is was a few years ago. It almost has become the party of the extremists insofar as these so-called liberals or new lefts, or whatever you want to call them, have taken over the Democratic party.

As they take it over and as they move more and more to the left—and I mean away over to the left—I think more and more are going to lose the support of our members.

Our members are basically Americans. They basically believe in the American system, and maybe they have a greater stake in the system now than they had 15 or 20 years ago because under the system and under our trade union policy, they have become middle-class, if you want to say it. They have a greater stake.

You can be quite radical if you are involved in a labor dispute where people are getting 30 cents an hour because if you pull an honest strike, all you lose is 30 cents an hour. But you have people who are making $8,000 or $9,000 a year, paying off mortgages, with kids going to college, so you have an entirely different situation when you think about calling them on strike. They have obligations that are quite costly—insurance payments and all that sort of thing. So this makes the strike much less desirable as a weapon.

Naturally we wouldn't want to give it up as a weapon but I can say to you quite frankly that more and more people in the trade union movement—I mean at the highest levels—are thinking of other ways to advance without the use of the strike method.

I think the trade unionist—the average trade unionist—is disturbed as much as almost any other group in the country by the destruction we see visited on some of our institutions by the people from the far left. I think our membership, for instance, in California is just as horrified as any other people in California by what happened in San Rafael when there was an actual shooting affair in a court room with a judge losing his life.

When you talk about law and order, I think everybody believes in law and order and, of course, it is used to mean something else than perhaps we mean, but still our people certainly are not for violence. We certainly don't want to see American educational institutions destroyed.

We feel that while this country has problems and the problems are perhaps intensified because of the rapid pace of our life in this country, the average person would like to have some security in his own home. And I think in this area our members are no different than the great mass of the American people.

Q: Do you see an emergent Democratic candidate for 1972 or several that seem to be emerging?

MEANY: At this time I don't see any of them. There seems to be . . . well, take Hubert. He has had a shot at it and I don't find much sentiment among the Democrats for him to take another shot. I don't know what his plans are. Muskie attracted quite a bit of attention during the last campaign—a lot of favorable attention—but he doesn't seem to have capitalized on it. He doesn't seem to have developed. In fact, he isn't running. And I mean that in the sense that a fellow, who has really got his cap set for the presidency, is running all the time. But Muskie doesn't give you the impression that he is running.

Q: What about Ted Kennedy?

MEANY: If the Democratic convention was held tomorrow, I think Teddy Kennedy would have a good chance of getting the nomination because at least he has got a machine—he has got a real machine. He has manpower, he has money and, personally, he is the best organized of any of them in the sense that he really inherited the Kennedy machine. I would say that his chances of getting the nomination would be real good.

Q: But what chance do you think he would have against Nixon?

MEANY: It would all depend on how things were at the time. If the economic picture is as bad two years from now as it is now—and I don't expect it to be, but of course I can't predict—I would say anyone would have a chance against Nixon because when you get right down to it, this is a gut issue.

Q: It sounds like here, though, you are saying that the law-and-order issue and the radicalism that has broken out in this country is more of an issue than the economics.

MEANY: I didn't say that. I didn't say it was more of an issue. I said that the law-and-order issue affects our people the same as it does the most conservative people in the country—that our people recoil in horror from such things as happened in San Rafael. They pick up the paper and they see educational institutions destroyed and all this sort of thing. But I don't say that that is the big issue.

I still think that the biggest issue with our people is the economic issue.

Q: And has Nixon failed on this issue? Is he going to get bad marks on this issue?

'The Economic Picture Is the Gut Issue'

MEANY: On the economic issue, as of now, yes, I would say he would get bad marks.

Q: What about some other issues?

MEANY: I think his educational policy is not good. I think he is obsessed with the idea of balancing the budget and I think he is cutting back—or at least he tried to cut back to a great extent—on the educational programs that were not enacted under his Administration. They were enacted under the Administration of Lyndon Johnson.

His veto of the educational bill, of course, I suppose he will use in the campaign as an indication of how he wants to save money and balance the budget.

But I think the vast majority of the people of the country were certainly against him on that because we don't think he should be balancing the budget at the expense of America's young people who need education. So, I think on that source he is bad.

On the civil rights business, I think he is very, very bad because he is obviously attempting to carry water on both shoulders. He is continually doing that. He wants to do, on the record, what the civil rights people expect—especially in regard to integration of the schools in the South. At the same time, he wants to keep Strom Thurmond happy. Now, he just can't do both. But this is what, up until now, he is trying to do and I just say he can't do both.

Q: You mentioned something about people are thinking about other ways to advance the labor cause besides strikes. What do you have in mind there?

MEANY: Well, voluntary arbitration, for instance. In other words, what would be wrong—and of course we don't make policy for our unions, our member unions make their own policy and we try to coordinate it—but what would be wrong with a union signing an agreement for, let's say, two years and then saying that at the end of two years all the basic conditions in this agreement will prevail except wages and that wages shall be the subject of collective bargaining? And, if, after a certain length of time, there is no agreement between the parties, the American Arbitration Association will make a final and binding decision? I am not saying this is what should be done, but you are asking what possible ways are there other than a strike. And I say this is one possible way.

Q: Are there industries where you see this form of bargaining developing more than other industries?

MEANY: I wouldn't say that I see it developing. I would say that in what I would call some of our best unions, our real solid unions, they are now thinking and talking about this openly.

In fact, we have agreed to set up a small committee to meet with the representatives of the American Arbitration Association to explore this whole idea. Actually what it adds up to is that while strikes have their part and all that and we certainly have advocated for years that you have got to have the right to strike, we find more and more that strikes really don't settle a thing.

Q: Not long ago you sent a letter or telegram to the Auto Workers pledging the federation's aid and assistance if needed in their situation. Would that include finances if they happen to need it?

MEANY: I would say that it would include anything. And, as far as them needing finances, I don't think they are going to need it. But the point is, on a strict trade union matter, with a great big union—whether it happens to be outside the AFL-CIO or not is really not the point—if a great big union got into a real struggle and needed help, we would give them any kind of help that we could give them because it would certainly have a bad effect on the whole trade union future of the country if a union of that size could really get slaughtered. I don't think this is possible.

Actually, it was a gesture, in a way, on our part, but, at the same time, I don't think there is anyone in our setup who would not agree to be helpful if the Auto Workers needed help. Now, I certainly don't think they are going to need help, but if they did, they'd get it.

Q: Are you going to help the ladies get their equal rights amendment across?

MEANY: No.

Q: Why?

MEANY: Well, there are certain protections in the law for women that we have been fighting to put into the law for many, many years. I passed a number of them 30-odd years ago in the New York State legislature. And all of this legislation was prepared by the ladies. We had the Women's Trade Union League. And these protections are in there.

Now, of course, we get these militant feminists and they don't want any protection. They are equal and so on and so forth. They were in to see me the other day. They say we don't want this law; we want absolute equality.

There are laws in some states that women cannot work in coal mines. Now, most of the women who were instrumental in putting those laws on the statute books, had some association with unions.

We represent millions of women who are in our unions and if they were willing to lose these protections, it would be all right with the AFL-CIO.

But we are going to take our policy from the women who are represented in our unions and they are opposed to this so-called equal rights amendment, unless there would be some safeguard in there to preserve protective legislation.

Q: What about the situation in the labor movement with black workers, with Negroes and other minorities? Are they getting more jobs? Are they finding it easier to get into unions?

MEANY: They're getting more jobs, but the process is very, very slow and we have tried and we have tried to speed it up. We've tried to get more blacks in. Take the construction industry. Now what do we want? What should the blacks want? Well, I would say that they would want black young people in these industries who acquire the skills and who become part of the workforce of these industries. In other words, qualified and skilled and able to command whatever the wages that are paid these people.

The only way that I know to do this, is through training with the young people in apprenticeship training.

If there are older workers in this field that have some experience, well then you upgrade them until they become full-fledged mechanics.

A lot of people have theories—they say, well, you have so many members, you have so few blacks, ipso facto, you are discriminating. Well, if that is true and we say, all right, we were discriminating, now we don't want to discriminate anymore. What do we do from there? There is no use trying to beat a dead horse.

There is no question that the building trades unions, especially in the northern cities, had very few blacks in certain highly skilled trades. This didn't mean that there were not blacks in the building trades union. I never worked on a job, going back many, many years, when there wasn't a large number of black people on the job. But they were carpenters, they were bricklayers, they were plasterers, they were laborers. They were not plumbers, they were not electricians, they were not sheet metal workers, and so on.

We've had a tremendous change in the position of the trade unions. Not only are our unions saying in effect and—these are the skilled unions—not only are we saying we will take in blacks, we are saying also that we will try to help recruit them. And the recruitment is the problem.

Take the first year apprentice, right here in Washington, and they've got a very, very good apprentice program in the plumbing trade here. They have a five-year apprenticeship and I think that's a little too long, but they are quite proud of their apprentices and they claim that any apprentice they graduate, at the end of five years, can step from the apprenticeship status and become a foreman. They're quite strong about this and I don't think that they are just bragging.

They get an enrollment of this school of about 33 percent and they are doing better than I think almost any place in the country, but the drop-out rate after the first year or so is quite high for both whites and blacks but it seems to be higher for blacks than whites.

Now, these apprentices make $2.85 an hour the first year of apprenticeship. After about a year and a half, they are up to $4 an hour. So a number of these apprentices you find are married and raising families while they are still apprentices. And, of course, it's a tough course because they've just got to learn the whole trade.

When we say that we learn the whole trade you've got to realize what that means. It means that the fellow who learns the whole trade can qualify to work down at Cape Kennedy tomorrow. Not just qualify to run in some pipe or fix some washer, that's just a really very small part of plumbing. They are qualified to go into a hospital and handle equipment that is very, very costly and handle it and install it and connect it up so that it works. Qualified to go to an oil refinery—in other words qualified in every way.

And this is a very well-paid trade. The fellow who works year round, he is well above $10,000 a year. And even the laborers are way up there. So I don't see why we are not able to attract more of these young Negro boys.

Yes, we have some areas—here and there in the South—where they are dragging their feet, but these are in the minority. But we are not making the progress we should be making. We are certainly not making the progress that the so-called black militants want us to make.

Q: What would you like to accomplish in the next year or two? What goals do you have for the movement?

MEANY: I am sorry, I just don't think in terms of goals. I just meet them as they come. I would like to see the situation with the Auto Workers straightened out.

Q: You mean back in the federation?

MEANY: Oh, yes, I would like to see them back. I would like to see the Teamsters back, too.

Q: But you said a while ago you didn't see anything in the immediate future.

MEANY: No, I don't.

Q: But you would be happier if they were back?

MEANY: Yes.

Q: What about white collar organizing? Do you see much gain there?

MEANY: I think, we have made progress there but slow progress. The white collar worker is not easy to organize. His situation is a little different than the average mechanical worker. He works, for instance, for one employer and his chances for improvement are generally right in that area. He can see, well, maybe he would move into somebody else's job when somebody retires and they sort of move up. And I think this discourages them from joining unions.

It is only where you get a large number of white collar workers all doing the same drudgery—like insurance people, sitting at a desk in insurance companies where you have 400 or 500 people doing the same type of work. They respond much better than the average white collar worker.

Q: I gather that you were very high on George Shultz as secretary of Labor. What do you think of him in his new position?

MEANY: I think he has the most important position in government. Actually, this set up is really borrowed from the business world. He is, in my book, the executive vice president of the corporation. In other words, he is the guy who runs the corporation from day to day. He is without question, over all the Cabinet members. They are just department heads under him. He reports to the President.

Now, how this is going to work out in practical terms, I don't know. But I think Shultz has tremendous ability and while I don't agree with him on a number of things, personally, I think he is really a nice guy. He has tremedous ability. And I feel that he will either make a go of this or he won't stay. And I think if he runs into some Cabinet big-shot and he gets pushed aside, I think he will say goodbye. I don't think he will stay.

Q: What about Jim Hodgson?

MEANY: I like him very much. I think he is a good practical guy. He has both feet on the ground. The fact that he was on the employers' side doesn't disturb me in the least but because he was dealing with our unions, he knows the problems. He is far more knowledgeable, in terms of direct experience, than Shultz. He, of course, conducted labor relations affairs for Lockheed for some years. He dealt with our unions out there. He was absolutely straight, fair, and that is all I have to know about him.

The 'System'

LABOR DAY traditionally has been a time for reflection on the progress the workers of America and their unions have made since the early days of the Republic and a time, as well, for rededication to the quest for still unattained goals.

On this Labor Day, the first of a new decade, the very system of American democracy under which organized labor functions is the target of open assault from the so-called new left and continuing subversion from the far right. It is a time, then, for all of us to examine just how well this "system" has functioned.

Labor knows full well the shortcomings of the system and how slowly progress and social justice have been achieved under it. It can recall the long struggles to abolish child labor, to shorten the dawn-to-dark working day, to establish a minimum wage for even the lowliest of workers. And it was more than a century and a quarter after the trials of Philadelphia Shoe Workers for conspiracy that the federal government finally recognized by law the right of workers to form their own unions and bargain collectively.

The memory is still alive, too, of a not-so-distant past when union men and women were fair game for the clubs and guns of company police and deputy sheriffs.

BUT FOR ALL its imperfections, for all the law's delay, the "system" has in fact worked for organized labor as well as for the nation itself.

We did succeed in taking our children out of the mills and putting them into schools.

We did gain the right to organize and bargain. We did establish a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours of work. We did win a measure of security for workers in their old age, and other gains, great and small, in the legislative halls and at the bargaining table.

In short, the "system" has enabled American labor to achieve for the workers of this country a dignity and a standard of living unmatched throughout the world. And it has done so in a climate of individual freedom that is the very foundation of our democracy.

Those who would destroy the American "system" in the hope that something better might arise Phoenix-like from the ashes, should look more closely at the alternatives around us—the so-called labor unions of Russia that serve the state rather than the worker, the public trials and executions of dissenters in Communist China, the gunpoint "efficiency" of the military dictatorships.

THERE IS STILL much to be done in America, as we are reminded by our leaders on this Labor Day. We must find ways of assuring jobs for all our workers, education for our youths to the full extent of their capacity, adequate health care for all who need it, a safe and healthy environment, the total abolition of poverty and racial discrimination, and much more.

After all these objectives have been won, there will be others, for man is continually striving upward and his aspirations have no limits.

American labor will pursue and achieve these goals within the same "system" that has brought it this far, rejecting the phony alternatives of both the far left and the far right.

A choice between the oppressor's truncheon and the anarchist's bomb is no choice at all.

'Non-Conforming' Youths Have Their Own Uniform-of-the-Day

By John P. Roche

LAST SPRING several of my favorite students dropped by the office to invite me to a party, "a wonderful, intimate scene where we can really rap." It was sweet of them because they consider me (one of them said) "the Humphrey Bogart of the Old Left" and it was clear that they thought I was worth rehabilitation. They reminded me a bit of the Salvation Army making overtures to a dedicated drunk.

When I very courteously declined, one young lady took careful aim at my psyche and fired: "Why," she demanded, "are you so afraid of intimacy?"

So I told her: "Intimacy is not instant coffee; it does not come in jars for ready mixing. I have a private world of intimates, developed over 47 years, and you have your private world. Let's just respect each other's privacy." I did not add that, having a daughter of their generation, I already had more intimacy with their problems than I need!

We parted quite amicably, but there was a haunting quality to the discussion. Why is this upper middle class, highly intelligent segment of American youth so desperately afraid of privacy? You see evidence of it everywhere you turn. For example, reporters covering an abortive rock festival in Connecticut noted that nude bathing was de rigueur. Nude bathing per se is hardly immoral—though there is a great deal to be said against it on esthetic grounds—but why this demand for total exposure?

What is there to be said for nakedness, anyway? It is not particularly sexy. Indeed, the shots of the young bounding around in the buff have a National Geographic quality. ("A peculiar tribe of aborigines engaging in purification rites, naked except for a curious religious medallion worn around the neck.") It can be a real delight to strip—after, say, three days marching through the jungle—and let the water soak into your body, but that is a functional approach to nudity.

Among the young aristocrats, however, nakedness has become a uniform, an outward and visible form of demonstrating inner conformity.

I don't believe I have ever seen a tribe with quite the passion for uniforms that our self-styled "radicals" display. If nakedness is the accepted garb for social occasions, the dress uniform is equally mandatory. These days there is considerably more individual variation in a Marine company than you will see, say, at Harvard Square or a Woodstock festival. (I confess that I have always detested uniforms. For the benefit of readers who have inquired, that was why I shaved off my moustache back in the winter of 1967. I grew it because I was bored with my face and cut it off when I discovered it had become a symbol of dissent, virility or something.)

BUT NOTE the common denominator in all this: the conspiracy against privacy, against individualism. The nub of the matter is we are witnessing a romantic revolt against one of the basic values of liberal society, the right to a private world. Just as they seem to find privacy terrifying, these young people obviously find silence an intolerable burden. Perhaps both privacy and silence force them to enter an empty, inner world.

Without venturing too deeply into the psychoanalytical surf, one can suggest that these young people (and their adult camp followers) are attempting to ritualize their inability to relate spontaneously to others by imposing rites of intimacy. It is sometimes annoying, sometimes amusing, but always saddening.

Believe it or not, one can love someone who is fully clothed, one can achieve deep understanding of others without the instant intimacy provided by drugs, booze or strange music. Above all, one can be a non-conformist without putting on a uniform.

Religious Leaders Stress Need For Economic, Social Justice

THE STRUGGLE for a fuller life with just economic rewards for their toil continues for most of the nation's workers, especially those in the blue-collar occupations. Regardless of how they are separated—along racial lines or ethnic divisions—not all are sharing in the good life, representatives of the nation's major faiths said in Labor Day messages.

While expressing concern for the widening gap between white working class groups and non-white minorities, the U.S. Catholic Conference statement noted that the needs of the white ethnic group workers are being ignored.

The Council for Christian Social Action of the United Church of Christ called attention to the nation's economic problems and rising unemployment as adding to the plight of the workers.

The labor movement alone cannot right the wrongs, said Rabbi Solomon J. Sharfman of the Synagogue Council of America. "Business and industry, and above all, federal and state governments must assume responsibility and intitiative, without which the challenge will remain unmet," he declared.

Monsignors George G. Higgins and Geno C. Baroni of the Catholic Conference observed that the country for a long time has set aside ethnic differences as being no longer consequential. Their statement said:

"We have allowed ourselves to believe that our society is divided principally on black-white lines, with a nod toward the Indian and the Spanish-speaking people.

"The large white majority of working people —whether poor or middle class—is thought of as being a homogeneous mass lacking in its own internal problems. Perhaps this emphasis may be excused in the light of the pressing concerns of the black and brown minorities.

"Nevertheless the continued neglect of the white ethnic working class is bound to bring disastrous results in the wake.

"The two Catholic leaders pointed out that while the offspring of European immigrants can be found in various economic strata, a large number of them are blue-collar workers.

"They are the backbone of the labor force in most of our industrial cities, mining towns and manufacturing centers," the statement continued.

"We reject the widespread accusation that these people are the primary exponents of racism in our society, although we do not deny that racisim exists in their ranks."

Most inner cities have been left to working class whites and the minorities while the upper middle class is fleeing to the suburbs, they noted.

"It is obvious therefore that if there is to be a resolution of the racial crisis which currently grips our society, a critical role will be played by white ethnic working class minorities," the two Catholic leaders observed.

They also suggested that "the Church must play a pivotal role in bridging the ever-widening gap between working class ethnic whites and the non-white minorities if we are to build an effective coalition for constructive social change in urban America."

Rabbi Sharfman said that American labor must live up to its responsibilities of bringing alienated people back into the mainstream of American life "by giving them a stake, not just in the dream."

"Judaism has always spoken in understanding and completely identified terms concerning labor and its fundamental place in man's world," he said. "The worklife of man is seen in Judaism as one of the most important functions of his social being. We recognize that a person's self-image and self-esteem are bound to what he does."

He pointed out that not all Americans share in the benefits of the nation's productivity.

"There is appalling poverty in our land; there are families who live in slums that are a national disgrace; there are fellow Americans from whom the respect-giving vitality of useful employment is withheld," the Jewish leader declared.

In the task of building "the better society that generations have dreamed of," he said, "may the American labor movement play a great and essential role and may Labor Day 1970 be the day of its rededication."

CITING THE SIMILARITY of purpose of churches and unions for the brotherhood of man, the United Church of Christ praised the labor movement for the progress "in developing respectability and independence for the worker."

"We appreciate the success of the unions in caring for the economic welfare of people—for full employment at decent wages, in work that is as pleasant and meaningful as possible."

"Union expertise in economic theory and its power to obtain economic reforms have been invaluable to church partners accustomed to deal largely in attitudes. The striking growth of productivity in the 1950s and its remarkable continuance brought decreases in some labor costs and large increases in profits. Unions led the struggles to distribute the benefits fairly through shorter hours, wage increases and better working conditions.

"The other problem," it declared, "deals with conversion from a war or semi-war prosperity to a peacetime economy involving shorter hours, more leisure and abolition of poverty."

"We hope that labor's official support of the Indochina war will not dull its interest or slow its efforts to build a peacetime prosperity. . . . Some blame the current unemployment on peace. We need labor's leadership to bring employment with peace."

In Building Free Unions:

American Labor's Aid Benefits Workers on Three Continents

ORGANIZED LABOR'S worker-to-worker efforts have helped some 200,000 workers on three continents gain job skills and develop techniques to build their own free trade unions, the chairman of the AFL-CIO's International Affairs Committee said in a network radio interview.

The basics of organizing unions may be comparatively "simple" in the United States, said Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers. But, he stressed, among "illiterate, or under-educated or untrained people," it is a "difficult chore."

Beirne said that although the AFL-CIO has "no members to gain" from its efforts in Latin America, Africa and Asia, the American labor movement and the country as a whole do gain strength from helping workers in other countries "avoid falling for the phoniness of the Communist system."

Beirne, a vice president of the AFL-CIO, appeared on the nationwide public affairs interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that while the economic system of a country should be determined by the people of that country, workers must realize that the Communist promise "falls far short of fulfillment," and that "to take something out of an economy, you must put something into it." Organization of free and democratic trade unions is the best guarantee workers have that they will get their "fair share," he added.

BEIRNE HAS BEEN secretary-treasurer of the American Institute for Free Labor Development since its inception a decade ago. He pointed out that the institute is a joint effort by the AFL-CIO, American business and the U.S. Agency for International Development to help workers in Latin America through both social projects and union leadership training.

He said that in groups of 20, Latin American union leaders are given six weeks of "concentrated day and night study" at the institute's Front Royal, Va., facility, after which they return home and spend a year teaching their fellow workers what they have picked up.

Reporters questioning Beirne were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine.

By Press Associates, Inc.

OF THE MAKING of tax loopholes for the rich and for their corporations there apparently is no end.

In 1969 when the so-called tax relief bill was in the making, the Nixon Administration turned up with a last-minute proposal to permit exporting corporations to defer tax payments on their export profits indefinitely. The argument was that tax deferral has already been granted to corporations which have subsidiaries abroad and that it would be only fair to extend the same economic privilege to exporters.

The fact that this would simply be making two huge tax loopholes instead of one was ignored.

The Administration proposal didn't go through. Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), who is a member of the Senate Finance Committee, helped kill the proposal in committee and it didn't get off the ground.

Now the export tax deferral gimmick has turned up again, this time in the guise of being a stimulus to American exports needed to help the American balance of payments.

Gore and other critics, notably organized labor, deny bluntly that it is. If anything, they claim, it is a device to give tax reduction to about 125 of the country's largest corporations without necessarily adding one dollar of exports to help the balance of payments.

The new proposal calls for creation of what is called the Domestic International Sales Corp. under which profits on exports would not be taxed until—if ever—they are brought back to the United States.

CRITICS OF THE new tax loophole scheme have made a number of telling points against it:

- The Domestic International Sales Corp., or DISC as it is called, would not necessarily provide an incentive to increase exports, since it applies to current exports as well as additional ones. Even on the basis of current exports this would represent a cost of about $600 million to the Treasury with nothing gained for the balance of payments.
- The $600 million would be a windfall tax bonanza to the 125 or so huge corporations that dominate the American export scene. They could use this tax-free money as they saw fit.
- Chief beneficiaries would be large U.S. based multi-national corporations which have one foot in the United States and the other in cheap labor countries abroad. These corporations export semi-finished goods and parts to foreign plants which in turn compete with American-produced goods.
- Treasury claims that DISC would open the way to small American plants entering the export market are questioned by labor economists who contend that DISC would strengthen the giant corporations and make it even more difficult for small ones to compete.
- The DISC proposals would simply open the door to bookkeeping tax avoidance gimmickry, opening the way for the accumulation of tax-free funds by corporations abroad, funds that could then be loaned to the parent corporation at no cost. The parent company could then use this money to expand operations abroad. Instead of helping the U.S. economy, this would add to existing hindrances.

Finally, the DISC proposal does nothing to correct the real factors that have led to deterioration of the American trade position—the growth of managed national economies abroad, the tremendous rise of American corporate investment abroad, and the growth of U.S.-based multi-national corporations.

What it does do is open a new and juicy tax loophole.

The House Ways & Means Committee has reported out a trade bill that includes the DISC tax loophole. It is now before the Rules Committee, which will probably be asked to give it a rule that will permit killing of the DISC section without killing the rest of the bill which places limits on textile and shoe imports.

Should the Rules Committee reject this move and should the House vote the entire bill including DISC, the fight will go to the Senate Finance Committee. Both Gore and organized labor have promised a determined fight against it.

SOME 200,000 WORKERS have gained new job skills and developed the techniques of building their own free trade unions through U.S. labor's efforts in Latin America, Africa and Asia, said Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, center, chairman of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Committee. Beirne was interviewed on Labor News Conference by Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

Meany on Labor Day:

'Angry' Workers to Demand Bigger Share

By George Meany

LABOR DAY 1970 is a time of great uncertainty and anxiety for many Americans—as much for American workers as for anyone else.

The blunt economic facts tell the story.

Production is falling. Jobs are vanishing. Soaring prices are pushing the cost of living to record heights. The workers' buying power is dropping steadily.

The combination of recession and inflation at the same time is rare but it is no accident. It results from ill-conceived Administration actions.

The Administration prescribed stringent medicine to cure inflation, but applied its cure unequally. The result has been suffering for millions of Americans.

The rich and the blue-chip corporations were largely left untouched by the government's tight-money policies. Those who have money to lend are earning record profits.

But the results for America's wage earners, pensioners, the poor, and small businessmen have been anything but bright.

For them, the Administration's medicine has meant higher prices for everything they buy, layoffs or shortened pay checks, exorbitant interest for the money they must borrow, and for many an end to the dream of a family home or education for their children.

The reaction of America's organized workers to this unjust and unfair economic policy is obvious.

They can—and they will—seek to redress their grievances at one place where they can obtain relief—at the collective bargaining table. There they will seek—and win—a measure of economic justice.

The reasoning behind this course of action by organized workers is crystal clear.

Whenever prices go up, consumers are told that it's because of increased labor costs. Blaming it on the unions is a hallowed custom in the business community.

So we are told that America's economic problems stem from inflationary wage increases—that workers have forced industry to increase its prices.

Well, that isn't true. Workers and wages did not cause this inflation, and they have not profited by it. They are among its chief victims, and they are not happy about it.

Workers have been priced out of the market for a very long time, through no fault of their own. And they are demanding to be priced back into the market.

Workers these days are feeling a deep sense of frustration.

They have been slipping backward. And the average American worker, who has a family to care for, children to educate and bills to pay, is in serious trouble.

According to the government's latest report, the average American worker earns, right now, $120.05 per week, before taxes.

Now the same government department says it costs $204 a week to maintain a family of four, in the average American city, at a "modest but adequate" standard of living, with very few luxuries. So the average American worker, if he is married and has two children, falls $84 a week short of that standard.

The same government department says that it costs $132 a week to maintain that size family at a low standard of living—not quite in poverty, but with no luxuries at all.

And in the government's view a car is a luxury, and so is insurance. So is college tuition for the worker's children, and that budget allows nothing for savings for any kind of a rainy day.

What the government tells us is that the average worker—the head of a family of four, ought to have $204 a week. He needs a minimum of $132. He actually has $120, before taxes. That means all of his tax burden still has to come out of that wage envelope before he can start taking care of his family.

And that is where the average American worker stands today. A long way short of the affluence we have been hearing about. A long way short of what television sponsors represent the American standard of living to be. A long way short of what the government economists say is absolutely needed to live decently.

Now what we know where we are, let's consider how we got there. If workers didn't cause inflation, then who did?

In the 10 year period ending last summer, wages rose 34 percent, but inflation reduced that to 10 percent in real buying power.

Over the same period of time, corporate profits rose 93 percent.

Now if those figures were reversed—if wages had shot up while profits rose only a little—we would have to say that wages have caused inflation.

But if we face the facts, we can't help but see that what caused the trouble is profit inflation, and nothing else.

Throughout the early 1960s, wage increases were very modest. Productivity was rising, too, which means that labor costs per unit remained about the same, prices went up and profit per dollar of sales was rising. Sales volume expanded, and corporate profits soared to levels never before dreamed of.

The pace of price increases began to speed up in 1965. Consumer prices began to climb more rapidly, and profits with them. And unions, in collective bargaining, tried again to catch up—to bring wages into line with costs.

But they didn't catch up, for business promptly stepped up the rate of price increases in order to maintain or widen record profit rates. So, on Labor Day 1970, workers are still trying to catch up—to earn a living wage, in a time of both inflation and recession.

In classical economic theory, recession and inflation are supposed to cancel each other out. They're not supposed to team up and make matters worse. The Administration planners, who prescribed the tight-money policy, said that wouldn't happen.

It did happen, and it is continuing to happen.

The bankers and the money lenders are prospering as never before. There is no recession for them: What they have to sell—money—was never in greater demand. And they have insulated their profits from the effects of inflation simply by raising their prices—their interest rates—to the highest point in 100 years.

This process began immediately after the national elections of 1968, when the Federal Reserve Board announced its tight-money policy. It tightened the squeeze when the present Administration took office. The pressure increased all through 1969 with scarcely any increase in the nation's money supply. With that, of course, interest rates skyrocketed.

The most immediate victim was the home construction industry. Cut off from the money market by usurious interest rates, the home-building industry has become stagnant. The housing America needs so badly is not being built.

State and local governments, caught in the same squeeze, have had to cancel plans to build badly needed hospitals, schools, roads and public buildings.

And at the same time, the Administration has cut back federal construction, in the name of economy and budget-balancing, and withheld funds already appropriated by Congress for that purpose.

Now, construction is a favorite target of people who want to hang the albatross of inflation around the neck of labor. The skilled workers who build homes, they say, are overpaid. Well, here are the facts, according to the National Association of Home Builders—which certainly ought to know and which certainly cannot be considered biased toward labor.

Twenty years ago, when a consumer bought an average house, it cost $10,000 and a third of his money went for on-site labor. By last year, according to the Builders' Association, labor costs on an average house had been cut to 18 percent. So even after wage increases over that 20-year period, workers have increased their productivity enough to reduce their part of the purchase price dollar from 33 cents to 18 cents.

Twenty years ago, when a consumer bought his $10,000 house he paid interest at the rate of 4.25 percent. Over the life of the mortgage he paid out a total of about $17,000 for his house, which seems like a lot of money.

Today, the average house costs $20,000 and, if he can find somebody to lend him money for a mortgage at all, he will have to pay interest of at least 8.5 percent, and over 30 years that will cost him over $50,000.

Last January, the government raised the FHA and VA mortgage interest rate from 7.5 to 8.5 percent. That one-percent increase alone added up to a quarter of the purchase price—more than $5,000—over the life of a 30-year $20,000 mortgage. That one percent added up to a great deal more than the entire cost of all the wages and fringe benetfis of the workers who built the house.

So we are building fewer than half of the houses we need. And unemployment in the construction industry is 11 percent, and climbing.

The story is the same in other industries. Industrial production has dropped below 80 percent of capacity, which means that one machine in five is idle. Unemployment across all industry stands at 5 percent, which means that one worker out of 20 who needs and wants a job can't get one.

The banks, with the highest interest rates in 100 years, are making fantastic profits.

And they are taking care of the rich and the blue-chip corporations. There is plenty of money available to bankroll business mergers and conglomerate take-overs, to build gambling casinos and overseas plants for runaway American industry.

So all of this money is being siphoned off from the American economy, and capital investment in people—in schools and hospitals and family income—is harmed.

Money spent in the ways that are getting first priority from the banks doesn't do much for the national economy. Money spent in wages does. The worker spends his earnings in his own community, because he uses it to pay his bills and to buy the things he needs. That money flows back up, from the consumer to the retailer to the distributor to the manufacturer to the banks.

Now, workers know that inflation is a cancer. As a prime victim of inflation, the worker wants inflation stopped, and we are ready to do our fair share in the fight to stop it. The AFL-CIO has made that pledge over and over, to industry, to the Administration and to Congress.

We have been given a number of pledges in return.

Before he was elected, Pres. Nixon declared that it would be a major goal of his Administration, during its next four years in office, to create 15 million new jobs.

Shortly after he took office, the President, in a letter to the AFL-CIO in February 1969, said this:

"We must find ways to curb inflation . . . without asking the wage earners to pay for the cost of stability with their jobs."

At just about the same time Mr. Nixon, as a candidate, was talking about 15 million more jobs, the Business Council was urging swift action on the part of the next Administration to stop inflation. They said this should be done even if it meant an unemployment rate of as much as 5.5 percent.

Of course, the members of the Business Council, who said coldly that they were prepared to accept such casualties in the fight against inflation, were pretty sure that they themselves would not be among that 5.5 percent.

Percentages are easy to talk about. They don't have bills to pay or families to support. What the Business Council was talking about sacrificing so casually were the lives and hopes and welfare of human beings—more than four million American breadwinners and another 15 million wives and children.

We can see no justification—no economic reason, and no human reason—why workers should be asked to bear the major burden of recession and inflation in order to maintain astronomical profits for banks and corporations.

What we are told, in effect, is that the hopes and livelihood of American workers and their families are expendable in the fight against inflation, but profits are not.

This philosophy we cannot accept.

But what the Business Council recommended is what is happening. Before long we may well reach that 5.5 percent unemployment rate.

Congress has provided Pres. Nixon with the tools he needs to halt inflation, balance the economy and put America back to work, but he has not used them.

Workers are, as I said, willing to do their share to halt inflation and balance the economy. The AFL-CIO has said repeatedly that we would accept restraints on wages, if similar controls were placed equally on all other costs and incomes, including prices, profits, dividends, rents and all the different kinds of executive compensation.

The American worker is a consumer, as well as a producer. He is just as angry as other Americans at being forced to pay more for the goods he produces, and being paid in dollars that buy less.

So it should come as no surprise that he intends to raise his voice at the bargaining table.

What we need in this country, the AFL-CIO has been saying for a very long time, is a general resolve on the part of those who hold the political and economic power to bring equity and stability to the economy without putting all the burden on the worker, or on any other single group of citizens.

The economy has to be made to work for all the people, including the poor, the aged, the jobless, the untrained and all the others who need it the most and who get so little out of it.

The AFL-CIO believes that the only answer to economic inequity is to restore equity. The only policy that meets the problems of unemployment is a policy of full employment. The only answer to maldistribution of the wealth American workers help create is to give workers a bigger share of the pie.

And, in a single sentence, that's what organized workers are going to be seeking in collective bargaining this year—a bigger share of the pie.

We do it in the sure and certain belief that true liberty and true justice are not a contradiction in terms.

America has undertaken to build a nation that combines them both, for all citizens in every walk of life. And American trade unionists believe it can be done.

We want to get on with the job of building it and the forum we have chosen—the traditional forum for progress for workers—is the collective bargaining table. It has worked for us—and for America—in the past. And it will work again.

Obsolete Voting Laws Blemish Democracy

By Lane Kirkland

MANY THINGS happen on Labor Day: American workers get a well-earned holiday and have nice things said about them by government and community leaders.

A coast-to-coast traffic jam frays the nerves of millions of Americans off for an outing on the last major summertime week-end.

Traditionally, in an election year, political campaigns get underway, as candidates open up on the oratory at ox roasts, picnics, parades and other Labor Day observances where potential votes are gathered.

This political aspect of Labor Day is important, for it launches the process that ends at the polls two months later with free men in a free nation freely choosing those who will represent them.

But there is a bleaker side of any election year that gets lost behind the speech-making, the rallies, the telecasts and the flood of paper lauding various candidates as the agents of deliverance from a plague of problems.

Unfortunately, behind the facade of democracy is one dismal fact: Millions of citizens to whom the candidates' appeals are earnestly directed on Labor Day and thereafter won't make it to the polls on Election Day.

They are not registered. They cannot vote.

At first blush, the reaction of some citizens might be: That's their tough luck; "I'm registered, let them go out and do it, too."

Maybe so. There are too many Americans who, through apathy alone, fail to vote on Election Day. Whether because of laziness or indifference, they drop out from democracy. Perhaps they wouldn't vote if soemone carted the booth to their homes.

But millions of others who won't vote this year are, in effect, locked out of the voting booth by election laws as obsolete as the 12-hour day. Indeed, many laws still on the books were written in that unlamented era and should have been revised decades ago.

Some figures shed light on the problem of voting in America and suggest that there is far more than apathy limiting participation of citizens in the electoral process.

Two years ago, at the time of the presidential election, 116 million Americans were over 21 and eligible to vote. Thirty-eight percent of these—44 million citizens—did not vote. Of these, 15 million were registered. Experts estimate 10 million could have registered but didn't. Most of the remaining 19 million were done out of their vote by stone-age residency requirements which prohibit registration and voting for newcomers, while others were sick or disabled, were away from their communities, had no protection of time-off-for-voting laws, or for other reasons did not obtain an absentee ballot.

No one can guess accurately how many would have voted. It is reasonable to assume million would have, particularly under less restrictive residency rules and more rational absentee ballot provisions.

Actually, guessing at numbers is unimportant. What is important is the fact that any citizen is prevented from voting in any way in any election. What is important is the fact that in too many states laws are deliberately designed to limit, rather than to increase, voting participation.

A beginning, however slight, has been made to remedy this. Residency requirements recently were standardized for presidential elections. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 was extended for five years. It will further increase participation of black voters, and now has extended the franchise to 18-year-olds, starting next year.

But we cannot rest on this. Too many glaring absurdities make the election laws a travesty which can be tolerated no longer in a nation where participation is one part of the antidote to alienation.

It makes no sense that in Texas, in order to vote in a November election, citizens must register by Jan. 31, 10 months before voting day, and that they must register annually.

It is absurd that in South Carolina, by statute, the only persons who enjoy permanent registration status are those who registered to vote before Jan. 1, 1898, more than 72 years ago. Only 93-year-olds and up, then, are relieved of the obligation to register annually.

In Georgia, to register you "must be of good character and understand duties and obligations of citizenship," a subjective judgment left to the discretion of your friendly neighborhood registrar. In Kentucky, you can't register by mail. In Delaware, you cannot vote absentee in primary or special elections.

The books teem with such absurdities, and it is time to end them. It is time to cease playing around piece-meal with the election laws and to put onto the books, once and for all, a set of national standards for registration and voting that encourages maximum participation in democracy.

In a nation where 20 percent of the population moves annually, for example, the standardization of residency requirements is essential for all elections, not just presidential contests.

For years, the trade union movement has been in the forefront of the struggle to make registration and voting easy instead of difficult. We have fought fossil laws in the national Congress and in the state legislatures.

Our premise is this: In a democracy, all citizens should take part in selection of the public officials who make decisions that affect all citizens. This process of selection is performed in the voting booth. Citizens of every state should have equal and easy access to the voting booth.

Beyond this, particularly in this era of contention and confrontation, the privacy of the voting booth is a better, surer, more peaceful way to help compose the very serious differences that separate people from one another than the oratory of the street corner or the seductive come-on of the television camera to blab irresponsibility and irrationally.

Some detractors say the trade union movement is interested in election law reform only to increase participation of its own members to add to its own political influence. This is hogwash, plain and simple. We are more than willing to compete in the marketplace of ideas and anxious that decision be made by the maximum possible number of citizens—union members and non-members alike. We'll take our chances.

We believe in democracy, and we believe it is the right to vote that most distinguishes democracy from dictatorship, and that whatever limits it blurs this most important distinction.

On this Labor Day 1970, as the political campaigns begin, we in the American trade union movement renew our commitment to engage as many citizens as possible in this exercise in democracy. We vow to continue the struggle to sweep away the barriers to the voting booth that disgrace democracy and to pave the way to a time when all citizens who wish to vote can do so without impediment.

Contrasts Pose New Challenges

Labor Day statement of I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

FOR AMERICA and for America's working people, Labor Day 1970 emphasizes the contrast between goals achieved and human needs still far from realization.

Never has a country produced so high a standard of living for so many of its citizens. Never has a nation pledged itself so fully to the great principles of democracy and humanity.

Our commitments to human progress are strong—but our needs are very great, and our responsibility is to produce a better balance between goal and achievement for all our citizens.

We are committed to a future of peace; yet we live with war and the threats of war which are disrupting the basic patterns of our civilization.

We are committed to a society of democratic unity; yet we live in a nation seriously divided, between rich and poor, between old and young, between majorities and minorities.

We are committed to a rising standard of living and jobs for every citizen; yet we live in an era when inflation endangers our economic standards; rising unemployment produces hardship, bitterness and violence; and poverty still resists our weak efforts to eliminate it.

We are committed, through the stirring words of our President in his inaugural address, to diminishing national disunity; yet we live in a period when many spokesmen for our government show little concern for casting aside politics-as-usual in the interest of reknitting the torn fabric of American life.

We are committed to improving the American environment; yet we see the forces that cause pollution frustrating many of our best efforts to protect land and water and air from further despoilation.

We are committed to improving the health of the American people; yet a national health insurance program has yet to be enacted, and in industry thousands of workers are killed or injured each year, while we dawdle and debate about a long overdue occupational health and safety law.

We are committed, in short, to improving the quality of life in America; yet we live, it is regrettable to acknowledge, in a period too much identified by hatred, discord, confusion and decay.

Truly, the American labor movement has its greatest challenge in 1970. As the people's lobby, as the collective bargaining representative of working men and women, as the instrument for progressive political education and activity for millions of our people, the unions of America have an extraordinary responsibility to speak and to act for programs that will give us a better future.

America needs the constructive help of alert and militant trade unions. Our trade unions have an opportunity to prove once again that what is good for America is good for labor.

Let us vow, on this 1970 Labor Day, therefore, to prove once again the historic mission of our free and democratic labor movement: to serve the nation and all its people for the common good, for the improvement of our whole society.

A Time for an Honest Appraisal, Shortcomings as Well as Virtues

Excerpts from Labor Day message of C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

SINCE IT FIRST became a national holiday, Labor Day has been observed as a day of acknowledgement. It has been considered a day set aside to give recognition to all those working men and women whose labors helped to build America, operate our industries and provide the many services necessary to maintain and advance our standard of living.

It should also be a day to give recognition to the continuous efforts of organized labor to advance the many social programs so necessary if we are to make the American way a reality for all persons—the efforts to provide better housing, better education, better medical care, more job opportunities and the countless other programs designed to serve all of our citizens which in many cases are promoted by organized labor alone to the benfit of all.

But I also feel . . . it should be a time when we would indulge in an objective appraisal.

Since we are not flawless, and certainly have never pretended to be without faults, such an introspection would have to reveal our shortcomings as well as our finer points. There is no doubt about our having the finest craftsmen in the world.

Now we should honestly raise and consider some fundamental questions about our shortcomings.

- Are we using our skills and our productive capacity to deliver a full day's work for a full day's pay?
- Do we honestly and rigidly observe the provisions of our collective bargaining provisions?
- Is our rate of absenteeism and quits higher than normally should be expected because of personal whims rather than actual illness or other compelling reasons?
- Are the continuous and devastating work stoppages as a result of jurisdictional disputes justified in any way at all?

If we cannot honestly answer those four points above to our true satisfaction then we should certainly begin to take strong action to cure the cause of these ills that are plaguing our industry in many, many areas.

During the past few months we have seen many of our members organizing to react against anti-war demonstrators whose conduct has shocked and outraged them. They are thoroughly disgusted with the small minority who speak in obscene terms, behave vulgarly and act illegally. Nevertheless, we must guard against any intrusion on the right of any individual to disagree peacefully and in an orderly manner. We must stand for the preservation of that right for everyone.

I believe we should mount our guard against another danger. We must not allow our patriotic love for our country, particularly strong in this time of war, to be misinterpreted as an endorsement of public officials or civic leaders whose domestic policies completely contravene our policies and all that we stand for. Certainly, it should not be considered an endorsement of . . . those who would use their offices to destroy our standards, destroy our working conditions, destroy our training programs and even destroy our prevailing wage structure.

Victories, Setbacks, Struggles Tell the Story of Labor's Year

By Harry Conn

THE LABOR YEAR—Labor Day 1969 to Labor Day 1970 . . .

. . . The nation's workers were beset by rising inflation and rising unemployment.

. . . The Farm Workers and the grape boycott scored a major breakthrough.

. . . Boulwarism was crushed and coordinated bargaining came into its own in the General Electric strike.

. . . Postal workers startled the nation with a strike and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany led the negotiation of an historic agreement with the Nixon Administration.

It was a long year, a tough year as the workingman felt pressures from a number of fronts. His real take-home wages dropped as the Administration's fiscal and monetary moves produced more unemployment but did not halt rising living costs.

The labor movement was firm in its opposition and condemnation of Nixon economic policies. And there was strong objection to his domestic priorities. too.

Probably the most dramatic showdown between organized labor and the Administration came in the President's appointment of Judge Clement C. Haynsworth, Jr. and later Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Labor played a leading role in urging the Senate to reject confirmation of Haynsworth because of his financial dealings and his anti-union record and Carswell because he was incompetent. The Senate turned down both nominations. Labor cautiously accepted the third nominee, Judge Harry A. Blackmun, who was confirmed.

The final signature by Nixon on the tax bill marked partial success in organized labor's long fight for "tax justice," although it plugged only a few of the tax loopholes enjoyed by the wealthy.

A major victory for labor in Congress was in crushing a conservative GOP-Dixiecrat coalition effort to destroy the political strength of organized labor. Introduced by Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.), it was defeated in the Senate by 59 to 27.

The controversial Philadelphia Plan, established by the Administration to set quotas in minority hiring in construction was called unrealistic by the building trades. In Chicago, Boston, Denver, Los Angeles, St. Louis, Pittsburgh and other cities, building trades unions joined in voluntary programs to further minority hiring.

In addition to the General Electric and grape strikes, there were numerous other walkouts. Another "cause" dispute was that against Iowa Beef Packers by the Meat Cutters. It was won during the year. It took a strike of the Rubber Workers to win a pattern agreement with the Big Four of the industry.

The Teachers won more big-city elections during the year and its president, David Selden, served a 60-day term in jail. Also jailed was New York UFT Pres. Albert Shanker.

Organization in the public employe sector, in addition to the Teachers, continued. Gains were won by the State, County & Municipal Employes, Government Employes, Laborers, Hospital Workers, Service Employes and other unions.

As the Labor Day holiday is being celebrated, the full dimensions of the AFL-CIO Farm Worker victories were not yet totalled up. In California and Arizona, the union headed by Cesar Chavez won major contracts covering table grapes and other crop harvesting which earlier had seemed unattainable.

Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, his wife May and two others died in the spring in an aircraft crash as they were en route to the big UAW Family Education Center at Black Lake, Mich. Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock was elected president of the union and he pledged to carry on in the Reuther tradition.

One major merger took place during the year, tying the AFL-CIO American Bakery & Confectionery Workers with the Bakery & Confectionery Workers. ABC Pres. Daniel Conway was elected president of the new B&C.

There were other changes in union leadership during the year. At the AFL-CIO's Atlantic City convention, Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland was elected to the post for the first time, the federation's Executive Council was expanded by six members, and three members retired—David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, and P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists.

The nine new council members elected were Peter Bommarito, Rubber Workers; Peter Fosco, Laborers; Thomas W. Gleason, Longshoremen; John F. Griner, Government Employes; Charles Luna, United Transportation Union; Frederick O'Neal, Actors' Equity; Floyd E. Smith, Machinists; Louis Stulberg, Ladies Garment Workers, and Jerry Wurf, State, County & Municipal Employes.

Death subsequently took two other council members, A. J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen and Herman D. Kenin of the Musicians. The council vacancies were filled by S. Frank Raftery of the Painters and Alexander J. Rohan, who had been elected president of the Pressmen succeeding DeAndrade.

Also during the year Sec.-Treas. Gilbert Jewell replaced Carl Griepentrog, who retired, as president of the Allied Industrial Workers. . . . Furniture Workers' Pres. Morris Pizer retired and was succeeded by Sec.-Treas. Fred Fulford. . . . Plasterers' Executive Vice Pres. Joseph T. Power was named president following the retirement of Edward J. Leonard. . . . Harold Bowie became acting president of the Boilermakers with Pres. Russell Berg incapacitated. . . . C. R. Pfennings became president of the Train Dispatchers, replacing R. C. Coutts. . . . O'Neal assumed the presidency of the Actors & Artistes following the death of Conrad Nagel. . . . Roy L. Brown filled the president's office of the Brick & Clay Workers, succeeding Paul Pelfrey. . . . Charles Feinstein became the new president of the Leather Goods Workers, replacing Norman Zukowsky. . . . following the death of Pres. William J. Pachler of the Utility Workers, William Munger was named to the office.

Battle for Congress Viewed as Crucial

By Alexander Uhl

MARKED BY A STEADY increase in living costs, in buying power and rising unemployment, the first two years of the Nixon Administration have been hard on workers.

But the next two may be worse unless union men and women get out and vote to prevent a collapse of liberalism in the House and Senate in the November elections.

The problems that face the United States in the immediate future are not merely political ones to be resolved in partisan terms. They are problems that get to the roots of social and economic philosophy, problems that deeply involve workers and especially union workers:

- There is the overriding problem of the economy. Are we to continue the "slow-down" policies of the Nixon Administration and more and more unemployment in its fight against inflation?
- There is the shocking boost in interest rates to usurious proportions that has crippled the construction industry, has all but shut the door on housing for low and middle-income workers and is fastening an interest burden of huge proportion on today's generation of young home-builders. Are these rates to continue?
- There are serious problems of labor-management relations that range all the way from a Nixon-appointed, conservative Supreme Court to a National Labor Relations Board and Labor Dept., with management in the top posts. Is management to take over up and down the line?
- And, of course, there is Viet Nam and how to liquidate an increasingly unpopular American involvement with the broad threat of an even more dangerous confrontation with the Soviet Union in the Middle East. Will Congress and the President get together on what is to be done?

There isn't much that workers can do to change the policies of the Nixon Administration for the next two years, except by making their views known. But there is a mighty influence they can have on the composition of the next Senate and House of Representatives. Here lies the power of the purse; the broad lines of legislation that can help the country in the fields of social security, a national health insurance plan, pressure to rebuild the economy and stop the rise in unemployment.

Elections for the Senate this year are especially threatening to the liberal, pro-labor position that has existed for many years. As is normal, one-third of the Senate seats are up for grabs. There are now 57 Democrats and 43 Republicans in the Senate. The expiring terms are now held by 25 Democrats and 10 Republicans.

Of the 25 Democrats, 21 have been liberal in domestic programs. Of these 21 three are already out of the race—Senators Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota and Stephen M. Young of Ohio who are not running for re-election, and Ralph Yarborough of Texas who was defeated by a conservative Democrat in the primary.

Of the remaining 18 liberal Democrats, at least eight are in marginal states. In addition three leading Senate liberals face strong challenge — Senators Philip Hart of Michigan, Joseph Tydings of Maryland and Harrison Williams of New Jersey.

Half a dozen of the Republican senators are in marginal seats, too. The prospects are best in Illinois where Adlai Stevenson III is the Democrat nominee.

All 435 members of the House, of course, are up for re-election and here the story is again uncertain. There are now 245 Democrats, 189 Republicans and one vacancy in the House.

AFL-CIO COPE estimates that there are some 80 marginal seats in the House, most of them in major industrial states. "The challenge in the House," says COPE, "will be to retain the marginal seats held by liberals and perhaps to pick up some held by conservatives."

But, here again, even at best, the House is likely to be on a tightrope. Even with the substantial advantage maintained by the Democrats during the 91st Congress, there were numerous close votes which the liberals barely managed to win on a number of issues.

What comes out of the new Congress next year, then, points squarely at the American voter this November.

To a very great extent this depends on what union men and women do with their votes — whether they register to begin with and whether they stand by liberal candidates in the final vote. Only a liberal Congress can keep a conservative Administration in check.

The Administration, little by little, has been encouraging industry to fight "exorbitant" wage requests both in automobiles and construction. While it has given official support to a "hands off" policy, Labor Dept. speeches have more than once condemned "inflationary" wage increases.

Nixon will have a further opportunity to put his stamp on the National Labor Relations Board. This year, he replaced Chairman Frank McCulloch with a management lawyer, Edward B. Miller.

On Aug. 27, the term of former chairman McCulloch came to an end, thus opening the way to the appointment of a third Republican.

Next year, the term of Member Gerald A. Brown comes to an end on Aug. 27. That will make another opening, and while the new man must be a Democrat under the law, the President can appoint one of his own choosing.

The year to come will not lack in either new or unfinished business. Great areas of the nation's social and economic life need pressing reform and growth. A national health insurance plan is one of the major issues. So is a social security system adequate to the needs of tomorrow.

American workers urgently need protection on the occupational health and safety front. Congress is still dawdling with the legislation that is needed.

Above all, the rest of 1970 and the year ahead will be the testing ground of how far the Republicans are willing to let unemployment go before they loosen the restriction that they have deliberately placed upon the economy.

Administration officials keep promising that the worst is over, that a recovery can be expected next year. Labor economists are not so optimistic. They see an increasing slowdown in the economy for the next year with a corresponding boost in unemployment, unless prompt measures are taken to fight inflation "selectively" rather than with the present shotgun approach.

The outcome of all these problems is largely dependent on what happens at the polls this November. And American workers will have their say at the ballot box.

At Houston Convention:

IUE Delegates Adopt Goals, Dues Hike to Achieve Them

Houston—A $1 increase in monthly membership dues for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers was approved by the union's 14th convention to provide additional funds for organizing, bargaining, education and legislative drives.

Hinging on the ratification of IUE members, the three-step increase would become effective next Jan. 1 with a 50-cent boost in minimum dues to $5.50. Two additional increases of 25-cents each would go into effect Jan. 1, 1973, and Jan. 1, 1975, raising the total minimum dues for members to $6.

After 1975, an automatic dues increase of 25 cents will go into effect every two years, but this is subject to review by the IUE's 1976 convention.

The $1 dues increase will be sliced up this way: 48 cents will go to locals, 40 cents to the international and 9 cents to IUE districts. The remaining 3 cents will be used for a citizenship fund administrated by the districts.

The 600 delegates also voted to increase the union's strike fund by 10 percent through a change in the way dues income is allocated.

In another constitutional change, the convention voted mandatory retirement of elected IUE officers, executive board members and staff members. The elected officials, however, would be allowed to complete current terms of office after reaching 65. Two-year extensions would also be allowed in certain cases.

The two top IUE officers, president and secretary-treasurer, are elected to four-year terms.

In other convention action, delegates defeated a foreign policy resolution calling for the withdrawal of the U.S. troops from Southeast Asia by Dec. 31, 1971.

A resolution on women workers was adopted pledging IUE efforts to fight for improvements in state equal pay laws and a vigorous crackdown on violators of federal wage standards, and urging federal and state funding of more child care centers for working mothers.

The resolution expressed opposition, however, to the pending Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution "because of its potentially destructive impact on protective labor legislation for women."

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings in an appeal for intensified political action, warned that labor is in danger of losing the November election. Many union members are not registered to vote and others who have been polled "show antagonism to the union position," Jennings said.

"If we lose the Senate, there may be legislation that will gut our ability to operate not only as a union, but also in the shops," he declared.

Jennings reported that a team of IUE representatives will be sent around the nation to arouse interest in the elections among members. They will also campaign to curb imports of electrical products.

The convention called for stepped-up organizing efforts including new organizing programs "in the white collar, professional and technical areas with the full realization that the future of the IUE and the entire labor movement lies in the unionization of these workers."

It further noted that growth in the nation's work force is outstripping organizing victories, adding that "technical developments, automation and assembly lines that produce goods much faster than can be consumed have combined to force many unions to organize at an increasingly rapid pace just to stay even."

The convention set IUE bargaining guidelines on pensions calling for benefits of $10 a month for each year of service or a percentage formula based on the last five years of earnings—whichever is greater—and vesting after five years on a 50 percent basis with full vesting after 10 years with benefits payable after age 55.

Frederick O'Neal, president of Actors' Equity and chairman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee, presented the union's John F. Kennedy award to IUE District 3. The award is given to the district that best implements the previous convention's resolution on civil rights and women's rights.

Major speakers in the latter half of the convention included John W. Gardner, former Secretary of Health, Educaton & Welfare, and Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.).

Washington, D.C., was selected as the site of the 1972 IUE convention.

AFFILIATION AWARD of the AFL-CIO is presented to Pres. Paul Jennings, right, of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers by Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland at the IUE convention in Houston. The award is given to international unions that have 80 percent of their locals affiliated with state central bodies.

Coalition Cites Pitfalls In 'Equal Rights' Clause

Despite the lopsided victory in the House for the so-called Equal Rights Amendment for women, a newly-formed coalition of women's groups and labor organizations is hopeful of blocking its passage in the Senate.

Coalition leaders called the proposed amendment a threat to labor laws protecting women that took years of struggle to achieve. They also expressed fear that when these laws are washed out by the amendment, chaos would result.

"We oppose the adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment since we believe that the adoption of the amendment would jeopardize existing labor laws and standards that apply to women," declared Myra K. Wolfgang, chairman of a conference that led to the formation of the coalition.

Mrs. Wolfgang, a vice president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, said that the amendment would create confusion in the wide field of laws relating to property, personal status and marriage.

Mrs. Mary Keyserling, former director of the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept., said although there is sex discrimination in some laws, the amendment would not sweep away the inequities.

It would be no "panacean miracle" that would give women instant emancipation, added Mrs. Wolfgang.

"We, who want equal opportunities, equal pay for equal work and equal status for women, know that frequently we obtain real equality through a different of treatment rather than identity in treatment," Mrs. Wolfgang declared.

The chief conflict between proponents and opponents of the amendment "is not whether women should be discriminated against, but what constitutes discrimination," she added.

Mrs. Keyserling suggested that instead of the amendment, orderly legislative revisions should be conducted as the "practical way to erase such unwise discrimination as still exist in laws."

There is no easy solution to overcome centuries of prejudice and discrimination, she said, adding that what is needed is "widespread educaton, specific legislation and enlightened court interpretations."

Mrs. Keyserling said it was "romantic" folly to believe in a "women's lib solution" to the problems of social equality. She also said that the Senate is not likely to be "romantic" and enact the amendment as the House did.

The coalition is formed arcund a nucleus of these organizations: Communications Workers, Meat Cutters, National Council of Negro Women, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, National Council of Jewish Women, National Council of Catholic Women, National Consumers League, Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Mail Handlers Prepare For Postal Bargaining

A bigger, stronger union of mail handlers hailed the results of two years of merger with the Laborers and looked to even further gains in the new era of collective bargaining in the postal service.

The first biennial assembly of the Mail Handlers Division of the Laborers drew 327 delegates from 160 local unions — a larger number than had ever attended conventions of the predecessor union.

They represented a new high of 25,000 members—up from 17,000 at the start of 1969, and a big step toward the goal of 100 percent organization of the postal craft the Mail Handlers represent in national collective bargaining.

Solidarity with the labor movement was a main theme at the convention, and a resolution urged participation of all locals in AFL-CIO central bodies.

The resolution also praised the leadership of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and his staff in standing behind postal workers during the widespread strikes of last spring, in helping the postal unions negotiate the pay raise and collective bargaining package that emerged, and in working to win its approval from Congress.

Meany's executive assistant and spokesman for the unions in the postal negotiations, James C. Gildea, told the delegates that "the most significant long-term result of the negotiations" was establishment of "first-class status" for postal workers.

"It is the beginning of the end of paternalism for public workers everywhere," he stressed, "and the beginning of their right to economic self-determination."

That factor, Gildea suggested, "transcends even the wage increases, compression of the wage schedule, and all the other provisions" of the economic package.

Laborers Pres. Peter Fosco presided at the convention and major reports were given by the division's national director, Lonnie L. Johnson, and the two assistants directors, Norman Orenstein and Al Kinsey.

Delegates gave their verdict on the results of the merger with the Laborers—in a unanimous vote reaffirming their confidence in the arrangement.

NLRB Rejects Backpay as Remedy For Employer's Refusal to Bargain

union would have achieved through collective bargaining except for management's refusal to negotiate

In this particular case, he noted, a good guide to the amount of lost benefits would be the increases the company negotiated at other plants where workers were represented by the same union.

Because of the importance of the precedent, the NLRB invited interested labor and management groups to file briefs and participate in oral arguments on the issue.

Attorneys for the AFL-CIO argued that the labor board had the power to order such a remedy, termed the proposed compensation "vitally necessary" and stressed that there were "valid methods" of determining the amount of lost wages.

The decision was the most important case in which the new chairman of the NLRB, Edward B. Miller, has participated. And it was one of the last cases in which the former chairman, Frank W. McCulloch, served as a member of the board.

The two were on opposite sides.

Miller, joined by Members John B. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr., expressed "complete agreement" that the customary remedies the NLRB imposes are "inadequate" but said the labor board didn't have the power to take the action the trial examiner had recommended.

"Much as we appreciate the need for more adequate remedies," the NLRB majority said, "we believe that, as the law now stands, the proposed remedy is a matter for Congress, not the board."

Declaring that it could not compel an employer to put into effect increases he had not agreed to, the board majority cited a recent Supreme Court decision involving the H. K. Porter Co. In that case, the court said the NLRB didn't have the authority to order an employer to agree to a contract provision—even if it had found that his refusal to do so was aimed solely at frustrating an agreement with the union.

McCulloch, whose term on the NLRB expired Aug. 27, just two days after the decision was issued, was joined by Gerald A. Brown in a dissent.

The Supreme Court decision, they argued, was no bar to the back pay remedy since the higher salary scale would not be written into a contract and future conditions of employment would be determined through collective bargaining.

Nor would it be "punitive," they stressed. Workers would merely be "compensated for the injury suffered as a result of their employer's unlawful refusal to bargain, and the employer would thereby be prohibited from enjoying the fruit of its forbidden conduct."

A mere order to the employer to bargain with the union "clearly does not repair the injury to the employes" caused by "denial of their rights during the past five years," McCulloch and Brown declared.

The AFL-CIO brief, along with companion briefs submitted by attorneys for the UAW and the Teamsters, stressed that employer tactics of delay and defiance serve the dual purpose of weakening the union and giving an employer a competitive advantage over firms that promptly meet their obligation to collective bargaining.

As long as there is no effective remedy the NLRB can impose, the AFL-CIO argued, "there is much for the employer to gain and little if any thing except lawyers' fees, for him to lose" by refusing to bargain until every last court appeal and delaying tactic has been exhausted.

CORRECTION

An error in the rollcall tally in the report on the 91st Congress which appeared in the Aug. 29 issue of the AFL-CIO News inadvertently misrepresented the cumulative voting record of Rep. Orval Hansen (R-Idaho).

Hansen, a first-term congressman, should have been recorded with a cumulative total of 6 Right votes by AFL-CIO standards and 4 Wrong votes. While his votes on the individual issues were correctly listed, the cumulative total was incorrectly shown as 7 R, 27 W. It has been corrected on the reprints that are being made of the four-page section.

Labor Day 1970:

Messages Spell Out Needs of Workers

To AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, the answer to confrontation in the streets is the democracy of the voting booth. And the obstacles to voting imposed by state laws "as obsolete as the 12-hour day" are a "disgrace" to democracy.

"In too many states, laws are deliberately designed to limit, rather than to increase, voting participation," Kirkland charged.

Residence requirements that disenfranchise millions of Americans in every election, requirements for annual registration, closing the voting books 10 months before an election, were among the "absurdities" cited by Kirkland.

"It is time to cease playing around piecemeal with the election laws," Kirkland said, and to establish "national standards for registration and voting that encourage maximum participation in democracy."

I. W. Abel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., sounded a Labor Day call for America's unions to renew their commitment "to serve the nation and all its people for the common good."

"We are committed to a rising standard of living and jobs for every citizen," Abel noted. "Yet we live in an era when inflation endangers our economic standards; rising unemployment produces hardship, bitterness and violence, and poverty still resists our weak efforts to eliminate it."

A commitment to improving the environment is weakened by powerful forces that cause pollution, he charged. Failure to enact a national health insurance program weakens the commitment to improving health, "and in industry thousands of workers are killed or injured . . . while we dawdle and debate about a long overdue occupational health and safety law."

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. stressed labor's pride in its skills and productive capacity, but urged that Labor Day be also a time for "introspection" when shortcomings would be honestly considered.

The high standards of wages and benefits that union building tradesmen have achieved are endangered, Haggerty warned, whenever union members fail to deliver a "a full day's work for a full day's pay."

And, he asked, are "work stoppages as a result of jurisdictional disputes justified in any way at all?"

Continuing the theme of critical self-examination, Haggerty said the "contempt" union members feel against "so-called revolutionaries . . . who speak in obscene terms, behave vulgarly and act illegally" should not lead to "intrusion on the right of any individual to disagree peacefully and in an orderly manner."

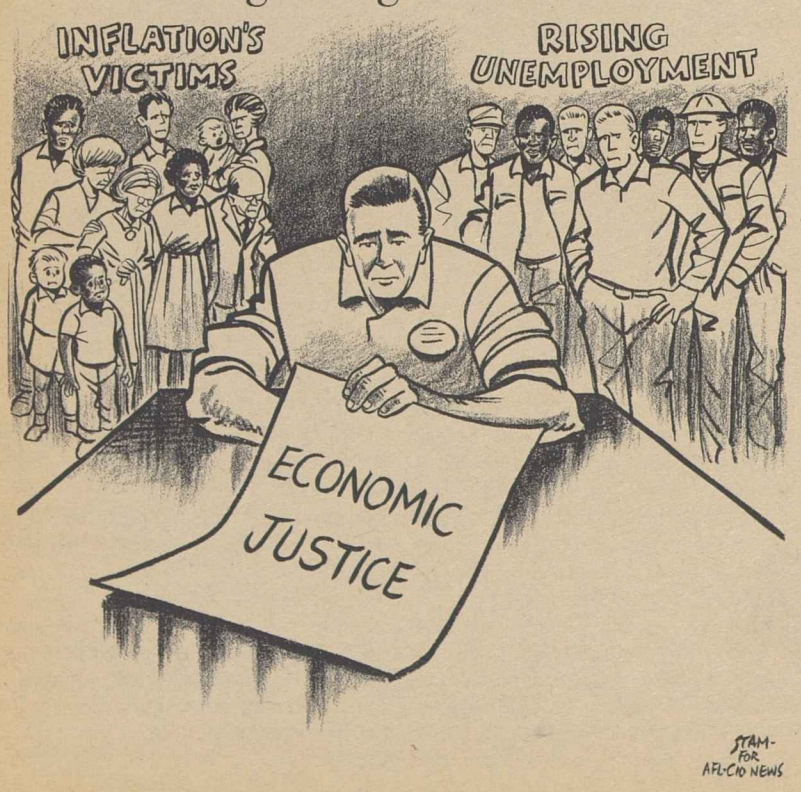
Likewise, he stressed, "we must not allow our patriotic love for our country, particularly strong in this time of war, to be misinterpreted as an endorsement of public officials or civic leaders whose domestic policies completely contravene our policies and all that we stand for."

The labor movement, he said, "will be in the forefront in helping to build a better America for all regardless of age, race, color or creed."

Aid Granted Import Victims At Piano Plant

Trade adjustment benefits were approved for about 260 Machinists who lost their jobs when a Rockford, Ill., piano parts plant closed down because of the impact of imports.



The Labor Dept. declared the workers eligible for the assistance up to 65 percent of their average weekly wages but not exceeding benefits of $85 a week.

The workers, members of IAM Local 1553, were laid off by Wood & Brooks Co. which closed the Rockford plant completely last March. The firm lost its major customer to the imports of piano action parts from Mexico, the Labor Dept. said.

The certification by the Labor Dept. came after the U.S. Tariff Commission ruled that the workers became unemployed and underemployed due to the imports.

Workers who were laid off after Sept. 9, 1969, are eligible to apply for the assistance benefits. Duration of the benefits is normally limited to 52 weeks, but an additional 26 weeks may be allowed for workers to complete training courses. Up to 13 more weeks is also allowed for unemployed workers over age 60.

Bargaining Committee

Changes Called Vital To Family Aid Goals

jobs will not be paid less than the federal minimum wage or the prevailing rate for similar work in the locality, whichever is higher. Working conditions should also meet prevailing standards.

In other areas, the AFL-CIO warned against subsidizing low-wage employers who hire welfare recipients, called for a vastly expanded day-care program so that mothers who want to work will be assured their children will not be neglected, and strongly urged "a large-scale, federally financed and administered public service employment program."

"We have no confidence that private employers are in a position to provide nearly enough jobs at decent pay for welfare recipients who want them," the AFL-CIO stated. "Mandatory training for non-existent jobs is plain foolishness."

The federation stressed that "decent jobs at decent pay are the road to a better life for the employable people on welfare," but noted that "there will still be large numbers who cannot work and will have to depend entirely upon their family assistance payments."

These payments should—at least within a very few years—be no less than the poverty level, the AFL-CIO said, and "should be adjusted periodically to reflect increases in living costs."

The fate of the legislation still remained in doubt as the Senate committee moved ahead with its hearings.

Pres. Nixon, describing the bill as "the most important piece of domestic legislation of the past 35 years," urged the Senate Finance committee to report out the bill and expressed his willingness to go along with a pilot plan proposal that had been suggested by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.).

This would involve a year of field testing the program in various sections of the nation to work out administrative problems, with the nationwide program to begin on Jan. 1, 1972, six months later than originally proposed.

During the AFL-CIO testimony, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) said he agreed that "we should vote on the proposal before we go home" and said he has found "a lot of support for some of the amendments that I think ought to be in the bill."

One of the amendments he will push, Long said, is the expansion of day care facilities that the AFL-CIO has urged.

The Nixon proposal failed, however, to win the support of the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. John J. Williams of Delaware.

Williams said he might go along with authorization for a pilot experimental program, but he was opposed to passage of a nationwide bill at this time.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield told newsmen that a post-election session of Congress appeared inevitable to complete action on major bills—with the family assistance legislation one of the measures to be considered then.

With all members of the House and one-third of the Senate running for election this November, either adjournment or recess is expected by mid-October.

A return after the election would leave the legislative windup to a "lame-duck" Congress, since newly-elected members would not take their seats until the start of the 92nd Congress in January.

Airline Unions of World Schedule Miami Meeting

Delegates representing seven million airline employes in 81 nations will attend the biennial International Civil Aviation Conference, which opens Sept. 28 at Miami Beach.

The conference is sponsored by the International Transport Workers Federation and the agenda will include discussions of job safety, occupational hazards and international cooperation to prevent hijacking of planes.

Crafts Launch Outreach Plan In Des Moines

The Des Moines Building & Construction Trades Council has received a $54,515 contract from the the Labor Dept. for an Apprenticeship Outreach project to prepare minority youths for the trades.

The Des Moines project calls for the recruiting of 300 youths for the preparation and selection of 30 of them to quality for apprenticeship training.

With Des Moines, there are now 79 Outreach programs serving 81 major industrial cities across the country, the Labor Dept. reported. For fiscal 1970, the department said that 6,914 minority youths were indentured in apprenticeship programs after preparation by Outreach projects.

Eight Outreach projects serving nine cities were also launched recently by the National Urban League to prepare an additional 215 minority youths for apprenticeships in the building trades. The Urban League now operates 29 Outreach projects in 32 cities.

The Labor Dept. added a $259,875 grant in two contract modifications to boost the federal investment in the Urban League's programs to $1,697,035.

Added to the Urban League projects are Hartford, Conn., for 30 youths; Muskegon and Battle Creek, Mich., 20 each; Minneapolis-St. Paul, 55; and in the South Carolina cities of Columbia, 30, Aiken, Charleston and Greenville, 20 each, the Labor Dept. reported.

Union Wins Challenge Of Federal Strike Oath

Federal employes will no longer have to swear that they won't "assert the right to strike against the government" or join any organization of government employes that does "assert" such a right.

U.S. Solicitor Gen. Erwin N. Griswold in effect conceded that the Letter Carriers and the American Civil Liberties Union were correct in challenging the constitutionality of the oath.

That's what a three-judge federal district court ruled last year in upholding a claim by the ACLU and the Letter Carriers that the oath violated freedom of speech.

Apart from the symbolic effect at a time of greater public employe militancy, the decision was seen as eliminating an obstacle sometimes encountered in organizing federal employes. Even though nothing in the oath barred membership in any of the unions functioning in the federal government, organizers have reported that some employes were fearful of joining trade unions because of uncertainty of the meaning of the oath.

Its wording bore a chilling resemblance to the now illegal "yellow-dog contracts" in private industry, in which new employes promised they wouldn't join a union.

The court case did not touch on a section of the pledge in which government workers promise not to strike. A challenge to that provision has been filed by the Postal Clerks and is awaiting a hearing in federal district court.

The U.S. Civil Service Commission has not yet determined whether it will eliminate the entire no-strike oath for federal employes, or just the sections dealing with assertion of the right to strike and membership in unions asserting the right.

Labor's Programs Keyed To Nation's Basic Needs

Jobless Rate Edges up to 5.1 Percent

Unemployment remained at recession levels during August as increased joblessness among blue collar workers cancelled out an upturn in white collar employment.

The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate edged up from 5 percent in July to 5.1 percent in August, the highest it has been in nearly six years. One year ago the jobless rate was 3.5 percent.

The monthly report of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics showed a sharp rise in blue-collar unemployment—from 6.6 percent in July to 7 percent in August. This compares with 3.8 percent a year ago.

Construction unemployment, already a high 11 percent in July, shot up to 12.2 percent in August.

And the teenage unemployment rate rose from 13.9 to 15.9 percent over the month—the highest since April 1965—with most of the increase among white girls.

White-collar unemployment dropped to 2.7 percent from its July high of 3.1 percent, but still was above June levels.

Administration officials remained optimistic that a pickup in the economy remains in sight and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson predicted that "we are just a few months away from a sizeable improvement in the unemployment rate."

May Go Higher

Nevertheless, he said in an Issues and Answers television interview, the jobless rate "might go slightly higher" before it starts moving down again.

The 5 percent level of recent months, Hodgson agreed, is "too high". But he said it was the "minimum" price of trying to "cool" inflation while seeking "to move from a wartime economy to a peacetime economy."

The months of high unemployment were taking their toll, however, as the number of persons unemployed 15 weeks or more reached 736,000 in August, nearly double the figure of a year ago.

Manufacturing employment dropped another 75,000 over the month, continuing a steady decline. Factory employment was 945,000 below August of 1969.

Construction employment was down 40,000 in August and 160,000 below a year ago.

The Labor Dept. analysis noted that "until April of this year, employment increases in the service sector of the economy had been adequate to counter the sharp losses in goods-producing industries. Beginning in April, however, employ-

White House Fete Honors U.S. Labor

"When the chips are down," the President of the United States said, "American labor has never been found wanting."

In his travels, Pres. Nixon told his guests, he has found that "a strong, free, independent labor movement is essential to the preservation and the growth of freedom in any country in the world."

Never, he stressed, has he found a dictatorship with a free labor movement. "And I have yet to find a country in which there was a free labor movement which was governed by a dictatorship."

The occasion was Labor Day.

The place was the East Room of the White House, where a cross-section of union leaders and AFL-CIO officials had dined with Pres. Nixon, his family and members of his Cabinet.

Nixon was proposing a toast at the conclusion of the dinner "to the builders of America, those in American labor . . ." and "to George Meany, who stands for the best in free labor and for the best in America."

Later, on the White House lawn, the President would bring a similar message to thousands of union families invited to an evening of pageantry and entertainment dedicated to "the free labor movement of America."

There was another toast given at the White House dinner, the traditional "toast to the President of the United States," proposed by Meany.

It was a serious, but not a solemn occasion.

AS ARMY BAND plays the Star Spangled Banner, Mrs. Meany and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stand alongside Mrs. Nixon and Pres. Nixon for the climax to the Labor Day celebration at the White House—a "torchlight tattoo."

Economic, Social Goals Emphasized

By John R. Oravec

The economic, social and health needs of the American people demand a much stronger search for solutions through legislation and collective bargaining, leaders of the trade union movement declared in a series of Labor Day appearances on radio and television.

They emphasized that organized labor's goals are not sought selfishly for union members alone, but are designed to benefit all citizens—just as labor's programs have benefitted the nation in the past. And, they noted, even the gains negotiated at the bargaining table spin off to bolster the wages of all workers, whether they belong to unions or not.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, appearing on the Columbia Broadcasting System radio network, focused on labor's drive for national health insurance.

He termed it labor's number one goal—"a goal not only for America's workers and their families, but for all the American people: rich and poor; young and old; black and white; employed and unemployed." (Excerpts, Page 5.)

"Labor has always believed that the right to a decent standard of health care has to be considered a basic human right," Meany said, adding that "as long as that right

Sept. 15 Deadline Set:

Rail Unions Extend Strike Date 5 Days

By Eugene A. Kelly

Four unions representing more than 500,000 railroad workers agreed at the government's request to postpone a strike deadline and to keep seeking contract agreements with the major U.S. railroads.

The unions were ready to strike at one minute after midnight Sept. 10 after exhausting all voluntary settlement possibilities in nearly 16 months of bargaining for higher wages and improved working rules.

Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., announced the postponement of strike action after meeting with both sides. He said the unions advised him they will wait no longer than 12:01 a.m., Sept. 15, for an acceptable offer from rail management.

He reported that leaders of the four unions were emphatic in stating "this is the only extension they plan to give."

The organizations involved are the United Transportation Union, the Railway & Airline Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes and dining car employes represented by the Hotel & Restaurant union.

If no settlement is reached in the five-day grace period, Pres. Nixon has power under the Railway Labor Act to appoint an emergency board and embargo any strike or lockout action for at least 60 days.

But, said Usery, "the government feels that an emergency board is not the answer to good, hard collective bargaining."

Usery reported that, while some progress had been made in talks arranged by himself and Francis J. O'Neill of the National Mediation

House Votes Pay Boost Package For Federal Blue-Collar Group

By David L. Perlman

The House voted 231-90 approval of a labor-supported bill that would provide additional pay steps and a higher night differential for more than 700,000 blue-collar workers employed by the federal government.

It ignored strong Administration objections that the legislation would be "inflationary" and voted down all amendments aimed at weakening the bill and cutting its estimated $230 million-a-year cost.

The package translates into an average 5.7 percent pay hike for blue-collar workers, whose wage base is tied to area prevailing pay scales.

A major feature of the bill, which now goes to the Senate, ends the "second-class" status of an estimated 130,000 workers who have not previously been treated as full-fledged federal employes. They are employed by military post exchanges, officers' clubs and other self-financing activities that do not receive direct government appropriations.

Under the House bill, they would be brought under the wage board system. And an amendment to the bill also assures them of holiday pay and premium pay for Sunday work.

The bill also writes into law and strengthens the present Federal Prevailing Wage Advisory Committee, which now has six management and five union members.

It would make the chairman of the committee a full-time official, appointed by the President, and with no ties to any government agency. There would be five union members, as at present, and the management side would consist of four representatives of agencies with the greatest number of wage board employes plus a representative of the Civil Service Commission.

The basic pay change in the House bill would establish a five-step pay system.

Carswell Fails In Senate Bid, Faubus Loses

Florida Republicans crushed the political hopes of G. Harrold Carswell and Arkansas Democrats blocked a comeback attempt by former Gov. Orval E. Faubus.

Carswell wanted to run for the Senate where he could do battle with what he termed the "ultra-liberals," meaning the senators who had rejected his nomination to the Supreme Court.

He resigned his lifetime appointment as a federal appellate court judge to run in the Republican senatorial primary—with the blessings of Florida's flamboyant Gov. Claude Kirk.

But Rep. William C. Cramer, a conservative veteran of 16 years in the House, won the GOP Senate nomination by a thumping majority of nearly 2-1.

Nine Staff Internships Established by AFL-CIO

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced establishment of a formal internship program at the federation's Washington headquarters. While internships previously existed in the Departments of Research and Community Services, this year the program has been expanded and formalized, Meany noted.

Nine recent college graduates from various parts of the nation are participating in the new program, in the Departments of International Affairs, Civil Rights, Education, Research, Legislation, Social Security, Public Relations and Publications, and Community Services.

Each intern will undergo intensive training in a staff development course at the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center. Additional training and work programs will be designed to meet individual needs during the one-year program. It is expected that the interns will be available for placement with international unions and AFL-CIO state central bodies following their year in Washington.

"There is a need in the trade union movement for qualified young staff members," Meany said, "but young people today have not had much of a chance to develop an understanding of the objectives and policies of the labor movement.

"This program has been created to promote that understanding, to provide a link between school and the world of the worker, and to make available trained young people to the labor movement. I am very impressed with the caliber of our interns and of all the applicants for these posts. Their interest in the labor movement is an encouraging sign for the future."

Factory Job Vacancies Show Continued Decline

The availability rate of jobs in manufacturing is following a downtrend, initial monthly reports by the Labor Dept. show.

Job openings in manufacturing declined to six vacancies per 1,000 jobs in June, the Labor Dept. reported. This is a drop of two openings from May, when the department began to issue monthly reports on the vacancies.

A total of 123,000 jobs were vacant in June, compared with 240,000 in the year-ago month when there were 12 unfilled positions for every 1,000 jobs, the department noted.

The number of job openings in manufacturing closely reflects the performance of the nation's unemployment rate. When the jobless rate was hovering at the 3.5 percent level in May 1969, there were 290,000 vacancies—or 14 openings for every 1,000 jobs, the report noted.

The Labor Dept. began collecting data on job vacancies in manufacturing early last year with the cooperation of state employment agencies.

So far, the information is being gathered on unfilled manufacturing jobs from 25 urban centers, but the Labor Dept. said it plans to expand the survey to 50 major urban areas and take in all of the non-farm job sector.

A May-to-June decline in the rate of vacancies also occurred last year and this appears to reflect the added hiring of recent graduates and summer employes, the department said.

All of the industries for which the data is available showed lower rates than in 1969. Reductions were widespread in the durable goods industries, reflecting the impact of the economic slowdown and cutbacks in defense production, Labor Dept. said.

Vacancy rates in the nondurable goods industries showed less variation from the year-ago levels, the department pointed out.

Blue-collar and service occupations accounted for about 70 percent of the job vacancies and 30 percent were available in the white-collar field, the Labor Dept. reported.

White House Celebration Salutes Labor

"I may be bouncing on your head tomorrow morning," Meany told the President.

But whatever the differences over issues and policies, labor is aware of "the awesome load that is placed on the shoulders of the President of the United States."

Every president he has known, of whatever political background, Meany told the gathering, has been "dedicated to the idea of serving the American people" and has shared labor's conviction that "the American way of life, as we have seen it develop in this country in the last 180 years, is the best that the mind of man has been able to devise."

In addition to the labor leaders and their wives, the guest list included five Cabinet secretaries, top White House officials and heads of independent agencies.

It was, Meany noted, the first time that a Labor Day celebration was held in the White House.

And, Pres. Nixon observed, the historic room in which the dinner was held "is not a Republican room or a Democratic room. This room belongs to all of America. This house belongs to all of America. And America tonight very proudly honors American labor and its leaders."

is denied or abridged, this nation's promise to its citizens of the right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness cannot be kept."

He noted that a national health insurance program has been on the country's agenda for many years. It was part of the original Social Security legislation 35 years ago, but special interest groups succeeded in blocking its passage.

Progress was made through the adoption of Medicare and Medicaid programs, Meany said. But the United States stands "a long way" from the top 10 nations of the world in health care.

Meany continued:

"In nearly every area of human health we lag behind every developed nation in the western world. And we are slipping farther behind every day.

"We say: The United States must be number one in medical care. We can't avoid this step if the nation is to live up to its promise.

"We are convinced that a majority of the American people and a majority of Congress agree that building the highest possible level of national health is a matter of the most urgent priority—that delay can no longer be tolerated.

"The answer is national health insurance," he emphasized.

On the CBS telecast "Face the Nation," Meany repeated his earlier observation that problems brought on by the faltering national economy—"and I don't see any bottoming out"—will be the key issue in the November elections.

He also expanded on his view that the Democratic Party is suffering from disorganization, stressing that this is "mostly at the local level."

He charged that some fringe groups would like to see the party go down in defeat, so that they could rebuild it in their own fashion.

Meany stressed that organized labor will continue to support the same type of candidates it has backed in other years.

"When I say the Democratic party has disintegrated, I mean in a number of . . . congressional districts, where the candidate is obviously entitled to our support, we're going to give him that support," Meany declared. "But that is the only support he's going to get, because there is no political machine."

In a radio message over the Mutual Broadcasting System, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared that the collective bargaining process developed by labor and management over the years has evolved into a very effective instrument.

"Strikes and lockouts are . . . part of the collective bargaining process," he said, "but they are a much smaller part than most people realize."

Kirkland stressed that agreements are reached 98 percent of the time without strikes or lockouts. In the 2 percent of time when shutdowns do occur, he added, "the total time lost amounts to a great deal less than the time lost because of coffee breaks or the common cold."

Kirkland also noted:

"Collective bargaining is a tool for reasonable people who set achievable goals, who are willing to make and keep firm commitments . . . re-examine their goals . . . and move forward for another period of time. So it is a continuing open-ended process.

"The conviction that every American is entitled to share in it has made the American economy the strongest on earth. American workers are the most productive on earth because they share in the benefits of production."

Although this may not be true for all workers, Kirkland said that the goal of the trade union movement is "to win for every worker the right to join a union, to have a voice in his own future, to play a role in the nation's economic life."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. I. W. Abel, speaking on the National Broadcasting Co. radio network, cited labor's successes at the bargaining table in improving conditions for America's workers.

"We have gained benefits and protections for union members that not only were unheard of 20 and 30 years ago; they weren't even dreamed of," he said.

But despite wage gains, the worker has been squeezed by increasing prices and decreasing purchasing power while corporate profits continue to zoom. Abel noted.

And with the Nixon Administration's economic policies, the result has been "tight money . . . which jacked up interest rates, increased prices all along the line and caused production cutbacks with resulting unemployment," he added.

American labor has the right, Abel said, "to insist that all share fairly in the benefits of our private enterprise system . . . to insist that human values and priorities not be drowned by the onrushing wave of technology . . . to insist that the private enterprise system in America does not exist for the primary purpose of making a profit for owners."

On the American Information Radio Network, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. S. Frank Raftery cited labor's concern for developing the nation's future craftsmen and its continued involvement in community services and social programs.

"Labor unions today are attempting to bring the country's drop-out youth off the street corners and welfare rolls and back into the work force . . . by supplying instructors for the Job Corps and participating in the Manpower Training & Development Program," Raftery said.

He also cited efforts to recruit skilled trade unionists for the Peace Corps to train people in under-developed countries.

Raftery said the labor movement is showing concern on where it will find its future craftsmen because of the extreme emphasis on higher education.

He asked: "Have we pushed too hard for a college education for all, while we have neglected our responsibilities to offer incentive and opportunity to young people who may want . . . to be skilled mechanics — to be builders with their hands as well as their minds?"

"It takes all types to make this world," he said. "It takes the college-trained and it takes those trained in what used to be called 'the school of hard knocks.' "

He stressed that youngsters are crying for attention across the generation gap—"and we must recognize this."

Raftery said that young people who are coming into the labor movement in increased numbers today will be the builders of tomorrow.

Treasury Sets Savings Bonds Interest Bonus

U.S. savings bonds will be worth more money when held to maturity, the Treasury Dept. announced.

Persons who do not cash in their bonds before the present maturity period of five years and 10 months will receive an extra one-half of 1 percent interest as a bonus, bringing the effective interest rate to a record 5.5 percent. Thus a $25 face value bond, purchased for $18.75, will actually return $25.73.

The extra interest was authorized by legislation passed by Congress and approved by the President. Its intent is to encourage people to hold on to their savings bonds and reverse a 20-month pattern of redemptions exceeding sales.

Treasury officials stressed that it is not necessary to cash in existing bonds in order to obtain the bonus. It will be paid on all bonds redeemed after having reached maturity.

NATION'S LABOR DAY tribute to America's workers was led by Pres. Nixon, the host to a cross-section of trade union leaders at a dinner in the historic East Room of the White House. At the head table, from left: Mrs. Hodgson, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Mrs. Shultz, Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson, Mrs. Nixon, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Pres. Nixon, Mrs. Meany, Management & Budget Dir. George P. Shultz, and Mrs. Kirkland. Nixon called the event a "salute to labor."

Chavez Asks Curbs On Grower Violence

Salinas, Calif.—"The vigilante atmosphere hangs heavy over Salinas," Cesar Chavez wired California Atty. Gen. Thomas Lynch.

And the director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee called on the attorney general "to immediately investigate the lawless conditions existing in Monterey County."

He charged that UFWOC and AFL-CIO officials are living under threatening conditions and in constant danger of assault by allies of the growers.

Chavez cited examples of UFWOC pickets being knocked down by trucks, others beaten and at least five bomb threats at UFWOC headquarters as some 7,000 workers went into the third week of their strike for recognition of the farm workers' union.

Twelve days earlier, UFWOC Gen. Counsel Jerry Cohen and a UFWOC organizer were severely beaten on the Al Hansen ranch. Cohen was hospitalized five days with a concussion.

On Sept. 8, 40 UFWOC pickets were arrested at the Bruce Church Co. ranch on charges of violating a temporary restraining order forbidding picketing.

Because some 30 similar injunctions have been issued in Monterey County by Superior Court Judge Stanley Lawson, Chavez decided to challenge publicly the court's order the next day and invite arrest.

He charged that the restraining orders are unconstitutional and challenged the sheriff to arrest him and other volunteer pickets if the sheriff believed the orders to be legal. He promised to send 15 pickets to the Bruce Church ranch every hour until all UFWOC members were in jail.

"A jail with bars is no worse than a jail without bars," Chavez said.

For two hours Chavez led the pickets while two deputies watched but did nothing. After about 90 minutes the deputies left.

Chavez then announced that since the sheriff was not enforcing the unconstitutional court order, he would order picketing resumed at all ranches throughout the valley.

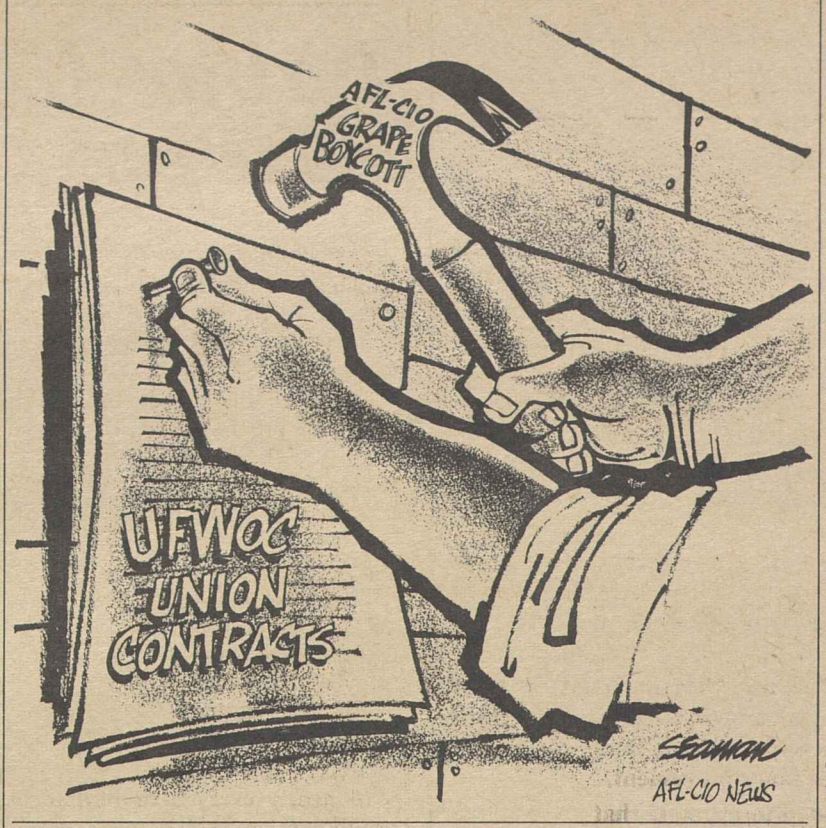
The Farm Workers' union has been fighting for recognition and recision of contracts signed by some 200 growers with the Teamsters Union.

To date Inter Harvest, a subsidiary of the United Fruit Co., has rescinded its Teamster contract and negotiated another with UFWOC which provides nearly three times as much in benefits for the farm workers.

Two other major lettuce growers, Freshpict, a subsidiary of Purex Corp., and D'Arrigo, a major Salinas firm, have agreed to recognize UFWOC and negotiate a contract. To date, however, the Teamsters are refusing to rescind their contract, although both firms admit the majority of their workers are UFWOC members.



On Sept. 3 UFWOC filed a $240-million antitrust suit against Salinas Valley lettuce growers charging that for five years they have conspired to keep lettuce prices up by regulating production.

The suit was filed on behalf of farm workers who have been deprived of work because of the limiting of production.

About 40 percent of California's strawberry producers also have agreed to recognize UFWOC and contract negotiations have started. One major grower, however, Pic' N Pac, a subsidiary of S. S. Pierce Co. in Boston, has refused to recognize UFWOC. Its thousand workers struck and the firm lost the rest of its crop.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher met for nearly two hours with Salinas Mayor G. Sid Gadsby and emphasized the mayor's responsibility to maintain peace. UFWOC, the Teamsters and the packing shed workers all have contracts and officers responsible to enforce those contracts, he said. The mayor represents a fourth union, the people, and also must fulfill his contract, Kircher insisted.

Nailed Down

House Votes Pay Boost For Blue-Collar Group

The first three steps would be the same as now: the starting salary would be 96 percent of the prevailing wage; after 26 weeks the worker receives 100 percent, and 78 weeks later moves up to 104 percent of the base rate.

Under the House bill, after two additional years (104 weeks), he would receive 108 percent of the base rate, moving up to the top step of 112 percent two years later.

The new premium pay provision establishes a single nationwide standard in place of the present procedure of following area patterns.

Second shift workers would receive a 7.5 percent differential bonus and third shift workers would receive a 10 percent premium.

Still another feature of the bill provides "saved pay"—a guarantee against a pay cut—for two years for wage board employes who are reduced in grade.

AFL-CIO unions representing federal workers strongly pushed the bill and their efforts were reflected in impressive bipartisan support, despite the Administration's opposition.

Floor manager of the bill was Rep. David N. Henderson (D-N.C.), chairman of the Manpower & Civil Service subcommittee that brought out the legislation.

Leading the opposition were Rep. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa), who termed the bill "dangerously inflationary;" Rep. Edward J. Derwinski (R-Ill.), who sought to cut back existing benefits, and House Republican Leader Gerald R. Ford.

Ford read a letter from Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird, whose department employs the bulk of blue-collar workers, warning that enactment of "unjustified" higher costs would result in "disemployment for thousands of additional federal employes."

Derwinski sought, through an amendment, to repeal legislation enacted two years ago under the sponsorship of former Sen. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.).

The Monroney provision, which unions have charged the Administration has been lax in enforcing, directs government agencies to go beyond the customary 50-mile radius to determine prevailing wage rates when there are no significant numbers of private employes in the locality doing comparable work.

On a preliminary vote, Derwinski's amendment carried. But before final passage of the bill, the House reversed itself and defeated the amendment.

N.Y. Delegates To Review Vote On Rockefeller

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—The 1970 convention of the New York State AFL-CIO went into a 30-day recess after voting to endorse Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller for re-election to a four-year term.

The recess was called after a motion was made for reconsideration of the endorsement, which will be the first order of business when the sessions reconvene at a date and place still to be set by the executive council.

The convention also voted to endorse Democratic Rep. Richard L. Ottinger for election as U.S. senator and Democratic State Comptroller Arthur Levitt and Republican Attorney Gen. Louis Lefkowitz for re-election.

Both Rockefeller and his Democratic-Liberal challenger in the November election, former Supreme Court Justice Arthur J. Goldberg, addressed the 1,000 delegates. And both received cheering, whistling, table-pounding welcomes as they entered the convention hall at the Concord Hotel.

The stormy debate that preceded the endorsement of the governor indicated the sharp division between supporters of the two candidates within the state labor organization. It was the first time in its history that the State AFL-CIO had voted to endorse a Republican candidate for governor.

During and after the debate, a number of procedural issues were raised, and the executive council voted to call a recess in the proceedings if a motion for reconsideration were offered. Under convention rules of order, this would have to come from a delegate on the Rockefeller side. The motion was properly made and the convention recessed.

Earlier, the delegates had approved a series of resolutions, including one that reaffirmed, without debate, the State AFL-CIO's position adopted a year ago supporting Administration efforts to end the war in Viet Nam.

Steelworkers Offer $10 Million To Aid UAW in Event of Strike

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers will make $10 million "immediately available" to the Auto Workers for use in the event of a strike in the auto industry, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel announced here.

The USWA's international executive board, meeting here, voted unanimously to make the amount available "as an initial token of our solidarity in the event the Auto Workers are forced to strike for a just and equitable settlement." The money will be in the form of an interest-free loan.

Abel said "we are hopeful that a satisfactory agreement can be reached before the auto contracts expire . . . but we want the officers and members of the UAW to know that we are prepared to support them to the hilt" if a strike becomes necessary.

Abel is an AFL-CIO vice president and head of its Industrial Union Dept.

In Detroit, where the UAW is conducting negotiations on terms of new contracts with General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp., UAW President Leonard Woodcock charged the three big firms with stalling. He called the union's executive board to meet Sept. 13 to decide whether GM or Chrysler, or both, will be struck if no accepetable offer is made by 12:01 a.m. Sept. 15.

Woodcock met with GM and union negotiators in an effort to "get things moving," and also consulted with UAW bargainers at Chrysler. Later he told the press, that, "unless something radical changes," the employers are "stalling themselves into a strike."

Woodcock offered to drop 25 non-economic issues to speed the pace of negotiations, according to a United Press International report. But GM representatives said they would "study" the offer, UPI said.

Meanwhile Ford announced it has no present intention to lock out employes and halt all new car production in the event of a strike at either or both of its Big Three manufacturing competitors. Ford was the target in 1967, when it was struck for 65 days while the other auto makers continued production.

The UAW received virtually identical first offers from all three employers recently and called them "the poorest initial offers" in 25 years. Chrysler made a second offer as the AFL-CIO News went to press and GM was expected to do likewise.

Woodcock said after a first appraisal: "It hasn't filled in many gaps. We're still a long way from home."

American Motors, the fourth largest manufacturer, has been "put on the back burner" while day-and-night negotiations are conducted at headquarters of the other three firms.

Cost-of-living wage adjustments are a major point of difference in this year's contract talks. GM not only has refused to raise the 8-cent ceiling on such adjustments, originally agreed to in 1967 negotiations, but it has included in its 1970 offer some of the money due to be paid Sept. 15 this year under the old agreement.

The union says this is "old money" due employes under the not-yet-expired agreement. Management calls it "new money."

Other major contract issues include a cost-of-living allowance that will reflect actual increases in costs; substantial wage increases, with no figure specified; and retirement at $500 a month after 30 years' service regardless of age.

Pollock Hails Bill to Combat 'Brown Lung'

New York — Full support has been pledged by the Textile Workers Union of America for a bill introduced by Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) and 90 other House members to provide federal disability payments to textile workers suffering from "brown lung" disease.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the Burton bill "is a great step forward in the fight for healthy working conditions in the textile industry."

"It is a national disgrace," Pollock said, "that the textile industry has been permitted to pollute the in-plant environment to a point where 100,000 textile workers are incapacitated by 'brown lung' disease. The assessment of a levy on the cotton used by each mill, as proposed by the Burton bill, will serve as a positive incentive for the industry to correct the conditions that cause this disease."

Boilermakers Elect Buoy as Berg Retires

Kansas City, Kan. — Harold Buoy, 49, active in his union since he was 20, is the new president of the 140,000-member Boilermakers & Blacksmiths Union, succeeding Russell K. Berg, who has retired.

Berg, who suffered a stroke in April, named Buoy as acting president shortly thereafter. The union's executive council late in August named Buoy to fill Berg's unexpired term which runs until the union's next convention in August 1973.

A native of Sadorous, Ill., Buoy began his career as a boilermaker apprentice on the Wabash Railroad at Decatur, Ill., in 1941. He immediately became active in the union, serving on his local's grievance committee and later becoming the union's general chairman on the Wabash.

Buoy was appointed to the union's international staff in 1950 and named assistant to the president in 1956, assigned to the union's Washington office.

Berg also began his career in railroading, serving an apprenticeship as a boilermaker on the Michigan Central at Niles, Mich., in 1922. Later, he shifted from railroading to construction but continued serving his union in many capacities.

He became a union vice president in 1948 and was named president in 1962.

The Reality of Unemployment

THE SLIGHT INCREASE in the unemployment rate for August to 5.1 percent tends to mask what is essentially a continuing deterioration in the jobless situation.

An analysis of the August figures discloses a marked weakness in the job market with an overall decline in employment in all major categories and classifications.

Since the sharp climb in unemployment between December 1969 and May 1970 the rate of increase has slowed. But—and it is an important but—the unemployment rate continues to move upward and the job outlook for millions of Americans continues to deteriorate.

Unemployment is expected to continue to rise through the remainder of 1970 and into 1971. Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson predicts that a "sizable improvement" in the unemployment rate is just a few months away. But he noted also on a television interview program that the jobless rate "might go slightly higher before it starts moving down again."

We hope the secretary's optimism is justified by events but the AFL-CIO Executive Council, in its analysis of the situation, said unemployment will continue to rise in 1971, and on the basis of the Administration's own economic forecast high unemployment is expected to remain into 1972.

AN EXAMINATION of the nature of the unemployment sheds some light on the current difficulties. About three-fifths of the sharp rise in joblessness between December 1969 and August 1970—a total of 1.4 million—was due to layoffs and about 30 percent was among entrants into the labor force, largely teenagers, adult women and ex-GIs.

Unemployment rates in August 1970 reached 10.2 percent among unskilled workers and 7.9 percent among semi-skilled. Joblessness more than doubled among skilled craftsmen over the year to reach 4.4 percent. And there have been increasing layoffs among professional and technical workers.

The employment impact of the present economic recession has been concentrated in manufacturing and construction. Overtime hours of work have been cut back or eliminated in many industries in recent months, and weekly working hours have been cut.

The number of areas with substantial unemployment—6 percent or more—has increased from 6 in early 1969 to 31 last month.

The AFL-CIO has urged a series of specific actions on the Administration in the areas of economic policy, credit control, full funding of federal appropriations. The Administration has chosen to maintain the same basic policies of the past 18 months and the President has rejected authority to act in various areas voted him by Congress.

To date the Administration's policies have, in the words of the Executive Council at its August meeting in Chicago, "produced an economic recession and extortionate interest rates, while inflation is still not under control."

The latest unemployment report, the index of consumer prices, the level of interest rates hold no promise of a change in the employment outlook for the rest of 1970, at least, and there is no indication of any change or shift in Administration policy.

This is the reality of the moment.

A Word Edgewise:

Firm Mid-East Stand Needed To Counter Soviet Ambitions

By Henry M. Jackson

John P. Roche is on vacation. Sitting in as guest columnist is the junior and Democratic U.S. Senator from the State of Washington.

MANY PEOPLE THINK of the Middle East crisis as just an Arab-Israeli conflict: they assume that if that conflict subsides, our Middle East problems will disappear. I do not share this reassuring outlook. On the contrary, I believe that the Soviets have found the Arab-Israeli conflict a convenient opportunity to strengthen their own position in the Middle East, that they intend to keep the pot boiling, and that their deepening involvement in the area promises more trouble ahead for us and our Western allies.

In my experience the Soviets will exploit the weak and the irresolute. Firm resistance tends to diminish their outward ambitions, and our position in the Middle East should be founded on this principle.

Hegemony in the eastern Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf is a historic Russian goal dating back to Czarist times, and for centuries Egypt has occupied a prominent place in the calculations of Russian rulers.

Catherine the Great, desiring to speed the fall of the Ottoman Empire by threatening it from the rear, rendered military assistance to the Mameluk Ali-Bey of Egypt. In 1788 she urged "the chiefs of the government of Cairo" to shake off the yoke of the Suzerain and to make a treaty of alliance with her, promising them every assistance in vessels, troops, war munitions, and money.

In 1798, Czar Paul I sent Russian naval units through the Turkish Straits into the eastern Mediterranean aiming to deny to the French the possession of Malta, the Ionian Islands, and Egypt.

In the 19th Century, various Russian adventurers attempted direct action in the Middle East. The best known was Ataman Ashinov, who tried in 1888-89 to establish a Russian colony in Ethiopia and to seize a port on the Red Sea.

"Russia needs this port," argued Ashinov, "as from there she could always keep check on the English and other enemies. Not without reason are all of the European countries ready to risk even war in an attempt to secure important bases on this world route. Why should Russia not seize one?"

With the end of World War II and the emergence of the Soviet Union as the second ranking world power, Moscow overtly pressed claims to bases on the Mediterranean shores of Africa. Before and during the Potsdam Conference both Premier Stalin and Foreign Minister Molotov wanted a Soviet trusteeship over one of the former Italian colonies, preferably Libya.

As reported in the official records, Sec. of State Byrnes got the impression that "the Soviet foray into a region so close to the Suez Canal and the Persian Gulf shook up Churchill more than any other episode at the conference."

One is reminded of the recent coup d'etat in Libya ending our air base rights in that country—part of the campaign to drive American influence from the area.

THIS BRIEF HISTORY points up the fact that the Soviet desire for a controlling role in the Middle East is deeply rooted in the Russian past. If there were no Arab-Israeli crisis, the Soviets would invent one. Now, all the indications are that Soviet involvement in the Middle East is deepening. Emboldened by its growing strategic and naval power, Moscow hopes to make the most of the tragic conflict between Arabs and Jews to destroy Western influence in that strategic area and eventually achieve Soviet dominance in the Indian Ocean and control of vital oil resources in North Africa and the Arab states.

I believe our country has been much too slow to come to grips with the threats to our own security that result from the Soviet designs in the Middle East.

The Mediterranean is of crucial strategic interest to all NATO nations, including the United States. The Middle East is a gateway not only to the Persian Gulf but to the Indian Ocean and North Africa. We have important political interests in the Middle East where we have good friends, including Israel and a number of nations in the Arab world. And we and especially our NATO allies have vital economic interests in the area.

For the United States, a firm and resolute stance in the Middle East is essential to counter the historic ambitions of the Soviets.

Labor's Number One Goal:

National Insurance Plan Called Best Way to Use Health Dollar

Following are excerpts from the Labor Day radio broadcast by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Sept. 7.

LABOR'S NUMBER ONE legislative goal is a goal not only for America's workers and their families, but for all the American people: rich and poor; young and old; black and white; employed and unemployed.

That goal is to upgrade America's standard of health; to establish a new and better system for delivering health care and health services to the people who need them.

Labor has always believed that the right to a decent standard of health care has to be considered a basic human right. As long as that right is denied or abridged, this nation's promise to its citizens of the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness cannot be kept.

So this is a right that labor has been fighting for and moving toward for a very long time.

We spend more than 60 billion dollars a year—nearly 7 percent of our gross national product—to be healthy. We spend about $300 a year for every man, woman and child in America in this way—far more than any of the nations that rank ahead of us—and we don't get our money's worth.

It is perfectly clear that we don't need to spend any more money to give this nation the finest health care in the world. We already spend enough to do that.

But how should the money be used?

We believe health is the goal, not treatment or hospitalization. There is something absolutely and fundamentally wrong with a system that gears the earnings of doctors to the sickness of their patients, and the earnings of hospitals to the number of beds they can fill and keep filled.

There is a better system. It is already serving about 5 million people, right here in the United States.

It is called prepaid group practice, and it is based on a very simple idea: You pay your health-insurance premium regularly to a medical group. In return, you get whatever medical care you need, without any exclusions or fine-print exceptions.

Prepaid group practice is based on the free association of doctors who band together in order to offer a comprehensive package of medical services to their subscribers.

They contract to provide the whole spectrum of medical service—preventive medicine, clinical medicine and surgery, in-patient and out-patient and nursing-home care—and all the rest.

Their patients have fewer operations and spend less time in the hospital than the rest of the population, because the doctors and the hospitals that contract their services in this way have every reason to hold costs down: the money they save is their own.

Some doctors—like some patients—don't like to belong to a group. They have found other ways of providing quality health care while still controlling costs. One way is for medical societies to contract to provide health care to group subscribers. The subscribers choose from among the participating doctors and the medical society pays the doctor from its general fund on a fee-for-service basis.

And all the studies that are made—even those by people who want to prove it won't work—show that prepaid health care is making life better than ever before for doctor and patient alike.

We believe it is time to make such programs available to all Americans, and we are supporting legislation to do just that.

A bill to make it possible has already been introduced by Congresswoman Martha Griffiths of Michigan, and it is supported by a number of her colleagues. On the Senate side, Senators Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, John Cooper of Kentucky, William Saxbe of Ohio and Ralph Yarborough of Texas have submitted a similar bill, and they are gathering supporters, too.

THERE IS NOTHING coercive about the program we want. It provides the freedom that Americans demand.

Doctors can choose their patients. Patients can choose their doctors. Methods of payment are as open as methods of treatment.

But it does provide that complete medical care—the best in the world—will be available to all Americans at reasonable costs.

Under the legislation we advocate, financing would be through the existing social security system, with supplementation from the government's general revenues.

Self-employed persons could participate, just as they can participate now in the social security program. The unemployed would be exempt from payment but would receive all services.

The whole program, providing vastly greater efficiency for both doctor and patient, providing complete, instead of partial, medical care, and covering every person in the land, would cost no more than we already spend.

And the $60 billion we spend for medical care would, for the first time, return $60 billion worth of medical care.

The old system won't do, any longer. That much is clear, even to the special-interest groups that have fought reform for generations. They have decided they can't avoid some sort of change any longer, and they are busy drafting bills to salvage as much of the old order as they can for their constituents. The American Medical Association has a program. The Chamber of Commerce and the insurance industry are working on theirs.

Special-interest bills are not what is needed.

The trade union movement believes the emphasis belongs first on all the people who need medical care and can't get it, and then on providing that care in a way that is just and fair to them, and to the people who supply that care.

We are convinced that a majority of the American people, and a majority of Congress, agree that building the highest possible level of national health is a matter of the most urgent priority—that delay can no longer be tolerated.

The answer is National Health Insurance and the AFL-CIO believes it can—and must—be enacted.

'At Least $2 an Hour':

Minimum Wage Boost Urged To Restore Gains of Low-Paid

THE AFL-CIO's top economist called for major overhaul of the federal wage-hour law to restore the gain America's lowest-paid workers made in 1966 but have since lost to inflation.

A minimum wage of "at least $2 an hour" and coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act for an additional 17 million of the nation's lowest-paid workers are "absolutely necessary . . . now," declared Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, in a network radio interview. He added that reduction of the standard work-week and raising the overtime penalty from time and one-half to double-time, as the AFL-CIO has also urged, would open new job opportunities and help meet the problems of the working poor.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Goldfinger pointed out that "according to the Census Bureau's own figures, more than half of the poor in this country are in families where the head of the family is employed full-time, year-round," and the "utterly low wages of the worker" is the major cause of that poverty.

Goldfinger rejected the contention that improvement of the wage-hour law would eliminate many of the jobs now held by teenagers and marginal workers.

"There are always outcries from some reactionary types in the country that an increase of the minimum wage is going to cause disaster . . . a rise in unemployment," he said. But, he noted, the government's own studies of the impact of FLSA improvements since 1938 show otherwise.

Goldfinger was questioned by Murray Seeger of the Los Angeles Times and Don Finley of United Press International.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE CONGRESS of the United States has a number of distinctions among legislative bodies around the world, and the most controversial distinction may well be its seniority system.

Under this system, senators and representatives rise to the apex of their power as chairman of committees solely on the basis of longevity of service.

Recently, Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.), in introducing two legislative reorganization bills to abolish the Senate seniority system, told the Senate: "I have been unable to find a single free world parliament that operates under the seniority system. For that matter, no Communist government or other dictatorship operates under the seniority system."

A study by the legislative reference section of the Library of Congress disclosed that there is no state in the union where seniority alone is the controlling criterion in the determination of committee chairmen.

The report goes on that other factors are as important as seniority in state legislatures. These include geography, appointment by a party leader and even by a ballot.

Unfortunately, the heat that is generated when the seniority issue comes up for discussion is usually related to the inference that merely because a man has reached advanced age he is entitled to be a committee chairman, or, on the reverse side of the coin, because he has reached advanced age he should be denied the chairmanship.

From a practical standpoint, many of the sitting chairmen of powerful Senate and House committees could well be chosen for the same spots on the basis of merit and ability alone.

George Haynes, a distinguished historian of the Senate, pointed out some years ago: "Servile compliance with the seniority rule involves gamblers' chances. It is a limited appeal to the lot. It implies merely duration of service on the committee—not in the least does it guarantee superior ability or fitness for leadership."

Packwood noted that at least the seniority system is non-discriminatory: "Under it, the sick get the same consideration for committee chairmanship as the healthy, the dull the same opportunity as the intelligent and the wicked the same advantage as the noble."

FEW STUDENTS of Congress realize that prior to 1846, the seniority system did not rule in the Senate. Until then, committees were selected and chairmen named by various methods, including election by ballot and appointment by the presiding officer.

Initially, of course, there were no standing committees in the Senate. Select committees were named to consider each piece of legislation which came before the two bodies. The first of 19 rules adopted by the Senate in 1789 provided: "All committees shall be appointed by ballot and a plurality of votes should make a choice."

In 1816 the Senate abandoned the system of select committees and adopted the standing committee system. However, the Senate continued to elect its committee chairmen until 1823 when it adopted a proposal for the appointment of chairmen by the presiding officer—either the Vice President or president pro tem. In 1826 the ballot system was restored.

The Senate actually backed into the seniority system in 1846. It did not trust the Vice President and it was weary over weeks of balloting for committee members and committee chairmen. The seniority system worked well in that it reduced inter-party squabbling and assured the majority party immediate succession to a vacant chairmanship.

Proponents of the seniority system point out that it recognizes experience and expertise. However, as Packwood told the Senate, the seniority aproach has been rejected in the selection of majority and minority leaders of both houses.

The impact of the seniority system in the selection of committee chairmen is seen in a few statistics. In 1870, the average age of a senator was 50.6. Today it has risen little, to 56.6. However, in the last 100 years the age of committee chairmen has risen from 53.7 to 64.4.

MAJOR OVERHAUL of the federal wage-hour law is essential to put the working poor "closer to the mainstream of America's life," AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, center, said on Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO produced program were Murray Seeger, left, of the Los Angeles Times and Don Finley of United Press International.

UNITED FARM WORKERS express thanks to the New York labor movement for "devoted friendship" to the cause of AFL-CIO farm workers, and leadership in the successful boycott of non-union grapes. Both were a "signal factor" in winning union recognition for UFWOC, according to memento presented by UFWOC Regional Dir. Andy Imutan, right, to Pres. Harry Van Arsdale of the city AFL-CIO, federation Regional Dir. Michael Mann and central body Sec. Morris Iushewitz, pictured from left to right.

NLRB Clarifies Stand On Union-Imposed Fines

The National Labor Relations Board, in two major rulings, has clarified its position on the right of unions to fine members for crossing picket lines and strikebreaking.

In one decision, the board ruled that a union commits an unfair labor practice by imposing fines for strikebreaking when the employe has resigned from the union prior to crossing the picket line.

However, the board again ruled that there is no violation of the National Labor Relations Act when a union fines such workers who are still union members or whose resignations were submitted after going through the picket lines.

The case involved Booster Lodge 405, Machinists, and the Boeing Co.'s Michoud plant in New Orleans.

In another decision in the area of union fines, the board held that it is without statutory authority to rule on the reasonableness of fines levied by a labor organization on its members for not honoring the union's lawful picket line.

The act "does not authorize this board to evaluate the fairness of union discipline meted out to protect a legitimate union interest," a board majority asserted. It said that determination of the fairness of the amount of union fines of its members is properly within the powers of the courts where unions file suits to collect.

This case also involved Machinists Lodge 504 in a strike at the Arrow Development Co. of Mountain View, Calif.

The two cases arose after the board had held, and the Supreme Court had affirmed, that the labor relations statute does not apply to union fines of members who fail to honor a lawful picket line where the union attempts to enforce the fines through court action (the Allis-Chalmers case), or to fines of members who violate a union rule that limits the amount of production work for which members may accept immediate piecework pay (the Wisconsin Motor case).

In the latest decisions, members of the board differed in their views of the Supreme Court's holdings in the Allis-Chalmers and Wisconsin Motor cases, and reached conclusions on the principal issues by a 3 to 1 vote.

Forming the majority in the resignation case were Members John H. Fanning, Frank W. McCulloch and Howard Jenkins, Jr. Member Gerald A. Brown dissented on the question of prohibiting fines of union members who resign before they pass pickets to work during a lawful strike. He joined his colleagues on the other two points.

Members Fanning, Brown and Jenkins wrote the majority opinion in the case concerning reasonableness of the size of union fines. Member McCulloch dissented.

Chairman Edward B. Miller did not participate in either case.

Program Broadened:

Studies Center's First Year Viewed as 'Good Beginning'

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center, one year old on Labor Day, has trained 243 union members from 50 affiliates and 17 state and city central bodies, Dir. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., reported.

In addition, another 129 interns from the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, college students and National Urban League representatives attended seminars held to increase public understanding of the labor movement and its goals.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, chairman of the center's board of trustees, called the center's first year "a good beginning."

"We have established a solid framework upon which to build," he said. "Today's labor leaders must be involved in helping to solve the economic, social and political problems of the nation. The tools and knowledge for providing leadership are rooted in education. The center is designed to provide the tools and knowledge and it is already proving its worth."

During the center's first year, programs ranged in length from one-week institutes on subjects like "Arbitration" and "Labor Law" to three-week staff training sessions. Students from outside the labor movement attended shorter labor-orientation programs.

The faculty included 107 instructors drawn from the ranks of labor, universities, the professions and government.

Among the visiting lecturers were Meany, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Walter Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, all officers of the center's board of trustees.

Davis reported that the AFL-CIO Executive Council had approved a $463,000 budget for next year's operation of the center.

"We have made a very careful and profitable evaluation of the first year's activity, including an evaluation of the students' reactions. As a result, we will be expanding the program and entering new areas," he said.

Hoehler, who is on leave from his professorship at Michigan State University to direct the center, said that its 1970-71 curriculum has been expanded from 10 to 25 one-week institutes including, in addition to last year's subjects, such new areas as Leadership Training for Farm Workers, a Building Trades Agents' Institute, and a Manpower Seminar on the nature of the U.S. workforce.

The center's first priority will continue to be tool courses such as collective bargaining, grievance handling, economics and social sciences.

But, Hoehler said, "We also want to feel free to run courses which will spring from the needs generated by unfolding problems and events."

He cited two unscheduled programs added last year when the need arose:

- A program to prepare the joint negotiating committee of the postal unions for the initial negotiations under the new U.S. Postal Service.
- A two-day conference to give federal government employes background for collective bargaining under Executive Order 11491.

Additional institutes explored other areas vital to today's union officials. Included were: Critical Problems in State Government, Health Care Planning, Civil Rights, Teacher Training and a seminar on environmental concerns.

The "core" program—staff development—is a three-week session held five times last year with courses in economics, history, sociology and effective reading. Supplementing this were evening seminars on current issues and "special projects"—the student's opportunity to explore fields of individual interest with experts. Students averaged more than 100 hours of class time plus the hours used for assigned readings.

The new semester, which begins Sept. 14 with a seminar for technicians and engineers, includes an innovation in staff development, Hoehler said.

While the basic program will be continued, an additional experimental six-week academic course, with three months of practical training interspersed between class sessions, is being undertaken.

The three-phase program will be an intensive classroom-job site training experience that "should be worth a college semester of labor and industrial relations," said Hoehler, a professor of that subject.

He described the profile of last year's average student as 37 years old, a high school graduate, who had belonged to his union for nearly 19 years and had held his present staff job for almost four years.

While the student body was diversified in terms of job levels, geography and union membership—their response, obtained through written evaluations—was nearly uanimous in one respect, he said. "They want more and longer courses, advanced studies, and expanded subject areas."

"This reaction tells us more about the success of the Labor Studies Center's first year than anything else," Davis commented. "We are going to try to provide just what they want and need."

California AFL-CIO Convention Mobilizes for November Election

San Francisco—The November elections dominated the deliberations of the California Labor Federation as delegates blueprinted a 1970-model program for the state's 1.3 million AFL-CIO members.

The more than 1,200 delegates at the four-day session were reminded by one speaker after another of the importance of mobilizing labor's forces for the campaigns and elections just ahead.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates that they would have an opportunity in November to give effect to labor's traditional policy of supporting its friends and trying to defeat its enemies—"to the very limit."

Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and a veteran civil rights fighter, put it even stronger:

"You must support COPE to save this nation from a disaster in November. Because if we do not hold the line against the Nixon Administration, nothing we have called for is important."

Pres. Nixon has control of the White House, Rustin pointed out, and of the Supreme Court.

"We are in for decades of distress unless the liberal forces of this nation can control Congress. For Nixon holds a veto over social progress in this country unless we have a Congress which can override his veto."

Rep. John V. Tunney, COPE-endorsed Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate, underscored the point:

"I think it's about time that we turned the seat that George Murphy occupies in the Senate of the United States back to the people of California."

Assemblyman Jess Unruh, labor-backed opponent of Gov. Ronald Reagan, promised the delegates that he would answer their letters and accept their invitations, unlike the present governor who had sent his "regrets" to the convention.

The convention also:

- Voted a $10,000 contribution to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee's strike fund and 100 percent support for its fight to win recognition and union contracts in still greater sections of the state's vast agriculture industry.
- Pledged support for the striking and locked-out employes of the Hearst-owned Los Angeles Herald-Examiner and to the striking printers at the San Rafael Independent-Journal.
- Elected John F. Henning, former Under Secretary of Labor and Ambassador to New Zealand, as executive secretary-treasurer of the federation. Henning had been chosen by the executive board last April to succeed Thomas L. Pitts who retired due to disability. Albin J. Gruhn, incumbent president, was re-elected to his sixth term.
- Supported the "national administration's efforts to withdraw troops from South Viet Nam" and reaffirmed support of the United Nations.
- Urged a ban on the use of hard pesticides and conclusive proof that SST won't pollute upper atmospheric levels before development is continued.
- Demanded enforcement of the 160-acre limitation on land-holding benefitted by public water development and urged defeat of the Murphy bill aimed at relaxing the limitation.
- Called for revision and updating of California's workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, and disability insurance programs.

High Unemployment Hits 7 More Major Job Areas

Employment conditions continued to deteriorate in August as the Labor Dept. added seven major job centers to the list of areas with "substantial" unemployment—6 percent or more.

The new additions—including Detroit and New Orleans—bring the total to 31, the highest level since October 1964. Other major areas added are San Jose, Calif.; Bridgeport, Conn.; Battle Creek, Mich.; Corpus Christi, Tex., and Spokane, Wash.

The Labor Dept. also classified 14 more smaller manpower centers as being affected by substantial joblessness. This list now stands at 564.

Metromedia Unions Settle Long TV Strike

Two local unions of television station technicians returned to work in Washington and New York City after a 100-day strike that produced wage hikes and other benefits totaling $75 a week over a three-year period.

The settlement was won from Metromedia Inc. by Locals 189 and 794 of the Theatrical Stage Employes. The strikers picketed Metromedia stations in the two cities from May 22 until their negotiators won settlements.

The new contracts provide wage increases of $25 a week retroactive to May 12, expiration date of the old pacts; $10 a week next May 12 and an additional $30 a week in the final year.

Management also agreed to increase its pension fund payments by $5 a week per member, to put an additional $5 into the medical insurance fund; to add an extra paid holiday for a total of four, and to observe a no-layoff policy for the duration of the contract.

A major gain, Local 189 Pres. Walter Anderson said, was an agreement to reduce the work week in steps from 40 to 37.5 hours then to 36.25 hours, and finally to 35 hours in 1972.

With Plasterers:

Bricklayers' Parley Spurs Merger Talks

The Bricklayers' executive board was instructed by the union's 71st convention in Washington to continue exploratory talks with the Plasterers & Cement Masons for a possible merger.

Citing existing difficulties resulting from overlapping jurisdictional lines, the convention noted in a resolution that unification of the two organizations would be beneficial to the membership of both unions.

The Bricklayers currently have a membership of 165,000 and the Plasterers have about 85,000 members.

The possibility of lower dues for members and improving administration of union affairs through full-time business managers was also stressed as a key benefit that would result from a merger.

Delegates voted a minimum monthly dues payment equal to 1 hour in wages and fringe benefits. This would raise dues in some areas to about $6 or $8 a month, but it is not likely to affect the dues structure currently in effect at most of the union's big city locals. The current monthly per capita payment to the international will remain at $2.

The convention also approved a $5,000 raise in annual salary for the four top officers of the union, the first increase they have received since 1960.

Under the new salary structure, Pres. Thomas F. Murphy will receive $40,000 a year; Sec. William R. Conners, $35,000, and First Vice Pres. George W. King and Treas. John T. Joyce $30,000 each.

Delegates granted increased salaries to the union's vice presidents and special representatives of $50 a week, bringing their weekly salaries to $400.

In what developed as the most controversial issue of the convention, delegates approved in a close voice vote a mandatory pension plan for local union officers and employes.

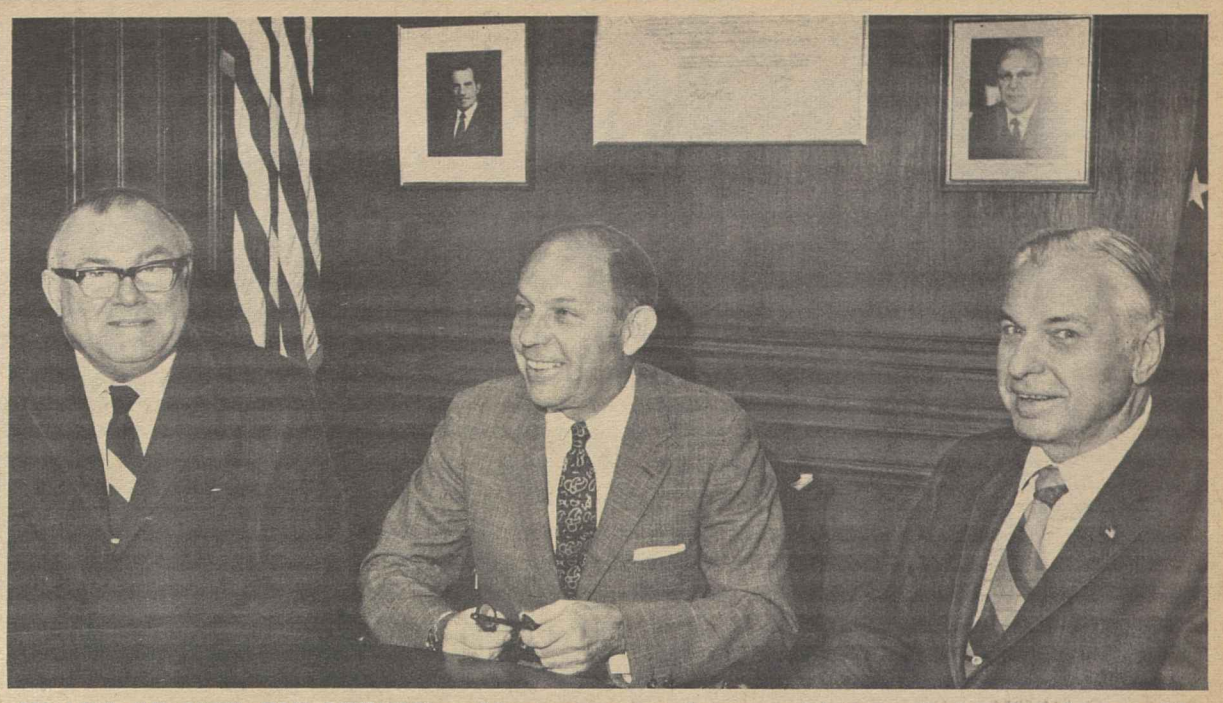
Opponents took issue mainly with the mandatory factor of the plan. Some complained that it forced locals to participate in the international's pension plan although they may already have other plans in operation.

Proponents contended that the plan could not operate effectively on a voluntary basis. The new plan will be financed by locals paying 10 percent of officers' or employes' salaries into the pension fund.

Increased automony was approved for Canadian locals to answer an appeal from Canadian delegates who expressed concern that unions in Canada are under continuing attack on several fronts. They asked that locals there be given sufficient automony to operate in the anti-union atmosphere currently prevailing in Canada.

A move to bring mandatory retirement of international officers at age 65 was rejected by the delegates. The convention also defeated a measure to increase the term of office for local officers from two years to three. Although 418 of the 700 delegates favored the longer terms, the amendment did not receive the necessary two-thirds majority to pass.



International officers are elected for four-year terms.

In other action, the delegates:

- Called for the passage of the proposed national health insurance program now before Congress.
- Declared they would uphold their current standards in apprenticeship programs and rebuff pressure of outside interests to alter them.
- Heard Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. term the government's Philadelphia Plan unnecessary and unworkable. He also urged unions to pursue training programs for upgrading minority workers beyond apprenticeship age.

Labor Dept. Names Aide In Public Employe Field

Jerome T. Barrett, formerly assistant director for public employe disputes and mediation service at the American Arbitration Association, has taken on a similar assignment at the Dept. of Labor.

HEADS OF TWO BIG UNIONS seeking contract settlements with the nation's railroads met with Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson before postponing a strike deadline. At left is Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway & Airline Clerks and at right, Pres. Charles Luna of the United Transportation Union. More than 500,000 members of the two unions and two others, the Maintenance of Way Employes and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes are affected by the negotiations.

Study Opens on Jobless Aid to Farm Workers

Acting at the request of Congress, the Labor Dept. is opening a survey in 18 states on the effect of extending unemployment insurance coverage to farm workers. The report will go to Congress early next year.

The study is of particular interest to organized labor which has repeatedly called on Congress to extend coverage to more than a million farm workers who now are excluded.

The 18 states to be surveyed employ about half of all hired farm workers in the United States. The study will involve questioning of some 20,000 farm employers and interviews with about 16,000 workers.

The survey will be made by 12 land-grant universities and four state Employment Security divisions covering these states: California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Washington and West Virginia.

Rail Unions Postpone Strike Date Five Days

Board, the dispute is "still a long way from settlement."

The four unions, in separate movements, have been seeking annual wage increases of 12 to 15 percent, retroactive to last Jan. 1, plus other improvements that would bring railroad workers closer to the gains won by comparable workers in recent union settlements.

The Waymen made their contract proposals in May 1969, and the others soon afterward. Union negotiators failed to make progress in talks that followed and by Labor Day 1970 had exhausted the mediation processes of the Railway Labor Act. When the National Mediation Board relinquished jurisdiction, both sides were left free to resort to self-help.

The unions set the Sept. 10 deadline and, with a walkout a few days away, were called to meet with Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson. After that they resumed talks with management at Usery's suggestion.

Leaders of the unions said they are concerned that the carriers may use the talks merely to delay a prompt settlement. They are Presidents Charles Luna of UTU, C. L. Dennis of the Clerks, Harold Crotty of the Waymen and Vice Pres. Richard Smith of the dining car union.

Dennis said the dispute, can be settled quickly "if the rail industry will accept its obligations and responsibilities to the men and women who are a vital part of that industry."

He added: "Our people are up in arms because of the long delay" in getting any meaningful response from management. "They are tired of waiting; the cost of living is going up and they have no cost-of-living clause" in present agreements.

Crotty and Luna told newsmen it is "unfortunate" that the Administration did not press for more negotiations earlier instead of waiting until close to the strike deadline.

Late in August, the Railway Clerks' officers affirmed these policy positions:

"We will not accept any substandard settlement on wages. We consider the present rail settlements as below the standards we must have for our members."

The officers said they will "reject any emergency board recommendations which do not treat us on a par with all other transportation industry workers. We will . . . support a strike on one or more or all properties" as soon as legally possible.

Members of the four unions have been working without a contract for more than eight months.

Union Contract Gives Senecas Indian Holiday

Irving, N.Y.—Furniture Workers of the First Seneca Corp. will be taking off Sept. 19 to celebrate Indian Day, now a paid holiday that was negotiated in a new one-year contract by UFWA Local 49.

The company is located on the First Seneca reservation and most of the workers are Seneca Indians.

The agreement matches conditions and benefits that UFWA Local 140 in New York City has with the parent firm, U.S. Pillow. A common expiration date has been set for both contracts to add bargaining strength in both plants, UFWA Pres. Fred Fulford said.

"We believe this is the first time any union contract in the United States has provided an Indian holiday," Fulford added. In all, the contract raises the number of paid holidays from 8 to 11, same as the New York City agreement.

The minimum wage at the First Seneca plant is $2 an hour. With a cost-of-living clause and additional negotiated increases, the UFWA said that wages at the reservation have been raised a total of 40 cents an hour in less than a year.

The Seneca agreement also provides coverage in the union's pension program for the first time. Workers at the reservation plant had been covered previously by the union's insurance fund. Both plans are financed by employer contributions.

Secondary Boycott Ban Stretched To Protect Entire Hearst Empire

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three to one decision, has brought the entire Hearst newspaper empire under the protection of the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

The board held that the various newspaper and television divisions of the Hearst Corp. are separate entities and that eight newspaper unions that picketed Hearst divisions not on strike were guilty of a secondary boycott.

The issue revolves around two picketing cases, one in San Francisco and the other in Baltimore, both involving Hearst enterprises. In one case the trial examiner held the unions guilty of secondary boycott, in the other the picketing was declared legal.

Eight Los Angeles unions were engaged in an economic strike against the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner and, as part of their strike activities, picketed the Hearst-owned San Francisco Examiner. In this case, the trial examiner, Herman Marx, found that the unions were within their rights. He has now been reversed.

In the second case, the Television & Radio Artists, Washington-Baltimore local, was found guilty of a secondary boycott against the Hearst-owned Baltimore News American. This grew out of AFTRA's picketing of the newspaper during a strike against the Hearst-owned TV station WBAL.

The two cases were consolidated.

The board majority argued that the 20 or so Hearst-owned newspaper and TV enterprises are sufficiently independent in operation so as to constitute "separate employers" and that therefore a labor dispute at one enterprise could not justify the picketing of another of the enterprises.

The majority decision is based on the technical legal definition of a "person," and could be used, much to the disadvantage of unions, in other corporations which also have a number of divisions. For that reason, the case is likely to reach the courts.

Forming the majority in the case were newly-appointed Chairman Edward B. Miller, some of whose decisions so far have gone against labor; member Frank W. McCulloch, whose term ended Aug. 27, and member Howard Jenkins, Jr.

Gerald A. Brown dissented, holding that the picketing of Hearst's other non-struck enterprises was legitimate in that it was directed against the corporation itself. To treat each "division" as a separate entity entitled to secondary boycott protection is illogical and contrary to previous board decisions, Brown said.

He agreed with the contention that the "operating profits made by the Hearst divisions are fuel for the total corporate body" and could be used at its will "to sustain any division in a contest of legitimate economic pressures involved in a labor dispute between a union and the management of a division or, in other words, Hearst."

Brown further held that the board decision not only "insulated" the "offending employer" from the effects of what essentially is its own dispute, but was inconsistent with previous decisions designed to protect union picketing of a primary employer.

Unions involved were locals of the Newspaper Guild, Pressmen, Stereotypers, Typographical Union, Machinists, Service Employes, ITU Mailers, Paper Handlers, and Newspaper Drivers.

Consumer Group Elects Unionists

Madison, Wis.—The Consumer Federation of America re-elected its five vice presidents, including Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Esther Peterson, on leave from the legislative staff of the Clothing Workers.

Elected honorary members of the CFA's national advisory committee were Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Sidney Margolius, consumer expert whose column appears in the AFL-CIO News.

Among the 10 directors who will serve three-year terms on the CFA board are Gordon Cole of the Machinists; Arnold Mayer, Meat Cutters, and Pres. Joseph Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO.

Constitutional Amendment:

Senate Weighs Fate Of Direct Vote Plan

The Senate is debating whether to allow the American people to elect the President of the United States by direct, popular vote.

It has before it a proposed constitutional amendment that would abolish the Electoral College and guarantee that the candidate who gets the most votes will win the election.

The House last year approved the amendment by a one-sided 339-70 vote. It has been endorsed by one of the broadest coalitions ever put together on a controversial political issue—embracing both the AFL-CIO and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, as well as the American Bar Association and a host of good government groups.

Its supporters in the Senate include both the Democratic and Republican leadership. Pres. Nixon, after some initial hedging, has urged its adoption.

But it needs a two-thirds vote in the Senate before it can be submitted to the states for ratification. And while its supporters can count a clear majority, approaching the two-thirds mark, the fate of the amendment rests with a handful of uncommitted senators.

They are the targets of the historic debate that is expected to continued for several more weeks before the final showdown is reached.

40 Percent Required

As passed by the House, the constitutional amendment would require a presidential candidate to get more votes than any of his opponents in order to be elected. If, however, he did not receive at least 40 percent of the total vote cast, there would be a runoff between the two top candidates.

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.), chief sponsor of the amendment, opened the Senate debate by stressing that this is "the only system that is truly democratic, truly equitable, and truly responsive to the will of the people."

And a Republican co-sponsor, Sen. Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee, reminded the Senate that the strategy of George Wallace in his third-party bid in 1968 was to receive enough electoral votes to deny either the Democratic or Republican candidates a majority "and therefore to create for himself a bargaining position."

The counter-attack against the amendment was led by Nebraska's two conservative Republican senators, Roman L. Hruska and Carl T. Curtis, who made the principal argument opponents have mustered against the amendment—that it would dilute the influence of the small, rural states.

Hruska charged that adoption of the direct vote amendment would "radicalize popular opinion" and termed the proposal "the most mischievous and dangerous constitutional amendment that has ever received serious consideration by Congress."

With an adjournment rush under way, Senate leaders tried to sandwich action on backed-up bills between the debate on the constitutional amendment.

One bill approved unanimously and cleared for the President's signature will give the District of Columbia an elected nonvoting delegate in the House. It was described by a Senate committee as an interim measure "pending the adoption of a constitutional amendment assuring full congressional representation for the nation's capital."

Senate leaders said they are now aiming for an Oct. 15 adjournment date. Earlier, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield had said a "lame duck" post-election session would be necessary to complete action on major bills.

The Oct. 15 date could be met, Mansfield said, if there is "unanimous cooperation" by the Senate in speeding action on legislation.

LABOR LAWS offering special protection to women workers are threatened by the passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, reporters at a Washington press conference were told. Mrs. Mary Keyserling, left, former director of the U.S. Women's Bureau, and Vice Pres. Myra Wolfgang of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, announced that a coalition of labor unions and women's groups would press opposition to the amendment in the Senate.

Retail Clerks' Unit Joins Drive Against Narcotics

New York—Concerned with the growing abuse of narcotics, District Council 20 of the Retail Clerks has teamed up with the rehabilitation agency Odyssey House to develop a revolutionary program for the prevention and treatment of drug addiction within union ranks.

The program, launched on a $5,000 allocation from the RCIA council, is also intended to foster more progressive legislation affecting all phases of the drug problem.

The 10 locals that make up the council, representing more than 70,000 members in the New York City and northern New Jersey area, will take part in the program.

Four key areas are stressed in the program: prevention, treatment, rehabilitation and legislation.

The prevention part will include educational programs for union members and their families. The RCIA locals also will make their halls available to civic and community groups for seminars and discussions dealing with drug addiction.

Treatment will be handled by Odyssey House. Should members or their families have problems with drug abuse, they will be eligible for counseling and in-patient care at Odyssey House resident treatment centers.

The re-entry phase of the program centers on a plan of job referrals for former addicts who have been rehabilitated. A labor-management committee that was set up to provide the job referral services reported that two leading New York retail stores have indicated their cooperation.

Legislative Goals

The legislative drive of the program will be based on the support of the local unions for constructive changes in laws governing the sale and use of narcotics and hallucinogens. The council also will take congressmen and other elected officials on tours of urban areas known for high narcotics consumption so they may see for themselves the conditions that often breed drug addiction.

Noting that drug abuse is a most serious problem in the nation today, Pres. James T. Housewright of the RCIA said that the union would be remiss if it did not take part in the effort to find a solution to the problem.

"Council 20 and Odyssey House have performed a great service with this new program," he added, "which may well serve as a model for adoption by the international union and its 650,000 members."

Housewright met with representatives of Odyssey House recently to discuss the possibilities of broadening the program to a union-wide plan.

Unemployment Jumps a Notch To 5.1 Percent

ment in the service sector has shown little or no growth."

Average hourly earnings of nonsupervisory workers in private payrolls moved up 1 cent in August to $3.24 and stood at 18 cents or 5.9 percent above a year ago.

Weekly earnings averaged 70 cents higher, as declines in manufacturing and services were countered by gains in other industry divisions. The average weekly wage of $122.15 was 4.8 percent above the year-ago figure. But the increase was less than the rise in living costs, so the purchasing power was less than a year ago.

There was no over-the-month change in the 4.7 percent jobless rate for full-time workers, but the rate for part-time employes moved up from 7.4 percent in July to 8 percent in August, the highest since the count was begun in 1963. Over the year, however, the unemployment rate for full-time workers has increased much more rapidly than for part-time workers.

There was little change in the 4.8 percent jobless rate for whites and the 8.4 percent rate for Negroes.

The unemployment rate for workers covered by state unemployment insurance programs had dipped to 3.5 percent in July. But it moved up again in August to the June level of 3.7 percent. This compares with a 2.1 percent rate in August 1969.

Over the year, the Labor Dept. said total unemployment has increased by 1.4 million—735,000 adult men, 340,000 adult women, and 270,000 teenagers.

Carswell's Senate Bid Crushed, Faubus Blames Defeat on Labor

his defeat in a runoff primary on labor's support of a 45-year-old political newcomer, Dale Bumpers.

In the first balloting, on Aug. 25, Faubus led an eight-man field in the gubernatorial primary with 150,000 votes to 82,000 for Bumpers. But in the Sept. 8 runoff, nearly complete returns gave Bumpers more than 257,000 votes to 181,000 for Faubus.

First Defeat

It was the first political defeat for Faubus, who left the state house four years ago after 12 years in office.

Bumpers, who stressed issues over personalities in the campaign, will face incumbent Republican Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller in November.

Cramer was the only major candidate in Florida's primary elections to escape a runoff.

In the Democratic Senate race, conservative former Gov. Farris Bryant led as was expected. But he faces a strong runoff challenge from State Sen. Lawton Chiles who walked 1,000 miles across the state during the campaign. Incumbent Sen. Spessard L. Holland (D) is retiring.

Kirk, the first Republican governor in nearly 100 years, fell short of a majority in the GOP primary and will face Jack Eckerd in a Sept. 29 runoff. Eckerd, a political novice, is the wealthy owner of a chain of drug stores.

Florida, once a state where the Democratic nomination was described as "tantamount to election," has become a Republican stronghold in recent years. But the GOP has been racked by feuding. Kirk and Republican Sen. Edward J. Gurney have tried to handpick candidates and party leaders. But Cramer has a strong base of party support as he demonstrated in the senatorial primary.

In other state primaries:

● Former Vermont Gov. Philip H. Hoff easily won the Democratic senatorial nomination to pose a strong challenge to Republican Sen. Winston L. Prouty's bid for a third term. In gubernatorial contests, incumbent Gov. Deane C. Davis defeated his lieutenant governor to win the Republican nomination. And State Sen. Leo O'Brien won the Democratic nomination in a close race.

● New Hampshire Gov. Walter Peterson won a narrow victory for Republican renomination, defeating a candidate supported by William Loeb, the right-wing publisher of the state's largest newspaper. The Democratic challenger will be Roger J. Crowley.

● In the closest primary, for a Democratic congressional nomination in Colorado, a recount is expected. The unofficial tally gave challenger Craig S. Barnes, 34, a 27-vote edge over incumbent Byron G. Rogers, 70, who is seeking his 11th term in the House.

Unopposed in gubernatorial primaries were Republican Gov. John A. Love, seeking a third term, and Democrat Mark A. Hogan, who currently is the state's lieutenant governor.

● Wisconsin Democrats picked Patrick J. Lucey to run for governor, and Republicans chose Lt. Gov. Jack B. Olson. The two had met head-on in 1964, when Lucey was elected lieutenant governor. Lucey defeated Donald O. Peterson, a "new politics" veteran of the 1968 McCarthy campaign, to win the nomination.

Neither incumbent Democrat William Proxmire nor Republican John E. Erickson had opposition in their respective senatorial primaries.

The Wallace-type American Party is also running candidates for senator and governor.

● In Arizona, Democrats picked Sam Grossman to face GOP Sen. Paul J. Fannin in November and Raul H. Castro, a fomer U.S. ambassador, to challenge Republican Gov. Jack Williams.

Steelworkers Vote Aid To Hurricane Victims

Pittsburgh—The executive board of the Steelworkers has voted a $10,000 contribution to the American Red Cross to aid victims of Hurricane Celia, which recently struck the Corpus Christi area of Texas.

Pres. I. W. Abel said members of the USWA and their families were among those who suffered from the hurricane's devastation.

Clothing Union Supports Drug 'Rescue' Group

St. Louis—The Southwest Regional Joint Board of the Clothing Workers has contributed $1,000 to the St. Louis Drug Crisis Intervention (Acid Rescue) Unit.

William C. Hall, ACWA vice president, said the union believes that the current drug crisis is one of the most important issues facing Americans, young and old, today.

The union made the contribution after members of the Drug Crisis Intervention Unit staff led group discussions with more than 200 ACWA members at a joint board meeting here.

"We asked the 'Acid Rescue' people to lead these discussions in the hope that our members might gain some factual knowledge about various drugs and their relative dangers so they might examine their attitudes as parents and grandparents," Hall explained.

Labor Calls House Bill 'Inadequate'

An immediate 10 percent increase in social security benefits and an additional 20 percent effective in 1972 was called for by the AFL-CIO in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee.

Andrew J. Biemiller, the federation's legislative director, termed the 5 percent across-the-board increase voted by the House in May "totally inadequate."

The overall bill, which contains provisions dealing with Medicare, Medicaid as well as the level of benefits and other provisions, "falls far short of making a major impact on the economic problems faced by social security beneficiaries," he said.

The House-passed measure was the second step of social security benefit increases voted by the 91st Congress. A first-stage 15 percent across-the-board increase covering 22.6 million persons now on the rolls took effect Jan. 1, 1970.

Biemiller noted that in testifying before the House Committee the AFL-CIO had urged a 20 percent increase for 1970 with an additional 20 percent increase in two years.

"Current inflation has made that goal impossible," he said, "since the 15 percent increase is supplemented only by the 5 percent in the House bill. We urge passage of an immediate 10 percent increase and an additional 20 percent effective Jan. 1, 1972."

Commenting on the cost-of-living escalator voted by the House to adjust benefits annually if there were a 3 percent increase in living costs, Biemiller said this type of escalator should not be adopted "unless it is clear public policy that there will be periodic increases in benefits in addition to those related to rising living costs."

The AFL-CIO supported the House bill on increasing benefits payable to widows, computing benefits for men on working years up to 62 instead of 65, and increasing the amount of exempt earnings to $2,000.

On Medicare the federation called for reimbursement to beneficiaries for money spent for prescription drugs, 80 percent of which are out-of-pocket costs to the elderly.

It urged again including the disabled under the Medicare law and dropping the supplemental medical insurance premium. The AFL-CIO

Meany Pledges Full Support In GM Strike

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged the backing of American labor for 350,000 Auto Workers on strike against General Motors, the world's largest auto-maker.

"If they need any assistance they are going to get it from the AFL-CIO, even though they are not in our organization," Meany said in a speech to the Sheet Metal Workers convention at Atlantic City.

The strike started Sept. 15 after GM failed to improve acceptably a contract offer the union called the poorest initial offer in 25 years. Virtually identical proposals were made by Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. but the UAW voted to strike only GM, the pacesetter in production and profits.

Bid to Limit Debate Falls Short by Six

Diehard opponents of direct election of the President blocked the Senate from voting on the merits of the House-passed constitutional amendment, transforming the debate into a filibuster.

Their tactics drew an angry rebuke from Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, who accused opponents of thwarting the intent of the framers of the Constitution by trying to prevent the Senate from voting on an amendment.

Mansfield indicated another effort will be made to close debate—which requires a two-thirds vote under the Senate's rules.

The constitutional amendment also requires a two-thirds vote. But its supporters include several senators who traditionally oppose any curtailment of unlimited debate.

On the first cloture attempt, the 54-36 vote to limit debate was six short of the needed two-thirds.

Thirty-three Democrats and 21 Republicans voted for the cloture motion; 18 from each party were opposed, and there were 10 absentees.

The labor-supported constitutional amendment passed the House by a one-sided 339-70 vote last year. But it languished for nearly 12 months in the Senate Judiciary Committee until its chief sponsor, Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) was able to pry it loose.

Pres. Nixon has endorsed the amendment and urged its approval by Congress this year, so that it can be submitted to the states for the needed three-fourths ratfication in time for the 1972 presidential election.

Injunction Threatens:

New Gains Scored In Farm Struggle

Salinas, Calif.—The AFL-CIO's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee scored new breakthroughs in California's fertile Salinas Valley, but ran into a legal roadblock which threatened to slow the momentum of the valley-wide strike for union recognition.

Valley growers who had signed backdoor contracts with the Teamsters succeeded in obtaining from a local judge an injunction prohibiting the Farm Workers from all picketing on the ground that the strike was jurisdictional.

As the court was granting the growers' request for an injunction, two of the largest tomato growers in the valley announced that they were recognizing the UFWOC as bargaining representative for their 1,000 field workers and were prepared to begin immediate negotiations on a union contract. They have formally asked the Teamsters for cancellation of the contract they had initially signed in an effort to block UFWOC organization.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher said the injunction will be appealed to the state's highest court.

He termed the court order "outrageous" in the face of sworn affidavits submitted by more than 1,000 farm workers employed at the ranches where picketing was barred.

The workers testified that they were not members of the Teamsters, had never been approached about unionism by anyone other than the United Farm Workers, and the only representation ever made to them about Teamster membership came from their employers.

One grower said his normal workforce of 700 had shrunk to less than 100 as a result of the strike.

Earlier, the Teamsters agreed to rescind contracts with two of the biggest lettuce growers, Freshpict Foods, Inc., and Darrigo Brothers, and with L. H. Delfino, the area's largest artichoke grower.

In a half-page advertisement in the Salinas newspaper, the Darrigo firm said, "It has become obvious to us that our workers want UFWOC."

5 Liberals Win Senate Races In Primaries

Hubert H. Humphrey has cleared the first hurdle in his bid to return to the Senate from Minnesota and four other Democratic senators joined him in winning party nominations.

Sens. Joseph D. Tydings of Maryland, Henry M. Jackson of Washington and John O. Pastore of Rhode Island won primary elections. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts was unopposed in the primary.

Primaries have now been completed in all states except Hawaii, with run-offs due yet in Florida and Georgia.

Commerce Chief Drops Labor Seats On Economic Aid Advisory Unit

Commerce Sec. Maurice H. Stans has named 21 members to an advisory committee on regional economic development without choosing a single representative of organized labor despite a statutory requirement that labor be represented.

The advisory committee named last month includes businessmen, lawyers, industrialists and the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Only 21 of the 25 members required by the law were listed.

The act setting up the agency — the Economic Development Administration—was first passed in the Kennedy Administration with strong support from the AFL-CIO. The agency was then called the Area Redevelopment Administration.

In succeeding years the 25-member committee represented "labor, management, agriculture, state and local governments and the public in general," as called for in Section 602 of the law.

Stans' announcement said that Jerome W. Van Gorkom of Chicago, president of Trans Union Corp., would be chairman of the committee to advise Stans and Assistant Sec. of Commerce Robert A. Podesta on the programs of EDA.

The Commerce Dept. release describes EDA as an agency established "to help create jobs and increase incomes by encouraging industrial and commercial growth in economically lagging areas of the nation."

HRDI Spurs Union Involvement In Nation's Manpower Programs

America's unions have emerged as full partners in the nation's manpower programs—with the help of trained staff members of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute.

The labor-sponsored, government-financed institute is marking its second anniversary this month with a renewed commitment to the challenge assigned it by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany—"to open up good and productive jobs to people who have been labeled hard-to-employ and who have been pushed aside and largely excluded from the nation's economic life."

It's even more of a challenge now in a period of high unemployment, HRDI Pres. Julius Rothman noted in an anniversary statement.

But HRDI, he stressed, "has demonstrated the capability of its staff in 50 cities to serve as a valuable resource to the local labor community for manpower training programs. Even in the face of rising unemployment, HRDI will continue to seek out job training opportunities for the disadvantaged, the underemployed, and the minorities."

Rothman, a veteran of 32 years in the labor movement, is also associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, and previously served as the federation's coordinator of anti-poverty programs and as assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

The institute's executive director is Robert McGlotten, who moved over from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights when HRDI's first executive director, Merlin Taylor, returned to a key post in the Labor Dept's Manpower Administration. Both before and since taking his new post, McGlotten has played a key role in developing minority training programs with trade union and community participation.

The Labor Dept.'s initial $1.5 million contract with the institute was to support a program to "mobilize and utilize the vast resources of skilled talent and experience available within the labor movement to plan, develop, coordinate and operate manpower programs for hard-core unemployed . . . with emphasis on developing necessary support and problem-solving services to obtain and maintain sound employment for such workers."

To achieve that goal the institute decided to concentrate its energies at the local level. Area manpower representatives were trained to operate in 50 major industrial centers where unemployment is severe. The HRDI staff is composed of men and women from 26 unions, with wide backgrounds of active involvement in labor and community organizations.

Probably the most significant activity of the HRDI staff, according to Rothman, has been its involvement in programs related to minority hiring in the building trades. Working closely with the Civil Rights Dept. of the AFL-CIO, HRDI assisted with Apprenticeship Outreach to prepare minority youth for apprenticeships in the skilled trades.

The largest manpower effort in which HRDI is involved has been the JOBS program, a cooperative arrangement between the Dept. of Labor and the National Alliance of Businessmen for the purposes of hiring, training and upgrading the disadvantaged. HRDI's role is to assist in the development of contracts for training the disadvantaged and in resolving problems arising between labor and management during the operational period of the contract.

To help newly-hired trainees over the difficult adjustment period, a worker to worker "buddy system" was developed and has become one of HRDI's most successful and widely publicized programs. The HRDI staff has conducted 64 buddy training programs in 43 cities involving 1,105 workers from 222 local unions and 304 companies. Many employers now regard this program as an essential ingredient of this JOBS contract.

As local manpower experts, HRDI staff members become involved in many other programs. In some communities, they have participated in the Model Cities programs. In other areas, they have assisted local unions in obtaining on-the-job training contracts with the Dept. of Labor.

Many HRDI staff members are active in Cooperative Area Manpower Planning System Committees. They also frequently work closely with the Work Incentive Programs, intended to train welfare recipients for jobs, and with the Concentrated Employment Programs, designed to supply disadvantaged workers with training and other necessary prerequisites for placement.

In two years, HRDI has become an important part of the nation's manpower programs.

Candidates Endorsed In Washington State

Richland, Wash.—The Washington State AFL-CIO endorsed 107 candidates for political office at its 13th annual convention and made improvement of the state workmen's compensation program a "matter of the highest priority" at the next session of the legislature.

Topping the list of endorsed candidates was Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D), who is seeking a fourth Senate term. He was one of many officials who addressed the convention.

Jackson noted that the state's unemployment rate for July was the highest in the nation. Another speaker, Rep. Brock Adams, called for an immediate special session of the legislature to bring the state's extended unemployment benefit program into conformity with recently passed federal legislation. An estimated $5.5 million in federal funds could be used to extend jobless benefits by more than six weeks, Adams said.

James R. O'Brien of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security told the 550 convention delegates that most state compensation programs, including Washington's, provide "less than poverty-level benefits" for laid-off or injured workers.

O'Brien called for minimum federal standards for state jobless insurance programs. The states, he said, have "done an excellent job of protecting employers but an extremely poor job" for injured workers, their families and the public.

Gov. Daniel J. Evans (R) told the convention he favors improvements in the injury insurance program.

The convention urged the legislature to update the workmen's compensation program, including retention of the right of appealing awards to a jury; a special legislative session, and a law change to meet federal minimum standards.

Delegates reaffirmed their opposition to any increase in retail interest charges above the 12 percent ceiling enacted by initiative in 1968. They authorized Council Pres. Joseph Davis and Sec.-Treas. Marvin L. Williams to file initiative petitions if hostile legislation is passed by the 1971 legislature, and changed the constitution to allow a special assessment of 5 cents a member per month to finance any such campaign.

Convention Report:

Sheet Metal Union Posts Record Gains

Atlantic City—Delegates to the Sheet Metal Workers convention heard a report of record organizing gains, voted a per capita tax to keep the drive going, and elected the union's director of organization as the new president.

Edward J. Carlough won unanimous election to succeed his father, Edward F. Carlough. The senior Carlough told the delegates that he would not accept re-election to another four-year term as union president.

During the four years since the last convention, the Sheet Metal Workers brought 558 new shops under union contract and added 32,000 members to pass the 150,-000 mark.

Delegates approved a 75-cent increase in the per capita, to $3.75 a month.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, principal speaker at the quadrennial convention, told the delegates that the labor movement is going to continue to fight for a better America and reject those who would "burn and destroy."

The path to progress, Meany said, "is right straight down the middle road, pushing forward, ever forward" and rejecting "the doctrine of those on the extreme left, or the John Birchers on the extreme right."

Meany stressed the AFL-CIO's "firm position" against race discrimination, the successful efforts of building crafts to recruit apprentices from minority groups through "Outreach" programs, and labor's insistence that high standards of craftsmanship and training must be maintained.

Anything else, he told the delegates, would be "a fraud and a delusion."

The nearly 850 delegates adopted a political action report which branded voter apathy labor's "number one problem" in election campaigns.

It called on local unions to set up active political action committees to spearhead registration drives, keep members informed on issues, spur letter-writing campaigns on legislation and carry on the annual voluntary political fund drive.

Delegates backed up their endorsement of the resolution by digging into their pockets for a political fund collection that came close to the $10,000 mark.

In other areas, Organization Dir. Carlough reported to the convention on the union's new national training fund.

"Not only do we need to train our apprentices better," he told the delegates, "but we need to train the people who train the apprentices."

The jointly-administered program is being financed by a negotiated employer contribution of two cents an hour.

Delegates re-elected Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner and the 11 incumbent vice presidents and approved pay raises for officers, with a $10,-000 hike for president, secretary-treasurer and vice president for railroads, and smaller increases for other officers.

Edward J. Carlough, who will assume the presidency in October, is 38 and has been a member of the union since his apprenticeship in 1949. He has been a staff member of COPE and the predecessor Labor's League for Political Action, became research director of the Sheet Metal Workers in 1957, and director of organization in 1960.

His father became president of the union in 1959, after having served as secretary-treasurer since 1951.

Labor Adopts Goals for '70s In Connecticut

Hartford, Conn.—The Connecticut AFL-CIO endorsed candidates for state and federal office at its 1970 legislative, political and educational convention here and adopted a set of goals for action by the legislature and Congress.

The convention endorsed the Rev. Joseph Duffey, Hartford clergyman who is national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action, for election to the U.S. Senate, and Rep. Emilio Daddario for governor. Both are the Democratic nominees.

Duffey won the state labor endorsement by a vote of 52,811 to 19,570 for Sen. Thomas Dodd, Democratic incumbent who is running as an independent. The Republican nominee, Rep. Lowell P. Weicker, received 779 votes.

Council Pres. John J. Driscoll reported that, despite layoffs, affiliated membership has increased by 10 percent since mid-1968. He urged the delegates to close ranks behind all the endorsed candidates in the Nov. 3 election.

On the national level, the convention endorsed national health insurance, nationwide occupational health and safety standards, and increasing the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour, Sec.-Treas, Joseph C. Bober said.

Meany Brands Hijackers Foes of Civilized Society

The latest wave of plane hijacking "is a blow against all human decency," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a telegram to Chairman Charles Zimmerman of the Jewish Labor Committee.

Any government which "incites or tolerates" such acts "shares the guilt of the criminals" who endanger the lives of defenseless passengers and crewmen, Meany said in a telegram read at a prayer meeting in Hammarskjold Plaza at the United Nations headquarters in New York City.

"We condemn the latest wave of Arab hijacking and call upon our government to speed the liberation of all the entrapped men, women and children," Meany said. He urged the United States to act in concert with all other governments which have regard for basic human decency to prevent the recurrence "of such monstrous terroristic crimes."

Air piracy attacks "the very foundations of all civilized societies," Meany declared.

Labor Apprehensive:

Nixon Appointments Spur New Concern

Organized labor is concerned and apprehensive over the Nixon Administration's use of the power of "appointment and replacement" on enforcement of basic national laws and policies.

The concern was voiced by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland in an address at a luncheon in Washington honoring Frank W. McCulloch, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, who was not reappointed by the President.

To an audience of over 800 persons including the new NLRB chairman Edward B. Miller and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, Kirkland said that "when a public servant like Frank McCulloch is relieved of his post—inevitable as it may appear to everyone familiar with the rules of the political game—it is a matter of some consequence," and has an effect on "the great mass of the people who look to government and its agencies to defend their interests against more powerful forces."

Citing McCulloch's record and "his integrity and independence of mind and spirit (that) could never be challenged," Kirkland commented that "it is a peculiarity of life and politics in Washington that the more devoted, able and consistent you are in the enforcement of the basic purposes of law or national policy that you are called upon to administer, the more likely you are to be prematurely relieved of your duties."

Noting in his opening remarks that he was speaking "not to praise Frank McCulloch but to bury his NLRB incarnation with some of that honesty and candor that are such essential parts of his character," Kirkland said that the circumstances that gave rise to the luncheon "ought to be enough to dispel any misconception that the AFL-CIO is on or near the verge of enchantment with the present Administration. We do know what is going on and why, and that knowledge imparts just a bit of the flavor of wormwood and gall to the White House menu—even on Labor Day."

McCulloch, he said, "has kept faith with the law's intent" in terms of protecting the rights of workers to representation by unions of their own choosing and the promotion of good faith collective bargaining. He added:

"We fully understand that those now in places of power would naturally regard this as a great offense against the Republic and would accomplish his replacement at the earliest opportunity.

"We also understand the consequences that his replacement is designed to achieve and we expect those consequences to be painful to working people."

Stans Drops Labor Seats on Advisory Panel

The EDA programs include public works loans and grants to help local communities provide facilities essential to economic growth and long-term, low-interest business development loans.

Stans said the committee is composed of a "distinguished group of Americans who have maintained an active interest in improving economic and social conditions for their fellow citizens," and that they can furnish "valuable assistance in helping create permanent, meaningful job opportunities in areas of need."

Organized labor had launched a fight for legislation to aid depressed areas in the 1950s but congressional action was frustrated by a Republican-Dixiecrat coalition in Congress until 1961. Pres. Kennedy made it a high priority item of his administration.

The AFL-CIO was deeply involved in the fight to win the legislation and in helping set up the original ARA. Labor was represented, as required by the act, on the national advisory committee and was active in local committees set up in the chronically distressed areas.

United Way Backed In Meany Appeal

A message of support for the United Way of America, which works "for the betterment of the total community" has been issued by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"Today our nation is facing many difficult social and economic problems which can be solved through the democratic process only if all Americans, labor and management, black and white, young and old, pull together," Meany said.

Citing the direct involvement of AFL-CIO members as volunteers and as "the largest single contributor to United Fund campaigns in the country," Meany said: "One of the finest examples of democratic citizen participation is demonstrated by the working relationship between the United Way of America and the AFL-CIO through its community services activities."

FARM WORKERS' thanks for support of Salinas Valley strikers is expressed in a handshake by UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez with Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning, right, and Pres. Albin J. Gruhn, left, of the California AFL-CIO. The central body recently voted a $10,000 contribution and pledged continued support of field workers striking for recognition and a UFWOC contract.

Rail Unions Vow Fight To Retain Strike Right

Four unions representing 400,000 railroad workers obeyed a federal court order halting a strike against three roads but prepared to wage a court fight to preserve their right to conduct local strikes.

The legal battle is due to start Sept. 22 when U.S. District Court Judge Howard F. Corcoran hears arguments of labor and management on making the no-strike injunction permanent.

Management won a temporary restraining order from Corcoran 11 minutes before a Sept. 14 strike deadline, set by the unions when contract negotiations got nowhere.

Some 40,000 members of the Railway & Airline Clerks, the United Transportation Union, the Maintenance of Way Employes and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, representing dining car employes, had been preparing to strike only three of 72 major railroads in the United States.

Presidents of the rail unions instructed strikers to return to work on the Southern Pacific, Baltimore & Ohio and the Chesapeake & Ohio but not all got the word on time. The court dismissed contempt of court show-cause proceedings and all strike action was abandoned.

UTU Pres. Charles Luna said the unions have "leaned over backwards to avoid a national emergency" that would have been proclaimed if rail labor struck all the carriers with whom it has been negotiating for improved wages and work rules for more than a year.

The carriers "want to force us into an emergency situation which would entirely deny us the right to strike," Luna said at his headquarters in Cleveland.

In Chicago, Pres. C. L. Dennis of the Railway Clerks directed his members to obey the court order and praised the "solidarity and militancy" the strikers showed before their strike was broken.

"The battle has just begun," Dennis said. "We shall win."

The four unions had postponed strike action by extending the walkout deadline five days, but rail management made no acceptable offer in Washington talks coordinated by Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr.

Usery said that he would "continue the exploration of the problem" of reaching agreement with both sides. Usery indicated the Nixon Administration does not presently plan to intervene in the dispute.

Union spokesmen charged that management negotiators had shown "absolute inflexibility" in the talks. The only offer by the carriers, they said, was a 7 percent raise for a one-year period—an offer turned down nearly a year ago.

In a separate railroad dispute, the UTU set a new deadline of Sept. 23 for taking "whatever action is needed" in that union's dispute with the railroads on the diesel fireman dispute. An emergency board named by Nixon recommended that the dispute be settled by creating a new job classification combining the duties of firemen and brakemen, but no agreement has been reached.

H. E. Gilbert, assistant to the UTU president, said the union is "convinced the railroads do not want a negotiated settlement of this issue—they want it placed back in the laps of Congress."

Contract Battle Won At D.C. Nursing Home

The Service Employes signaled the end of a long fight for bargaining rights at a Washington, D.C., nursing home by signing a three-year contract with the Mar-Salle home.

SEIU Pres. David Sullivan said the first agreement provides a union shop for the 122 non-professional employes at Mar-Salle, wage increases of 35 cents an hour, grievance procedures and improved fringe benefits.

The unit includes licensed practical nurses, orderlies, nursing aides, dietary and kitchen workers and housekeeping and maintenance personnel.

Only five members remain of the original unit that voted for SEIU Local 536 in a National Labor Relations Board election in 1968. The union retained bargaining rights through a long strike and continued refusal by management to bargain with the union.

The strike became a cause celebre for the small local union of minority group workers and for the labor and civic groups that rallied to their cause.

Management of the 192-bed private nursing home was ordered to bargain in one of the first such orders issued by the NLRB after the board agreed to take jurisdiction over such homes.

Mar-Salle management appealed the order and was turned down. It challenged the validity of the election and the type of unit. Late last year it filed another appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The court dismissed the appeal Feb. 18 and ordered the company to bargain with the union. Seven months of negotiation resulted in a contract offer accepted by employes of the home, Local 536 Pres. George Tucker said.

When the strike started in 1968, Sullivan walked the picket line to demonstrate the international union's support of the new local union.

Picketing continued sporadically while the workers sought new jobs. The pickets won backing from area unions and also from the Catholic Interracial Council and other groups. The struggle led to contract agreements with other area nursing homes.

Wages at the start ranged from $1.30 an hour to $1.45. The new rates began at $1.85 an hour and rise to $2.50 in the third year for top-paid classifications.

NLRB Cases All-Time High For Quarter

The National Labor Relations Board reported two new high records for the three-month period ended June 30—in total cases received and unfair labor practices charges filed.

The NLRB received 9,452 cases of all types—the highest for any three-month period since the agency opened its doors in 1935. The total in the same period a year ago was 8,693.

A board announcement said "the record inflow . . . resulted largely from the filing of 6,232 charges alleging that employers, unions or both" had violated the labor law. The total also was the highest ever for a three-month period. A year ago the figure was 5,168.

The report showed that for every unfair practice charge filed against a union, nearly two were filed against employers in a 65-35 ratio, the usual percentage in recent years.

Of the 3,153 requests for elections, 2,914 were for representation elections, 201 to decertify unions as bargaining agents for employes, and 38 to deauthorize union shop agreements. The total compared with 3,525 petitions a year ago.

The NLRB general counsel's office issued 539 formal complaints in the most recent quarter—no change from the same quarter of 1969.

In 57 percent of the elections conducted by board agents, employes voted for union representation. The winning margin was 53 percent for AFL-CIO unions, 54 for unaffiliated unions.

Meany Pledges Full Support In GM Strike

the company broke off contract talks an hour before the strike deadline. Production geared to 130,000 vehicles a week halted as picket lines were set up at 145 manufacturing plants in the United States and Canada. GM also produces parts for other auto firms at 27 plants which were exempted from the strike.

GM had been a UAW strike target only once since 1945, when the union stayed on the picket line for 119 days to win an acceptable agreement. A 10-day strike was called in 1964.

Meanwhile the executive council of the Textile Workers scored GM for raising the prices of its products while refusing to meet the needs of its workers to keep pace with inflation—a development for which GM "bears a major share of the blame." The council, meeting in Quebec, voted "wholehearted support" for UAW strikers.

In Washington, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson ruled out federal intervention in the dispute, at least for the time being. He said "we have no indication that intervention now would prove fruitful" but offered to act "whenever the usefulness of such help is indicated."

Principal issues in the dispute that led to a strike are wage increases, cost-of-living wage adjustments and retirement after 30 years' service regardless of age.

San Francisco Unionist Named to Airport Body

San Francisco—Joseph P. Mazzola, vice president of the California Labor Federation and business manager of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 38, has been installed as a member of the new San Francisco Airport Commission. The five-member board was sworn in by retired U.S. Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Don't Forget the Legislatures

THE PRELIMINARY ROUNDS of the 1970 elections are out of the way with only a runoff primary or two remaining and a nomination contest still to come in Hawaii. The candidates have been chosen and the issues sharpened for the final showdown on Nov. 3.

Most of the attention has necessarily gone to the candidates for the U.S. Senate and the governorships. The Senate races constitute probably the most important national question for the possible control of the chamber is involved.

The governorships are particularly important both in terms of growing state problems and the political complexion of 1972. But a somewhat neglected area is also involved—the reapportionment of seats in the U.S. House of Representatives based on 1970 census results.

This gives a real importance to the contests in many states for seats in the state legislatures, for the legislative bodies and the governors will be the keys to reapportionment.

Preliminary census returns indicated that 16 states will be affected by the 1970 population figures. Six of them are expected to gain seats in the House while 10 states will lose seats.

In 1971 there will be a total of 44 state legislatures in session with the power to draw new district lines within the one-man, one vote formula for seats in the U.S. House of Representatives.

The states standing to gain seats, according to the census figures to date are: California, 5; Florida, 3; Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Texas, one each.

The states that will lose seats are: New York, 2; Pennsylvania, 2; Alabama, Iowa, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Tennessee, West Virginia, Wisconsin, one each.

By and large the census figures disclose large population gains in the West, Southwest and Florida. But the state legislative battles to redraw dictrict lines will be fought in all the states where changes are indicated with some of the sharpest fighting in the states losing seats.

In addition to redistricting for U.S. House seats, state legislatures will also face the need to reapportion seats in the legislature on the basis of population trends in the states.

ORGANIZED LABOR has been in the vanguard of the fight for the one-man, one-vote principle for seats in Congress, state legislatures and local bodies. On the basis of the 1970 census figures the fight now shifts to insuring that the state legislatures deal fairly and justly with the problems of allocating seats and drawing district lines.

One way to assure this is to elect progressive, liberal state legislatures whose members are attuned to the needs of the states and of the nation overall for a fairly apportioned U.S. House of Representatives that in fact as well as name honestly represents the country and its people.

New Book on Nixon Marred By Naive View of U.S. Politics

By John P. Roche

JULES WITCOVER'S "The Resurrection of Richard Nixon," has the makings of a first-rate study. Beginning with Nixon's famous blast at the press in 1962—after losing the California governorship to Pat Brown—Witcover has carefully documented, almost inch by inch, the unbelievable comeback. It is a fascinating story and, by and large, Witcover tells it well.

The trouble is it doesn't come off as a book. It is in fact two books, one written by a meticulous journalist, and the other by a sour critic who can't seem to resist any opportunity to cut Nixon up. Richard Nixon has never been one of my political folk-heroes, but one thing I never faulted him on was has willingness to be an American politician.

Much of Witcover's criticism seems to add up to contempt for the American political process itself; his ideal candidate would apparently run for President of Sweden, not of the United States. (Since there is no President of Sweden, this is an obvious non-starter.)

Underlying Witcover's acid treatment is the unarticulated proposition that the working newspapermen are and should be (in Douglass Cater's phrase) "the Fourth Branch of Government," an estate of the realm charged with the task of exposing to the electorate "the Real Nixon," the "Real Johnson" or the "Real Humphrey."

Pres. John F. Kennedy once wryly observed that in the United States "it was a more heinous offense to insult a reporter than to shoot an archbishop." Kennedy, however, was a genius at handling journalists and there was little concerted effort to find the "Real Kennedy."

Pres. Nixon, in contrast, has always been a prime target. After his experiences in 1960 and 1962, he obviously decided to keep blue water between himself and the working press. In the 1968 campaign, this understandably outraged the reporters, some of whom are perpetually out to make news by spearing a candidate at a weak moment on an awkward subject.

What seems to burn Witcover up, however, is not that Nixon tried to insulate himself—all public figures try to avoid the waiting hooks—but that he succeeded.

Rather than congratulating Nixon on his deftness, Witcover denounces him for betraying the fundamental principles of the democratic process!

As one who has never been fully convinced of the divine mission of the press, I can't really get worked up about Nixon's insulation. Indeed, I rather wish some Democratic statesmen of my acquaintance had learned to button up.

Witcover's central thesis is that by holding the press at arm's length Nixon was able to create his own public image with paid TV ads—that is, he was able to buffalo the American people by denying them access to the "real, real, new Nixon."

IN THE AUTHOR'S view, the press, for example, could have forced Nixon to reveal that he had no "plan" to end the war in Viet Nam. This assumes the American electorate is composed of dummies. I would argue that most voters knew damn well that no candidate had a "plan" (polls indicated they expected a long war) and that Nixon won because 57 percent of the electorate was tired of liberal Democrats, and three-quarters of this majority preferred Nixon to Wallace.

It might be added that Witcover is impartially sour. With the exception of the late Robert Kennedy (whom he described lovingly in an earlier book), he treats just about every public figure as a bad joke. Lyndon Johnson emerges as a sinister megalomaniac who—to take one example—believed his defeat of Goldwater was a great personal triumph.

Without underestimating Johnson's ego, I would simply submit that this is an incredible insult to his intelligence: he knew the Republicans committed suicide in 1964. Indeed, in 1967—when urging him to organize the Democratic Party—I observed that Marvin Watson (who was with me) would have beaten Goldwater. The President looked at me quizzically and said, "Yes, but with only 55 percent of the vote."

All this aside, "The Resurrection of Richard Nixon" is an extremely valuable contribution to our understanding of the complex introverted man who now sits in the White House.

Humphrey Speaks Out:

Law, Order Proper Concerns Of Labor-Liberal Movement

The following is excerpted from a recent address by Hubert H. Humphrey to the American Bar Association in St. Louis on liberalism and "law-and-order."

IF WE LOOK at the American labor movement —with all of its limitations—if you look at its membership or its leadership, it's very hard to make the nasty rhetoric stick. For the labor movement in the last forty years has been the point of the spear for every major liberal and progressive program enacted in the Congress of the United States.

That includes, of course, obvious pro-labor measures like collective bargaining and the minimum wage and unemployment insurance. You'd expect that. But it also includes aid to education, job training, Job Corps, war on poverty, Medicare, aid to cities, medical research, and more specifically and dramatically, a concerted effort in support of a series of major civil rights measures and civil liberties protections.

Now that's not so bad, is it, for a labor movement that some voices describe as reactionary and dead and stale.

In fact, while the critical pundits were sipping their martinis at Georgetown cocktail parties, and while a new breed of self-proclaimed militants were condemning the labor movement, that labor movement—from George Meany and the late Walter Reuther on down—was actively, peacefully helping to revamp the American social and economic fabric—and I think for the better!

But the charge has been made that it is only the leadership that is liberal and activist; that the rank-and-file of the union membership is really rather conservative, racist, reactionary, indifferent, and sitting around in their undershirts drinking beer, looking at TV, cursing hippies, and voting for George Wallace. Now that's what a lot of people read and heard.

Now I would like to ask you to look beyond the sometimes surly talk and look at the deeds and the actions. I'm sure that some of this talk has taken place. If you go down to a bar someplace, you might very well hear something like that. But in America, political deeds are enacted, most significantly, in the voting booth, not at the bar stool.

At root, and concerning the real gut liberal issues, the American workingmen are voting liberals.

That progress has been achieved in America on a number of things like the needs of our cities, on health and transportation, environment and race, is in a large part because these American labor hard-hats and others like them have supported it.

And I submit that if there is to be progress in the future of America, it will require the support of the American workingman among others. They are a powerful force in our political system. Reform and remedy for our social ills can be accomplished only with their support. Therefore, there is a vital need of maintaining this coalition and this worthy momentum.

But what about the liberals, particularly those that we call the "intellectual liberals"? Are they really the ivory-tower elitists that the critics say they are?

There are admittedly a few dilettantes within the current ranks of liberals, but most of the liberals in the 1960's were willing to do tough, hard and courageous work. The civil rights workers that went into the South were as courageous a group of young people as this nation has ever seen. And I can also tell you that those liberals, young and old, who have sincerely protested the war in Vietnam and its extension into Cambodia, who have protested hunger in America. who have condemned pollution, who have dramatized the plight of the migratory workers, are tough-minded idealists, no panty-waists, these people.

And most importantly, liberals in America are not now and never have been—"anti-workingman". And I don't intend to let this sad and ugly myth grow in this country. Liberals have supported the same progressive programs that the labor movement has supported.

In fact the most liberal areas of the nation, such as those surrounding colleges and universities, voted heavily Democratic in 1968 just as they voted for LBJ and JFK, and Stevenson, and Truman and FDR. And just as America will not get legislative progress on cities, on health, on schools, on the problems of the disadvantaged without the support of the labor movement, neither will we get progress without the leadership of America's articulate and active liberal idealists.

We need both. We need to keep this coalition working although some would like to divide it and some people are willing to accept it as gone.

Well, then, what's the problem all about? What threatens this important vital coalition?

The problem is the code phrase "law and order."

In 1968 there was a cliche afloat that said, "law and order is a code word for racism."

Well, "law and order" may indeed sometimes and in some places be a code phrase for racism —but it is also a code phrase for domestic tranquility and for the protection of life, liberty and property. And Americans are deeply upset about crime, about riots, about violent disruption, about drugs—about all facets of "law and order," and they rightly should be.

Black militants, burning and shooting, may well have set back the cause of civil rights for a decade. White radicals rampaging on campuses may well have spawned an anti-university backlash that could set back the cause of higher education by a decade. Draft resisters who took the law into their own hands have served neither the cause of peace nor of draft reform.
